"It is extremely costly, but as a commuter and having seen the apartments I would say they are 'almost' worth it especially if you're used to living on-campus," said Shawn Robinson, a commuter senator and member of the SGA's Chair of the Ways and Means Committee. "They can be the future of campus living if we can just get the price down".

The buildings are scheduled to be rented as conference facilities during the summer in order to offset the nine-month student cost.

Dime Construction, the company in charge of the project, claims it is confident that the buildings will be ready for the fall semester of 2006. There are currently about 230 workers a day and an architect always on sight for last-minute questions. However, one building is currently delayed for two weeks due to plumbing problems.

In the first two days of the application period for on campus students, there were already 500 applicants. According to Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano, the apartments are intended for juniors and seniors and priority is given based upon the number of academic credits earned.

A mock up will be available in about two weeks for students to view.

Group of senators demand changes from SGA

no assistance when they come to ask questions… Secretive meetings are held by the upper leadership and it is suspected by a large portion of the government and the student body that resources are being illegally used for other organizations… [Senators] tend to get overly passionate and at times the leaders have even started screaming at members of the Senate."

Top SGA officials were disappointed with the comments found on the Web site.

"It's slander and it's depressing," said SGA Speaker Sean Bliss. "It's a violation of the candidate's code of conduct and their information is very misleading; a lot of that stuff is not true. They're trying to position themselves to win an election by discrediting the SGA and actions like this defeat the purpose of what we're trying to do."

McNair claimed that the movement wasn't to destroy the SGA, but that it is necessary.

"We love the SGA," said McNair. "But if they're not going to highlight their problems like a responsible government would, then we will."

SGA Attorney General Shaqullie Onikoro claimed that the senators that supported the Web site are possibly in violation of the SGA bylaws and has filed a petition with the judiciary board to issue the senators an injunction to take down their Web site and to stop their movement.

McNair felt that any punishment given towards their actions would be done in defiance of democracy.

"The major problem we have for the backlash from certain SGA members about our campaign to educate students is that in criticizing us, they're acting in defiance of democracy," said McNair. "We believe criticizing organizations is part of the foundation of democracy. We care about the SGA and that's why we're trying to change it."

"Every student, regardless of how knowledgeable you are of campus politics, needs to visit the Web site and hopefully will understand the dire need for change," said Kennedy.

"We're not trying to tell students who to vote for, we're just encouraging them to vote for someone outside of 'Take Back UMass.'"

McNair encouraged all students to vote in the upcoming elections March 14 and March 15, claiming that "stopping this behavior is in the hands of the students, they need to realize that."

Man allegedly urinates in strangers' dorm room

7:03 p.m.
Follow-up investigation on an incident that took place in Orchard Hill residential area on February 18. Officers responded on that morning at around 1:30 a.m. to a call to investigate damage to a student's property on the third floor of Webster dormitory. An hour prior to the officers' arrival, a male individual entered the room, occupied by females, without the residents' permission. According to reports, he then proceeded to urinate on the floor and wardrobe shelves in the room, and tried to lay down on one of the girls' beds. The residents claim they did not know the male. The suspect has been identified as a resident of Webster dorm, and claimed to have no recollection of anything relating to the incident. He was said to have taken sleeping pills that night. Police have summonsed the man to court.

Wednesday,

10:23 p.m.
Nathan J. Recore, 23, of 6 Stage Road in Chesterfield, was arrested on charges of carrying a dangerous weapon. Information came to the UMass Police Department's attention that a warrant was out for Recore, and that he had dangerous weapons in his possession. The warrant was carried out by both UMass and Goshen police. Recore, who is a UMass employee and was scheduled for work at the physical plant building on Commonwealth Avenue, was placed under arrest more than a half hour before he was scheduled to begin work. He was found to be carrying throwing stars and firearms, and was later bailed.

Saturday,

1:03 a.m.
Collin J. Gold, 20, of 63 Union Square in Randolph, was arrested on nine different charges, among them were two counts of furnishing a false name and one count each of operating under the influence of liquor, reckless operation of a motor vehicle, possession of a Class E drug, speeding, failure to wear a seat belt, marked lanes violation, not being in possession of registration, and refusing to identify oneself. Officers observed Gold operating his motor vehicle erratically on Clark Hill Road. He failed to slow down as he approached the crosswalk, causing pedestrians to jump out of the way. Gold was stopped on Infirmary Way, upon which he provided false information about himself during the initial stop and booking procedure later. He was suspected to have been under the influence of alcohol, and failed a subsequent field sobriety test. Gold presented neither a license nor a registration and provided a false name when prompted. His car was towed as part of the investigative search policy, upon which a bottle of the drug Xanax was found inside the vehicle. Only later did he locate his license in his jacket pocket, and admitted to providing false information. Gold was transported to Hampshire County House of Corrections. He was not bailed.

Marcus Bledsoe, 27, of 113 Penrose Street in Springfield, was arrested on charges of disorderly conduct. A parking complaint in Lot 50 (outside Washington Tower) reported that a staff member of Washington was not able to get to their assigned space. A towing company was contacted, and the truck began operating by way of a cadet's instruction. While towing, Bledsoe, the owner of the vehicle, jumped in front of the tow truck and would not allow the operator to move. Officers arrived at the scene and requested additional assistance. Reports indicate that Bledsoe was screaming, swearing and punching the trunk of the car. Traffic was backed up in the area as a result of the activity of Bledsoe, who refused to move or pay the drop fee. Bledsoe was bailed yesterday morning.

NFL player murder trial begins today

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — The trial for one of four Chicopee men charged in the murder of a former pro football player is expected to begin Wednesday.

Kyle Iwanicki, the 18-year-old son of the chairman of Chicopee's board of assessors, will be the first to stand trial in the slaying of Kevin Baugh, 42.

Police say Baugh, a Navy veteran and one-time player for the Houston Oilers and the Canadian Football League, was a small-time drug dealer with a history of arrests.

Authorities say he was fatally stabbed and beaten with an ice pick and tire iron over a drug dispute with Iwanicki and three others.

Another suspect in the crime, Aaron Nugent, 22, pleaded guilty Monday to voluntary manslaughter in connection with the case. Nugent is expected to testify against Iwanicki.

The other two charged in the case will be tried separately.

Man faces third trial for rape; DNA evidence conflicted jurors

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

BOSTON — Twice, prosecutors have failed to convict Darrin Fernandez of rape after their DNA evidence was clouded by the fact Fernandez has an identical twin. So on Tuesday, at the start of Fernandez's third trial, prosecutors urged jurors to consider a "pattern of behavior" that will distinguish Darrin Fernandez from his twin, who has identical DNA.

Fernandez, 31, is charged in the April 2001 rape of a woman in Boston's Dorchester neighborhood. Prosecutors say he climbed the fire escape to her second-floor bedroom while she was asleep, then repeatedly raped her.

On Tuesday, the woman, now 34, took the witness stand for the third time and described how she was raped repeatedly shortly after midnight on April 27, 2001. The woman remained composed throughout her testimony, but appeared to fight back tears several times as she described the attack.

Assistant District Attorney David Deakin told the jury in his opening statement that prosecutors will introduce evidence that Fernandez committed a series of home break-ins, sexual assaults and attempted sexual assaults with characteristics similar to the April 2001 rape.

"You'll hear a lot about a pattern of DNA, and you'll also hear a lot about a pattern of behavior that will identify (Darrin Fernandez) as surely as the DNA does," Deakin said.

Included in those is a rape in August 2000 for which Fernandez was convicted and is now serving a 10- to 15-year prison term. In that rape, also in Dorchester, prosecutors said Fernandez climbed on two trash barrels he had stacked under the victim's living room window and attacked her as she slept on the couch. In both rapes, the victims said their assailants straddled their chests during part of the attack.

In his first of two trials in the April 2001 case, prosecutors presented evidence that Fernandez was a suspect in a series of break-ins and attempted sexual assaults that also took place in Dorchester in the months before and after the rape.

But this is the first time prosecutors have sought successfully to introduce evidence of his prior rape conviction and the circumstances of that rape.

Fernandez's lawyer, Robert Zanello, told the jury that police pinned the April 2001 rape on his client after his twin, Damien Fernandez, wrote them a letter denying wrongdoing and agreeing to cooperate in their investigation. After that, Zanello said, "the only logical choice was his brother because you had the DNA."

Damien Fernandez testified at the prior trials that he was in Worcester, where he lived, at the time of the April 2001 rape.

Zanello urged jurors to focus on the varying descriptions given by the women in the other attacks, which he said showed no real pattern.

In her testimony Tuesday, the victim in the April 2001 rape described how she awoke shortly after midnight to see a male figure standing at the end of her bed.

"What the hell's going on?" the woman recalled thinking.

"I started raising my voice and telling the person to get out and leave," she said.

The man started talking in a sexually suggestive way, making "sweet-talking kind of comments," she said.

She said that when she raised her voice and repeatedly told the man to leave, he threatened her.

"He raised his right arm as if he was going to strike me," she said.

After repeatedly raping her, the man took her nightshirt, where he had left his semen, the woman said.

"He looked at me and said, 'I know what you're thinking and I know where you live,'" the woman testified.

Deakin told jurors that Fernandez also left some semen on the woman's pillowcase, which was tested and found to be a match to Fernandez.

During cross-examination by Fernandez's attorney, the woman acknowledged there were no lights on in her room and that she only saw her attacker in moonlight. She also said she never saw her attacker's hair because he had on a baseball cap, worn backward.

Pittsfield mother found dead; police name husband as suspect

PITTSFIELD (AP) — A 35-year-old man was being sought after an arrest warrant was issued Tuesday charging him with the murder of his estranged wife.

Seymour Townsend of Pittsfield remained at large Tuesday afternoon. His estranged wife, 27-year-old Michelle Townsend, was reported missing Saturday and found dead in Seymour's apartment Monday.

Berkshire District Attorney David Capeless has not disclosed the cause of death, and said an autopsy is scheduled for Wednesday.

The Townsends' four children — ages 2 to 7 — have been living with Michelle Townsend's mother.

Capeless said Michelle Townsend was reported missing by relatives and friends on Saturday. Police tried contacting her at Seymour Townsend's apartment over the weekend, Capeless said.

After a further request on Monday morning by the family and the Department of Social Services to check the apartment, officers forced their way in and discovered Townsend's body," he said.

Family members said that the apartment where the body was found still was rented in Michelle Townsend's name.

Although the couple, both of whom were unemployed, had been estranged and were living apart, friends and relatives said the two continued to have a relationship because of the children.

"They were always arguing," the victim's aunt, Chloe Briggs, told The Berkshire Eagle.

The children, according to family and friends, were living with Michelle Townsend's mother in Berkshire County.

Pittsfield police would not comment on the case.

sor's classes and collect information directly from the students on their learning experiences. This leads to a brainstorming session with the new instructor to help work on improving their approach, while simultaneously capitalize on their strengths.

Of course the study wasn't only conducted to prove the superiority of the faculty development program at UMass, it also allowed some light to be shed on a number of trends occurring all across the nation in the developmental field which should allow UMass to continue to improve its own teaching curriculum. Most notable is the boom in technological advances over the past 26 years, leading to a significant shift in how instructors teach and students learn. This system of integrating additional technology into classroom expectations is one of the most compelling issues, according to the study.

The survey also discovered that the field has transferred its focus from the scholarly competence of professors towards an environment that is centering on improving student learning. Finally, the study showed that since the 1970s, higher learning institutions have shown tremendous growth of teaching and learning centers, proving that the field is definitely moving in a positive direction not only here at UMass, but all over the country.

The development of the faculty may sound like a program that is in place primarily to support the teachers here at the University, and to a degree it is. But ultimately the people who gain the most from the CTE are the students of UMass. By "putting teachers first," the Center understands that the benefits of great teaching outweigh the cost of running one of the top developmental programs in the country.

USA Patriot Act renewed by Congress

By Laurie Kellman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House renewed the USA Patriot Act in a cliffhanger vote Tuesday night, extending a centerpiece of the war on terrorism at President Bush's urging after months of political combat over the balance between privacy rights and the pursuit of potential terrorists.

Bush, forced by filibuster to accept new curbs on law enforcement investigations, is expected to sign the legislation before 16 provisions of the 2001 law expires on Friday.

The vote was 280-138, just two more than needed under special rules that required a two-thirds majority. It marked a political victory for Bush and will allow congressional Republicans facing midterm elections this year to continue touting a tough-on-terror stance. Bush's approval ratings have suffered in recent months after revelations that he had authorized secret, warrantless wiretapping of Americans.

That issue helped fuel a two-month Senate filibuster that forced the White House to accept some new restrictions on information gathered in terrorism probes.

Republicans on Tuesday declared the legislative war won, saying the renewal of the act's 16 provisions along with new curbs on government investigatory power will help law enforcement prevent terrorists from striking.

"Intense congressional and public scrutiny has not produced a single substantiated claim that the Patriot Act has been misused to violate Americans' civil liberties," said House Judiciary Committee Chairman James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis. "Opponents of the legislation have relied upon exaggeration and hyperbole to distort a demonstrated record of accomplishment and success."

"The president looks forward to signing the bill into law," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

But the debate over the balance between a strong war against terrorists and civil liberties protections is far from over.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is holding hearings on the domestic wiretapping program. Additionally, Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chief author of the Patriot Act renewal, has introduced a new measure "to provide extra protections that better comport with my sensitivity of civil rights."

Despite its passage, the Patriot Act still has staunch congressional opponents who protested it by voting 'no' even on the part of the bill that would add new civil rights protections. During the Senate's final debate last week, Sen Russell Feingold, D-Wis., said he was voting 'no' because the new protections for Americans were so modest they were almost meaningless.

Such objections echoed during the House debate Tuesday.

"I rise in strong opposition to this legislation because it offers only a superficial reform that will have little if any impact on safeguarding our civil liberties," said Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio.

For now, Bush will be signing a package on which members of both chambers of Congress and the president can agree.

The package renews 16 expiring provisions of the original Patriot Act, including one that allows federal officials to obtain "tangible items" like business records, including those from libraries and bookstores, for foreign intelligence and international terrorism investigations.

Other provisions would clarify that foreign intelligence or counterintelligence officers should share information obtained as part of a criminal investigation with counterparts in domestic law enforcement agencies.

Forced by Feingold's filibuster, Congress and the White House have agreed to new curbs on the Patriot Act's powers.

Those restrictions would:

— Give recipients of court-approved subpoenas for information in terrorist investigations the right to challenge a requirement that they refrain from telling anyone.

— Eliminate a requirement that an individual provide the FBI with the name of a lawyer consulted about a National Security Letter, which is a demand for records issued by investigators.

— Clarify that most libraries are not subject to demands in those letters for information about suspected terrorists.

The legislation also takes aim at the distribution and use of methamphetamine by limiting the supply of a key ingredient found in everyday cold and allergy medicines.

Yet another provision is designed to strengthen port security by imposing strict punishments on crew members who impede or mislead law enforcement officers trying to board their ships.

UNC student hits 18 people with car to spread 'will of Allah'

By Adam Eaglin
The Chronicle

DURHAM, N.C. — Mohammed Reza Taheri-azar, a 2005 graduate of the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill who struck several bystanders on campus with his car last week, was officially charged in an Orange County court Monday with 18 felony counts, including nine counts of attempted first-degree murder.

Taheri-azar confessed Friday to driving a Jeep Grand Cherokee through the Pit — a popular gathering place on UNC's campus — and to wounding multiple students and pedestrians.

Although no serious injuries were inflicted, six people were hospitalized and three others were treated at the scene of the incident.

Taheri-azar could face more than 100 years in prison if convicted on all felony counts.

After turning himself in to law enforcement Friday, the defendant told police that the goal of the violent act was to "avenge the deaths or murders of Muslims around the world."

Observers in the the courtroom Monday said Taheri-azar — who was handcuffed and wearing an orange prison uniform — remained calm and composed throughout the hearing.

In court Taheri-azar said he was "thankful for the opportunity to spread the will of Allah" and told Judge Pat DeVine that he wanted to represent himself in the case.

Despite Taheri-azar's decision, DeVine said she would appoint the Public Defender's Office to represent him in order to ensure that he receives a fair trial.

The judge also ruled that the defendant will remain in the custody of Central Prison in Raleigh under a $5.5-million bond.

The UNC Muslim Students Association, which criticized The Daily Tar Heel — the university's student-run newspaper — for publishing a cartoon featuring the Prophet Mohammad last month, publically denounced Taheri-azar's act. MSA officials noted that the defendant was not a member of their organization.

Some students acquainted with Taheri-azar expressed shock that he was responsible for Friday's violence.

"He was certainly the quiet type — very orderly, well put-together, smart," said UNC junior Christina Strauch, who attended the same Charlotte, N.C., high school as the defendant.

"I would not have expected him to be the culprit of such an act at all, even though I didn't know him well," she added.

Despite Taheri-azar's actions and religious references, UNC officials have been reluctant to label the act as terrorism, and their decision came under fire Monday when about 50 protesters gathered on the Chapel Hill campus.

Shortly after the beginning of Taheri-azar's 10:30 a.m. hearing, UNC students started rallying in the Pit near the location of Friday's violence in order to express their disapproval of the university's handling of the incident.

"This was not an anti-Islamic rally," UNC sophomore Tyler Younts, who participated in the rally, wrote in an e-mail. "This was a pro-freedom and anti-terrorism rally."

The protest was organized by senior Kris Wampler, a member of UNC College Republicans, and junior Jillian Bandes, a former DTH columnist who sparked controversy last fall when she wrote a column concerning terrorism, national security and racial profiling.

In addition to College Republicans, the event was also sponsored by Americans for an Informed Democracy and the Foundation for the Defense of Democracies.

"[Administrators] are too afraid that they'll offend Muslims, but they seem to forget the victims," Younts said. "The university has nothing to gain by catering to the apologists of terrorism... The university will look bad to alumni and prospective students if they don't do more to call it what it is — terrorism."

Hugh Hefner rocks on with jazz concert, despite turning 80 years old next month

approach slowly as a sign warns them "Playmates at Play."

But buttonholed briefly at his back door, the man who gave the world fold-out photos of beautiful naked women becomes downright effusive when the topic of jazz is raised.

"It's a combination of music from many, many sources; a combination of Afro and Caribbean and Cuban sounds ... mixed in with particularly American sounds," he offered.

Such music, Hefner added, does much more than entertain people. In its best moments, he said, it can bridge racial and cultural gaps, bringing people of all backgrounds together.

"And I'm in favor of anything that breaks down the walls," said the creator of the swinging, free-love 1960s Playboy philosophy.

Hefner turns 80 on April 9, and almost every one of those years is reflected in a pale, deeply lined face and thinning gray hair that is turning white around the fringes.

But when the band starts to play, he moves to the music. And when the Playboy Jazz Festival's veteran producer, George Wein, breaks into a song, Hefner grins, nods knowingly and sings along.

"I can't believe it — 28 years," he says of the festival that began as a "one-shot deal" in 1979 but proved so popular he decided to hold it the next year. And then the next year and the next year after that.

"When you're having fun, time flies," he adds with a wry smile.

This year's festival will contain a special tribute to New Orleans, which Wein says is particularly important coming in the wake of Hurricane Katrina's devastation of the city where jazz was born.

He hopes performances by such New Orleans native sons as Branford Marsalis and the Preservation Hall Jazz Band will bring attention to efforts to aid musicians still homeless months after the hurricane.

"We have to bring them back to play," Wein says. "We have to get homes for these musicians."

Organizers note that arguably every major jazz figure of his or her time has appeared at the Playboy Jazz Festival, from Count Basie to Benny Goodman, Etta James to Lionel Hampton, Bobby McFerrin to this year's 26-year-old Japanese wunderkind, Hiromi.

When jazz greats Dake and Clarke decided to reteam for their first world tour together in 16 years, Duke says, it was only natural they would make this year's festival one of their first stops.

We want to let people know we're back out there," Duke explains.

At the same time, the festival has branched out over the years to include far more than just traditional jazz.

Producer Wein notes that rocker Costello, for example, will be teaming with New Orleans fusion musician Allen Toussaint this year in a collaboration that was born of a recent benefit appearance on behalf of Katrina victims.

Also represented will be Senegal's Baaba Maal, whose music ranges from traditional African folk to international dance. Latin pianist Eddie Palmieri will lead the Afro-Caribbean Jazz All-Stars.

Such a potpourri represents a natural evolution for the festival, says Hefner, who adds that jazz itself continues to borrow from, and lend to, various musical styles.

"I think music changes, tastes change," he says sipping a Pepsi on ice. "But from the beginning, it doesn't matter what you call it. It's always good music."

Bobby Brown arrested in Mass.; faces charges from 14 years ago

WEBSTER (AP) — Singer Bobby Brown has been arrested for minor motor vehicle violations dating back 14 years.

The 37-year-old entertainer was in town to watch his daughter in a high school cheerleading tournament on Friday night when a police officer conducted a warrant check and discovered the old misdemeanor charges of unlicensed operation of a motor vehicle, and having an uninsured motor vehicle trailer, according to Webster Police Chief Timothy J. Bent. He said a warrant check is "a common thing to do."

Brown was "very cooperative" and was allowed to drive — with his bodyguard — to the police station after the cheerleading event at Bartlett High School, Bent said.

Brown was detained for about one hour, and was released on $40 bond.

"He was very forthright in wanting to clear this up," Bent said. "He probably didn't know he had this."

Brown's attorney, Maurice Bennett, did not immediately return a call to comment.

Brown lives in Alpharetta, Ga., with his wife, singer Whitney Houston. He has two children with Kim Ward of Stoughton.

Brown was sentenced to 90 days in prison in June 2004 for missing three months' worth of child support payments to Ward. That sentence was immediately suspended after Brown made back payments totaling about $15,000.

Brown gained fame as a member of New Edition, and in 1988 had a hit solo album, "Don't Be Cruel."

Useless advice from magazine

Michael Toomey

Cosmopolitan serves as the worldly big sister, wise grandmother and perpetually "en vogue" shopping buddy to its millions of readers. I'm sure feminists would argue for The New York Times, The Economist or something of that ilk, but Cosmopolitan is probably the most widely read publication by females.

OK, well, actually that statement is not the most representative one, because Cosmo does have tentative age parameters to its readership, forming a fairly wide range of what I'll estimate as being 17 to 35. Exceptions will, of course, be found in great numbers, as one of my first girlfriends and I giggled sheepishly at the sex positions at around 14, unfortunately not leading in the direction I would have hoped.

And there are probably a few 50-somethings tanned, orange and crammed into leopard print that still need help with "Snagging the Attention of your Cutie." So it would be safe to say that Cosmo readers are women who are still looking for that special guy and have, for one reason or another, ingested the idea that sex appeal, charades of confidence and charisma and other modes of deception are the best ways to find him.

What's more appropriate right now than a suiting example plucked directly from the source? March '06's issue of Cosmopolitan, featuring the untalented Hilary Duff. On page 62 you'll find the demystifying column, "Guy Spy," which doesn't even make a pretense of covering up its deceitful intentions.

Let's just take a look at the headline of this week's bamboozlement of us poor saps, "Sly Moves That Hook Him." The important words to zero in on are "sly" and "hook," which have countless synonyms that revolve around dishonesty and trickery, but this is more than just a dubiously worded title, a fluke, because the content is exactly parallel to the idea projected by the headline. "Next time you're on a date, employ these sneaky strategies to ensure your new guy's helplessly attracted to you."

In addition to playing hard-to-get ("Make him Wonder") and feigning interest in the guy's social life ("Charm his Sidekicks"), I liked how the writer suggests to "Stroke his Ego...a little." The key to this is to "nail that intrigued-yet-not-yet-won allure." Again, look at the phrasing of this, with a focus on the word "nail."

The implication of suggestions like these is that right façade can be donned to produce the right effect. To "nail" that coy allure they're talking about, you're supposed to affect it, get it down, as if relating to the opposite sex was similar to finally getting a grip on that tricky pre-calc equation.

They don't take into consideration how you actually feel or the type of personality you have, and again, I don't believe this omission was a simple technicality. The word choice is consistent enough to deliver the message that finding romance is a matter of laying the right traps, having the right lines and manipulating the right responses.

I'm aware of the defense that could be utilized against my claim: The one that says it's to a reader's discretion how she uses the advice that she personally has to take into account her feelings. True. However, that perspective fails to acknowledge the overwhelming consistency in Cosmo's verbiage. Where in dealing with men, "moves, tricks, tactics, strategies, maneuvers and ploys" are the most used words describing suggested interactions.

In conjunction with advice that intimates the standard of the conniving temptress, is a depressing reductionism, boiling the nature of human nature down to useful facts, implements of the thematic manipulation. This month's glaring example is the featured article that explains, "What Sex is Like for Him." People love having sex, or in some cases pretend to, so at face value, this might be useful insight to have, but the article is so ill-conceived I'd imagine it read as a major disappointment to many.

It broke a man's sexual experience down by neurochemical functions and peppered each stage with the hogwash of several "sex experts" and the likely fabricated reiterations of "guys." I would describe the helpfulness of the article with this analogy, "knowing how the motor of a car works won't help you drive any better." So, in question is the efficacy of knowing the ins and outs of recent university findings concerning the psychology, physiology and physicality of men. Their only practical use I can see is in complicating susceptible readers' views of relationships, convincing way too many ladies that the key to social behavior is the inside scoop of how to manipulate helpless facts.

In conjunction with advice that intimates the standard conniving temptress, is a depressing reductionism, boiling the nature of human nature down to useful facts, implements of the thematic manipulation. This month's glaring example is the featured article that explains, "What Sex is Like for Him."

Cosmopolitan lays out a really unfortunate template for its readers, myriad in numbers, to conform into an impersonal, clueless way of life. While I blame Cosmo in large part for the ridiculous boot trend, which reanimated the atrocious Uggs and cursed us with the site of way too many knee high shoes, I think that's probably its most benign affliction.

The confusion surrounding the opposite sex has been here since the dawn of time and will probably stick around for the after party, but the Cosmo solution, which is ridiculous simply in its preposition alone, is really detrimental to an already perplexing phenomenon. It very subtly conveys that there's this effervescent, bubbling standard of a woman you can become physically, mentally and sexually, and that she's the one that guys want to be with.

I'm fearful that way too many people are taking their dating tips and lovemaking tactics to heart, providing a role to be played. "Cosmopolitan" devotees are losing themselves in what is a monthly installment of charades, and I wouldn't imagine the BoHo fashion ideas and Brad and Angelina dirt to be worth that price.

Hail to the comedic chief

Paige Cram

On Facebook.com, a Website started specifically for college students, there are three groups regarding Jon Stewart. "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart," for the serious fans, has almost 200 members. Then there's the "I Would Let Jon Stewart Do My Girlfriend Because He's That Cool" club, with about 10 males who are apparently willing to make the ultimate sacrifice to prove their dedication.

The last group, "Jon Stewart is My President," has almost 500 members in the UMass chapter alone, of which I am proud to say that I am number 492. The tagline for the group is "Who else can we trust?" and it's sad to say, but there is an entire generation of non-voting 18 to 24-year-olds who feel exactly that way.

Stewart's popularity has grown steadily over the past few years. First he got a billboard in Times Square and most recently, he had the honor of hosting one of the highest rated awards shows on television. His appearance Sunday marked more than just a successful night at the Oscars; it marked another big jump in the status of the comedian/actor/author.

At first, the sarcastic wit of the New York native was not a huge hit out in Hollywood. The mocking style we have all grown to love fell flat with the stars of the silver screen. But as Stewart relaxed, so did his audience and by the end of the night, he had achieved bi-coastal success.

Although he's made his career by cracking jokes, the funny man has a serious side, too. His appearance on "Crossfire" last October traveled the net so fast after its airing that by the end of the next day, everyone knew what had taken place. Not only did Stewart call host Tucker Carlson "a dick" but he also accused the CNN show of being "disingenuous ... what you do is not honest. What you do is partisan hackery," Stewart said. The show was cancelled less than three months later.

Just as Stewart uses his television persona to criticize our government officials, he uses his real life popularity to criticize the media which he repeatedly says is failing in its responsibility to the American public.

The more we are ignored, the more apathetic we become. It's a vicious cycle, and in a political society that doesn't seem to know we exist, it's no wonder we feel that our only place to turn is Comedy Central. At least there, we can find a "news source" catered to us.

And he's absolutely right.

There's a reason the 18 to 24-year-old population doesn't vote, and it's stated simply enough right there on Facebook. "Who can we trust?" It's a phrase that speaks volumes.

We are smart enough to know that our government and our media are only telling us what they want us to know, but helpless to do anything about it because our voting record leaves us without a political voice. The things we care about – higher education, employment opportunities and the deficit that we will be paying for – get little attention because our distrust does not compel us to the polls. The more we are ignored, the more apathetic we become. It's a vicious cycle, and in a political society that doesn't seem to know we exist, it's no wonder we feel that our only place to turn is Comedy Central. At least there, we can find a "news source" catered to us.

In the summer of 2004, amidst the conventions and polls leading up to the election, I saw a taping of the "Daily Show" in New York City. The studio is humble and so are the people who work there, including the host. Before the cameras started rolling, he chatted with the audience and one phrase flashed briefly through my impressionable young mind: Jon Stewart for president.

At the time, it seemed foolish, unimaginable, but in the year and a half since, the idea has become ever so slightly more realistic. He's a man who's honest, intelligent, passionate and, well, hilarious, and with his appearance at the Oscars, he's proven his ability to handle pressure and large audiences. What more can America ask for?

There are plenty of arguments against him for sure. He is, after all, a man with, albeit a lot of political knowledge, but not much experience, but come on: Can anyone say Ronald Reagan, or Arnold Schwarzenegger for that matter?

I'm sure people have joked with Stewart about running for president, but on behalf of all the politically disenchanted youth, I'd like to let him know that should he ever take the suggestion seriously ... he's got our support. Stewart in 2012.

Civil wars are all similar

Andrew Freeman

The conflict progressed in stages. First, the sides separated formally, creating a legal division that reflected what existed in people's minds for years. Then, the sides became increasingly hostile towards one another, and began military preparations. Arms and forts were seized by one side, and tensions escalated to a fever pitch. On April 12, 1861, our Civil War began in earnest when Confederate forces opened fire on the Federal garrison of Fort Sumpter. Over the next four years, hundreds of thousands of Americans died as a result of the conflict.

The American experience in the Civil War was tragic and destructive, but some positive results have come from it. Slavery ended and the south was prevented from seceding. For the brief period of reconstruction, blacks enjoyed the rights to vote and hold office. However, by 1877, African-Americans were deprived of these rights and forced back into economic and legal degradation.

Nearly every country has experienced civil war to some degree, and they have become especially bloody occurrences, particularly in this century. The U.S. Civil War claimed over 500,000 soldiers' lives, according to Defense Department data. Fighting in the Democratic Republic of Congo in Central Africa resulted in the deaths of 3.3 million between 1998 and 2002, according to the BBC. Over the course of 100 days in Rwanda in 1994, Hutu militiamen slaughtered 800,000 people under cover of the civil war.

There is nothing civil about domestic warfare, if ever there was. In this century, the enterprise has grown even more brutal, with new weapons facilitating slaughter and nationalist fanaticism feeding conflict. At the very end of the Civil War, the commander of the Confederate States Army, Robert E. Lee, chose not to turn to guerrilla warfare, preferring surrender so that the nation could move on. Today, most commanders would fight to the death rather than surrender.

Today, Iraq faces civil war. Sectarian violence, between Arabs and Kurds and between Shiite and Sunni Muslims, has increased. Insurgent attacks provoke retaliation by militias and the police force, intensifying the cycle of violence. Between 28,000 and 32,270 Iraqis are estimated casualties of attacks by insurgents, terrorists and the coalition forces since the beginning of the war according to iraqbodycount.net.

Two major events illustrate the new course of the conflict – the Al-Askariya Mosque bombing, and the revelations of Shiite death squads. On Wed., Feb. 22 of this year, Sunni insurgents bombed the Al-Askariya Mosque, one of the holiest sites for Shiites, destroying its golden dome and much of the structure. This attack provoked intense anger, and Shiite militia retaliated the same day by attacking 27 Sunni mosques in Baghdad and killing 6 Sunnis, as reported by CNN. The Washington Post reported five days later that 1,300 Iraqis had died in Baghdad as a result of this violence.

If we crack down on the Iraqi government's persecution of Sunnis, we risk alienating the other groups. If we ignore the persecution, Sunnis will be driven further into rebellion.

Shiite retaliation against Sunni terrorism has taken another form. Shiite militiamen have infiltrated the Iraqi police and armed forces and have used this power to carry out reprisals against Sunnis. A Los Angeles Times article from Nov. 29, 2005 quoted a U.S. military officer as declaring that 90 percent of 35,000 police officers in northeast Bagdad were members of the Al-Mahdi army, an anti-American Shiite militia. A U.S. military raid that same month found a detention center run by the Iraqi Interior Ministry, where Shiite militiamen had tortured 18 men to death, according to inmates.

Our military is in the middle of this violence, and it is in a very bad position. The government is dominated by Shiite Arabs and Kurds, while the insurgency is largely Sunni. If we crack down on the Iraqi government's persecution of Sunnis, we risk alienating the other groups. If we ignore the persecution, Sunnis will be driven further into rebellion.

The days of criticizing the president for mishandling the war, in its run up or execution, have passed. What matters most is the future. I have not completely surrendered hope that the fighting may be resolved, but the potential for a U.S. role in the enterprise seems highly diminished.

Some argue that our continued presence will prevent a worse outbreak of violence, but our troops are already too few to contain the current violence, and we have little to no legitimacy in the eyes of Iraqis. We are more likely to get caught in the crossfire than to resolve the conflict.

As terrible as it was, the U.S. Civil War crushed the rebellion of the South, and forged a new national unity. It is possible that only an atrocious conflict will lead the warring parties to realize the value of cooperation and peace. I believe that America can do nothing more to further such values, and that our soldiers should be withdrawn before any more die for this mistake.

TV takes hit from complaints

John Gruenenfelder

Growing up, I remember with fondness the Saturday early morning cartoons. One of the defining features of many of those cartoons was violence. "Cartoony" violence, but still violence nonetheless. At the forefront of those violent escapades was the hour long block of "Looney Tunes." Ah, good times. At least, they were good times. One thing that I and my parents did not have to contend with was overzealous watchdog groups.

Groups that are concerned about some injustice, correct or otherwise, will always be around. When they begin to exert undue influence however, it's best to take notice lest they sway opinion or government in the wrong direction. Such is the case with the Parents Television Council. You may recall them from when they led the charge in the aftermath of the Super Bowl "wardrobe malfunction."

Unfortunately, with even just a small amount of media attention, the group grows larger. Evidence of this is both stark and disturbing. A year ago, the magazine Mediaweek reported that fully 99.8 percent of the 240,000 complaints that the Federal Communications Commission received in 2003 were from the Parents Television Council.

It becomes even worse when you realize that the PTC is primarily responsible for the staggering 65,000 percent increase in the number of complaints versus the number in 2001 (about 350 complaints). Numbers like those rise far above worrisome and straight into frightening.

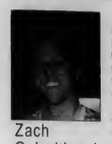
It's the fact that people see numbers such as those and become worried that gives organizations like the PTC power. When you see them without context you might be inclined to think that television had gone to hell in a hand basket, and right quick, too. But when you add in a little more information, such as the fact that numbers were amazingly lower only two years prior, your opinion might change. Most people are rational enough to understand that television cannot complete that large a downward spiral in just two years.

Sadly, it is not rational people who make these decisions. The complaints are sent to the FCC and it is the FCC who must deal with them. For the most part, the FCC has done a reasonable job at responding to these complaints under past chairman Michael Powell and current chairman Kevin Martin, both occupying one of the Republican seats on the commission. The problem for them is that when a quarter million complaints land in your office, action is usually required. As a political appointee, you won't last long if your response, however correct, is to tell some hyperactive pressure group to take a hike.

And so, the mighty hand of the FCC came down repeatedly. A total of $8 million in fines were proposed in 2003, though not all were actually handed out. Oddly, there were no fines in 2004, but the FCC just finished handing out a fresh set for the past year. The lack of fines in 2004 may have more to do with the giant backlog of complaints caused by the PTC's deluge. All told, however, FCC fines are not that big a concern to the major networks, but it does force them into making changes.

The new PTC led fight against indecency is having real effects on television and radio. Already, many events, including last Sunday's Academy Awards ceremony, are being tape-delayed by 15 seconds so that any unexpected gaffe or bit of profanity can be safely edited away. Howard Stern has been chased completely off traditional radio, although his fight with the FCC goes back quite a long time.

The new PTC led fight against indecency is having real effects on television and radio. Already, many events, including Sunday's Academy Awards ceremony, are being tape-delayed by 15 seconds so that any unexpected gaffe or bit of profanity can be safely edited away.



The PTC isn't content to rest on its laurels. This past week they published a new study of children's television programming. They claim that children's programming is actually more violent than that which adults view in prime time.

The truth is that television, even children's television, will occasionally go too far. People don't have to calmly accept it either. You can even complain to the FCC, but when a single small group lobbies so furiously they completely drown out the views of all other citizens there is a real problem. Unless the problem is dealt with, the PTC will continue to enforce what they view as correct and decent, regardless of what anybody else believes.

Remember that this is censorship. Some forms we can all agree on, some we can't. I don't think any of us, save for the PTC, want to see a return to the Brady Bunch Variety Hour. If the PTC's crusade has demonstrated anything, it's that the FCC is goaded into action by letters. So I suggest that everybody take a few minutes to write in to the FCC and let them know that television is doing just fine. Only then will the children truly be safe.

French reprisal is two-faced

Zach Oelschlegel

In the wake of the Jyllands-Posten cartoon scandal, Western Europe, while maintaining that tolerance is one of its most important characteristics, has for the most part apologized for reprinting the cartoons and the offense they have caused to Muslims around the world. Newspapers are continuing to understand how a right to print what you want under free speech doesn't make it the best idea to do so.

Yet, Europeans aren't backing down from maintaining their right to freedom of the press, as evidenced by European Commission head Jose Manuel Barasso, who declared "freedom of speech is not up for negotiation." It's too bad multiple European states don't actually own up to this adage.

France, the home of the paper which reprinted the Danish cartoon mess after the Soir reprinted the cartoons, also has a law that states religious symbols aren't allowed in schools. It is illegal to proselytize to another while on public grounds, praying is illegal in schools and even Muslim women are not allowed to wear headscarves in schools.

In 1989, two girls were expelled from a French school for wearing headscarves, leading the French Ministry of Education to inquire a legal consult, the Conseil d'Etat, on the matter. The Conseil answered that the government "should not allow students to sport signs of religious affiliation that, due to their nature ... would constitute an act of pressure, provocation, proselytism or propaganda," despite these symbols being an act of free expression.

In other words, don't step on someone's toes because they might be offended. France, while allowing its newspapers to print whatever they want regarding religion of any sense, however offensive it may be, does not allow its own citizens to bring their spiritual life with them when school is in. This is defended under the law of laicite, which legally separates church and state activities.

This makes little sense considering French schoolchildren are not representatives or employees of the state, so what they are doing should be their own right as it bears no influence on state policy. By doing this, France is actually promoting a new religion of their own, a belief in nothing, by suppressing those who believe in something.

France, while allowing its newspapers to print whatever they want regarding religion of any sense, however offensive it may be, does not allow its own citizens to bring their spiritual life with them when school is in.

Much worse, France is forcing people to hold inside what often turns out to be far more important to them than math, science and languages whenever they enter a public sector.

Effectively, France is lowering itself, to some extent, to that of many countries in the Middle East, where Islam can be the official state religion, and proselytizing to someone about a different religion is illegal, sometimes under penalty of death. The very thing the French are railing against when reprinting the cartoons happens the next day at school, when children who wear headscarves or crosses around their necks are told to remove them or be removed.

France is not unique in this restraint on free speech. Free speech means the right to idiocy, racism and a whole slew of faux pas (although not threats), which other countries reject in terms of hate speech, or disbelief in the obvious, as David Irving's recent imprisonment in Austria over denying the Holocaust displays.

More worrisome, however, may be the trek the Netherlands have begun to take. The Dutch have long since been looked at by the rest of Europe as a model society, often as a ringleader for change. According to msnbc.com, the city of Rotterdam recently has made a code of conduct requiring people to speak Dutch when in public, which effectively discriminates against immigrants. The Dutch have also passed a law banning women from wearing burqas in public. It remains to be seen whether other countries will follow the Dutch lead and make similar laws.

The hypocrisy of the matter is stunning, to say the least. Jailing someone because you don't like what he says has been a tactic of many dictatorships of the past. Effectively, these governments, making laws against someone expressing themselves, are telling their citizens how to think. In the same ways not believing in Allah and Islam is a crime in the Middle East, displaying your belief in something is a crime in France and Holland.

The Soir and others reprinting those cartoons was an expression of free speech, which lampooned many of the medieval mentalities Muslims in the Middle East have. The governments in the area will not bow to pressure from countries asking to curb what they term hate speech. Yet, what leg do these countries have to stand on using this defense when they deny the rights of their citizens to display their most important values?

N.E. weather ever-changing

Rebecca Paskievich

Last week it was beyond cold outside. Walking to class at one point, I honestly thought my face had congealed into a thin sheet of ice. I was apprehensive to smile for fear that my frozen film would shatter. Students raced to class, head down, attempting to avert the chilly gusts. Girls trotted along the paths in their Uggs and sweatpants, hoping that being comfortable while cold could make the trip more bearable ... I'm guessing not.

Tears formed as people endured the bitter pinch of the atmosphere and clouds of chilled air escaped with every breath. Ears turned the brightest crimson imaginable and lips became so chapped that, as disgusting as it sounds, while people talked, bits of flaky lip drifted to the ground.

Although most students hustled to and from class in hoodies and their North Face jackets, there was the inevitable screwball wearing shorts and flip-flops strolling into Bartlett. Each time I witnessed one of these anti-bundle-uppers, the blood in my veins froze for a millisecond, just thinking about the self-induced arctic torture.

Lately, I've heard complaints and pleas for warm weather. We have to understand that we actually have had a mild winter. For those of you who grew up in New England, you recognize that the amount of snow fall we have endured thus far is not a lot, by any means. Yes, we've had some frigid mornings, but we also had quite a few days when the mercury rose into the 40s.

The winter season, in general, is not all that bad. I hear students babbling about how they wished they lived in Florida or California, somewhere where it's always warm. Sure, it would be nice to stow away your snowsuit for eternity, but honestly, you would get bored.

Each time I witnessed one of these anti-bundle-uppers, the blood in my veins froze for a millisecond, just thinking about the self induced arctic torture.

Here in New England, we take advantage of the fact that we get to experience four unique seasons. In the fall, we watch leaves salsa along the sidewalk with each crisp gust of autumn air; in the winter, although we have to shiver and sniff incessantly, we can sled, ice skate or simply stay inside with a cup of cocoa watching a movie; spring is a revolution of green, when life explodes into a frenzied excitement for warm weather and longer days. Summer is the grand finale of the year when days are spent at the beach, our diets consist of ice cream and hot dogs and we soak up firework displays and humid nights under the stars.

With Spring Break around the corner, students are getting antsy for a feel of the sun. Relief from the cold may be coming this weekend with temperatures reaching 60 if all goes well. This tease of springtime may spur a burst of enthusiasm. (The geese at the Campus Pond will surely need to be admitted into a bird mental institution for the constant back and forth from a solid surface to defrosting waters.)

Embrace the warm temperatures, but know that days of chattering teeth will, inevitably, return to campus. This past season has proved the common saying about New England true: "If you don't like the weather, wait five minutes."

Military research at UMass?

Justin Jackson

Unless you have a family member or friend patrolling a highway between Baghdad and Fallujah, the war may seem a bit abstract. Even with the recent death of Ayman Taha, a doctoral candidate from the UMass economics department killed in Iraq on New Year's Eve, or the kidnapping of UMass alumna Jill Carroll, the war might not seem relevant to you on a daily basis.

The results of three years of invasion and occupation – $245 billion spent, 2,299 U.S. soldiers killed and almost 17,000 wounded, and at least 100,000 Iraqis killed – seem abstract and foreign to our daily experience.

In reality, however, the war is being fought in our ivory towers – including UMass Amherst.

The presence of Marine Corps and Army recruiters in the Campus Center concourse, plying the benefits of enlistment money for college and job training without mention of killing or dying on an Iraqi highway, or all of the commotion in the Collegian's columns about our very own FBI man in the UMass police ferreting out student terrorists, may have made you aware of this fact already. Perhaps less obvious to you is the military research conducted in campus laboratories and offices.

Since World War II, scientists in the American academy have played a crucial role in the military research complex. Faculty and their graduate students have experimented on everything from the atomic bomb to lasers to complex helicopter gun targeting systems in the hallowed halls of academe. UMass may not be a center of military funded research like the University of California or MIT, but like many large public universities, it does contribute its fair share of research to the Department of Defense.

According to the UMass office of the Vice Provost for Research, in fiscal year 2005 a total of 51 research grants proposed by UMass faculty and researchers were awarded, a total of nearly $10 million from various branches of the Department of Defense. This may not seem like much money, but it represents about nine percent of all research funds received in 2005 by UMass researchers from all sponsors, both federal and private.

The Air Force, Army, Defense Advanced Research Project Agency, the Defense Logistics Agency, the Naval Air Warfare Center, the Office of Naval Research, the Space War Systems Center in San Diego and the National Security Agency all contributed research funds. Departments which received these funds are mostly in the sciences, including the chemistry, computer science, electrical and computer engineering, polymer science and engineering, mathematics and statistics, mechanical and industrial engineering and microbiology departments. Yet departments in the humanities or the professions also received military funding, including environmental health sciences, finance and operation management, psychology, small business development center – even the exercise sciences department.

Whatever the title, you can be sure that the Pentagon is not motivated to award billions in research funds to university scientists from some pure interest in advancing our knowledge of inner workings of the natural world.

Undoubtedly, much of this research is basic scientific research. In other words, this is highly theoretical and experimental research, not applied research where scientists are testing or fine tuning weapons systems. But given the arcane scientific titles of these projects, such as "Novel Conducting Polymer Composite and Hybrid Electrodes Based Supercapacitor Electrical Power Sources Development through Application," (a $121,954 grant for electrical and computer engineering faculty Seshu B. Desu), how can the layman be sure?

Whatever the title, you can be sure that the Pentagon is not motivated to award billions in research funds to university scientists from some pure interest in advancing our knowledge of the inner workings of the natural world. Whatever the ultimate result of any particular research project, academic military research enables our government, with the largest and most powerful military in world history, to maintain and expand its imperial presence across the globe – with very real and devastating effects on our soldiers who die for an unnecessary cause, on the civilians whose nations we occupy and on our democratic principles as a republic.

Every student, staff member and faculty member at UMass should know by now that the Bush administration's invasion and occupation was an illegal act of aggression based on lies, sanctified by a pusillanimous Congress, and that the Bush administration, under the rubric of the "War on Terror," has violated our civil liberties and constitutional rights through the U.S.A. Patriot Act and the violation of domestic laws against torture and spying.

With this knowledge comes a moral and political choice. You can insist that the University of Massachusetts honor its primary responsibility of furthering knowledge and learning by severing its relationships to the illegal and morally corrupt policies and practices of the federal government – or you can run from dorm room or office to classes and back again, comforted that the war is an abstraction, fought by far away people in far away places.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

WHEN PEOPLE DON'T THINK STRAIGHT

I feel I have to respond to Bret Devereaux's editorial "Historical relativity." First of all, let me say that it's truly refreshing to see a young person these days espousing the age old philosophy "might makes right," but seriously, I was disturbed by this editorial and found it crude and ignorant. OK, let me address the two main points that struck me in the article.

First of all, Devereaux addresses the position of some people, who are unspecified, that the Iraq war is about revenge. He then describes several conflicts from Ye Bad Olde Days, including that of Hannibal's son against Rome, and Rome's war of revenge against Carthage. They both sound pretty harsh, and include the full scale pillaging of cities and the possible salting of the earth in the case of Carthage. Devereaux then delivers the smug punch line, "Suddenly many modern conflicts don't seem quite so vicious. Perspective." Can he really be saying that war has become more civilized and less brutal?

Now, I hate to be insensitive, but it seems to me that this must be a serious case of HUA syndrome. To avoid vulgarity, let me just say that the first two letters of this terrible condition stand for "head up."

Perhaps Mr. Devereaux has never heard of Agent Orange, an herbicide used by the United States during the Vietnam War to reduce cover for the Vietnamese by killing jungle vegetation. This chemical, which used the poison dioxin, is still causing our veterans health problems and is well established as the cause for many birth defects in Vietnam that are still occurring today. At least they didn't salt the earth.

Or white phosphorous, an incendiary weapon that was protested during the Vietnam War, and is now being used again against insurgents in Iraq. When munitions containing white phosphorous explode, chunks and particles rain down on the people targeted, and yes, contrary to the Pentagon's original story, they finally admitted that the substance is being used on enemy personnel.

The chunks won't stop burning until the chemical is completely burned or deprived of oxygen. As a result, when a chunk lands on a person's clothes or skin, it can easily burn right down to the bone causing excruciating pain and sometimes death due to the chemicals absorbed into the body which can cause multiple organ failure.

I could go on, so please don't try to tell people that war is somehow nicer than it used to be. The point is war has always been brutal and always will be: that's simply its nature.

Secondly, Devereaux addresses the complaints of those mealy mouthed hippies and commies that America is becoming more and more imperialistic. Next he goes on to eloquently argue the case for the game of imperialism. His main selling point is that it has worked to the advantage of most states in history that have played it, and those states which declined to pursue empire in the past were doomed to become pawns of the more powerful nations.

At the risk of sounding crass, one could also make a similar argument for slavery. After all, slavery worked to the advantage of those who owned slaves. In fact, America would not be the superpower it is today if its economy had not been built on free, coerced labor.

The end of slavery in America is an example of how true human progress works. Fighting to abolish slavery was only in the moral and human interests of free Americans, not their economic or national self-interest. It's crazy to assume that human civilization can only go forward according to the paradigms and attitudes of people who have lived earlier in an often vicious and barbaric world. For humanity to progress and become more human, the opportunistic precedents of the past must be abandoned and new ways of living adopted.

Besides these obvious objections to imperialism, Devereaux's very premise that it works out well for those who play the imperial game is false. It only works to augment an empire's power and wealth while the empire is growing and thriving, and no empire can stay strong indefinitely. Rome was sacked because its imperial policies made it so many enemies, and today the United States is alienating most of the world with its violent, arrogant behavior.

To say that a historical injustice is acceptable to repeat by virtue of its having been beneficial to those who perpetrated it in the past is an extremely dangerous attitude to take, and if people continue to buy it, it will cause even more damage to the world and to humanity.

STOP PROSECUTING DOCTORS AND PATIENTS

The contemptible decision on Monday by lawmakers in South Dakota gave me pause and then sheer outrage at an illegal attempt to subvert a woman's Constitutional right for reproductive choice. It also adds to our culture of persecuting doctors for politically disagreeable choices, and this is blatantly wrong.

Our founding fathers saw how dangerous it was to legalize morality, which is one of the main reasons why we have a Bill of Rights, and specifically the First Amendment, which guarantees a clear separation between church and state, and South Dakota has trampled on this in the name of defending the defenseless.

The governor of that backward state, Mike Rounds even said, "In the history of the world, a civilization is how well people treat the most vulnerable and most helpless in their society."

By excluding victims of incest and rape from getting abortions, South Dakota shows us its hypocrisy, and certainly the federal government has shown that it isn't civilized by locking up the terminally ill and the severely sick just because they think they have a right to survive by smoking marijuana to alleviate their symptoms and to help them prolong their quality of life.

The law has no business making vulnerable cancer patients into criminals, which is why 12 states in this country have approved laws to make cannabis available medicinally, and this ought to be applauded instead of reviled by an uncaring and know-it-all federal government, which continues to prosecute doctors and patients in states that have allowed the medical use of a beneficial plant.

Decent people should not let this abominable action by South Dakota go unpunished. The only way to guarantee that no other state ever tries to make an end run around our Constitutional rights is to hit it where it hurts: the purse strings. I advocate a total boycott on tourism in South Dakota, and a general boycott on corporations who have offices in South Dakota.

If enough people do this, the economy of the state will suffer, and the state will have no choice but to rescind their illegal maneuver, and the far right troglodytes, who dare propel our civil rights back into the 1950s (which despite a recent editorial in the Collegian, were not carefree and wonderful, but repressive and xenophobic) will be held in check by the majority of Americans.

Tell your friends to boycott South Dakota until that state is brought into compliance with Roe v. Wade. Who knows, maybe our parents might see college students giving a damn about politics for once, and we can see that our voices can be heard, just like those of the counterculture in the 1960s.

Doctors should never fear being put in prison for doing their job, or for prescribing a legitimate alternative medication that is hated by special interest groups and religious fundamentalists. These are your Constitutional rights at stake folks, and we cannot be passive when it comes to matters like these.

The Supreme Court may do its job and strike down this abomination, but I wouldn't count on it. Only with our actions may the evils of religious fundamentalists be held accountable, and the Republic's laws will truly be just.

Dana Reeve, heroic widow of fallen 'Superman' star, dies

By Jim Fitzgerald
Associated Press Writer

WHITE PLAINS, N.Y. (AP) - Dana Reeve, who won worldwide admiration for her devotion to her "Superman" husband, Christopher Reeve, through his decade of near-total paralysis, has died of lung cancer at the age of 44.

Reeve, a singer-actress who gave up some of her own career to be one of the nation's best-known caregivers, died late Monday at Memorial Sloan-Kettering Medical Center, said Kathy Lewis, president of the Christopher Reeve Foundation.

Reeve had succeeded her husband as chair of the foundation, which funded research into spinal-cord paralysis cures. She announced in August that, while she wasn't a smoker, she had been diagnosed with lung cancer.

Lewis visited Reeve in the hospital Friday and said Reeve was "tired but with her typical sense of humor and smile, always trying to make other people feel good, her characteristic personality."

"She was a woman with an incredible heart who really put herself out there to help people with disabilities and especially those who are caregivers — something she knew a lot about," Lewis said.

Four months ago, at a fundraising gala for the foundation, Reeve looked healthy in a long, formal gown and said she was responding well to treatment and her tumor was shrinking.

"I'm beating the odds and defying every statistic the doctors can throw at me," Reeve said then. "My prognosis looks better all the time."

Asked how she kept her spirits up, Reeve said she "had a great model."

"I was married to a man who never gave up," she said.

She was still looking well on Jan. 13, when she sang Carole King's "Now and Forever" at Madison Square Garden during the retirement ceremony for Mark Messier's New York Rangers jersey.

"Despite the adversity that she faced, Dana bravely met these challenges and was always an extremely devoted wife, mother and advocate," former President Clinton and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton said in a statement Tuesday.

They described Reeve as "a model of tenacity and grace" and an "inspiration to us."

Sen. Diane Feinstein, D-Calif., said of Reeve: "I thought that after everything that she had gone through with Chris that she would have time to smell the flowers and be in the sun. But apparently that was not meant to be."

Christopher Reeve, star of Hollywood's "Superman" movies, died Oct. 10, 2004. After a horse-riding accident paralyzed him in 1995, he became an activist for spinal cord research.

Dana Reeve was a constant companion and supporter of her husband during his long ordeal and his work for a cure for spinal cord injuries. The couple had a 13-year-old son, Will, and Dana Reeve had two grown stepchildren, Matthew and Alexandra.

Reeve, who lived in Pound Ridge, had appeared on Broadway, off-Broadway and regional stages and on the TV shows "Law & Order," "Oz," and "All My Children."

She was performing in the Broadway-bound play "Brooklyn Boy" in California when she had to rush home to reach her husband's bedside before he died. She gave up the role for the New York run.

A month after she was widowed, before her own diagnosis, she told The Associated Press, "I definitely will be getting back to acting. ... I am an actress and I do have to make a living."

Reeve also was on the board of the Williamstown Theatre Festival in Massachusetts, where she met Christopher Reeve doing summer theater, and the Shakespeare Theatre of New Jersey.

A year ago, she won a Mother of the Year award from the American Cancer Society. A society vice president, Dr. Michael Thun, said Reeve "has shown strength and courage in the face of tremendous adversity." Doctors say 1 in 5 women diagnosed with the disease never lit a cigarette.

In addition to her son and stepchildren, she is survived by her father, Dr. Charles Morosini, and sisters Deborah Morosini and Adrienne Morosini Heilman.

No funeral plans were announced. The family said donations could be made in Dana Reeve's memory to the Christopher Reeve Foundation in Short Hills, N.J.

'Flutist' Galway forgoes the glitz and glam of a royal musical career

By Rich Copley
Knight Ridder Newspapers

You address him as "Sir" James Galway, he plays golden flutes and has worked with most major classical and pop artists of the last half-century.

But the man on the other end of the phone is far from highfalutin.

His Irish brogue, matter-of-fact style and frequent belly laughs make him seem more like someone you'd find in a pub tipping back a pint of Guinness than the world's most famous flutist (not flautist, Galway insists).

On his rigorous practice schedule: "Getting in shape is a question of getting the muscles going. You don't just pick up the flute and go charging through a piece. You slowly limber up, and when you've done that, it focuses you in on what's important about the flute: good time, good intonation, good attack. And then you're ready to play your scales."

On performing with his wife and fellow flutist, Lady Jeanne Galway: "We have a sort of 24-hour-a-day relationship, which we've had the last 23 years. I like to be with her and do things together. Years ago, we used to do a lot of cooking together. Now, we have someone who does the cooking, but the other night, the cook had the night off, and Jeanne and I got down to cooking. We cooked an apple crumble. She's the better cook. I do all the preparing."

On getting young people into classical music: "People have been asking this since Bach, because classical music is a rather special thing. Unless you're coming from an education or a family that is into it, you're not going to get into it because you have to understand it a little bit.

You can't expect a kid to come in and listen to a string quartet like (Schubert's) A minor quartet and expect him to think it's good just because we know it's good, just because we understand what's good about it, because we understand the structure of it and what the guys that are playing it put into getting it right."

On whether he feels like an ambassador for classical music when playing for pop stars like Elton John or Eric Clapton: "When you're doing that sort of music, it has nothing to do with classical music. People seem to think I'm an ambassador, and that's fine. I mean, I would love it if I could get every kid to listen to (Mozart's) 'Eine Kleine Nachtmusik' or Beethoven's Fifth Symphony once. It would be a great thing."

On his sense of humor, and whether he was a class clown: "No, but you should meet my brother. We had some really funny kids in my class. You would not believe it. But I think when you grow up in a poor community, people have a better sense of humor. I What makes us laugh is we've grown up in the street where everybody knows everybody and the door's always open, ... and as you go through life, you maintain a sense of fun."

James Galway, famous flautist, receives praise for his songs, but insists that he is still an average guy.

These boys' lives: the memoirs of three homosexual writers

By Michael Upchurch
The Seattle Times

Gay lifestyle. The phrase is a flashpoint in the American cultural wars. But what does it mean?

The most accurate description I ever saw of it was on a placard carried by a pleasant-looking gentleman in the Pride Parade on Capitol Hill some years ago. It read: "My Gay Lifestyle: Eat. Sleep. Go to Work. Pay Taxes."

Three new memoirs make it plain there's not much agreement on what a gay lifestyle is, or should be. While there aren't any answers here, there are two terrific books, Bernard Cooper's "The Bill from My Father" (Simon & Schuster, 240 pp., $24) and Bruce Benderson's "The Romanian: Story of an Obsession" (Tarcher/Penguin, 401 pp., $16.95).

There's also one worthy effort, Kenji Yoshino's "Covering: The Hidden Assault on Our Civil Rights" (Random House, 282 pp., $24.95), which contains a strong memoir element.

Cooper is a memoirist in the Tobias Wolff vein, and his new book is a rueful, self-effacing, yet dazzlingly precise affair, bringing Cooper's father, a retired Los Angeles divorce lawyer, to full preposterous life.

Always antagonistic, Edward Samuel Cooper in his final years became downright impossible. Bernard's mother and three older brothers had all died by the time Ed was 83, and it was up to Bernard alone (and a live-in nurse who promptly became Ed's lover) to handle him. Luckily, Bernard could count on his partner Brian, a psychotherapist, for delightfully common-sense backup.

"I look," says Brian, after one father-son argument, "if the reason the two of you aren't speaking doesn't make sense, then the reason you contact him again doesn't have to make sense, either. If nothing makes sense, act accordingly."

Here we're in familiar territory where one difficult family figure is exhausting the patience and resources of all those around him. Indeed, it's his father, and not his "gay lifestyle," that is the most volatile element in Bernard's life.

As Ed slips into dementia and starts filing lawsuit after bankrupting lawsuit against his doctor, the phone company and even the widows of his dead sons (seven suits each, over "loans," including birthday checks, that haven't been reimbursed), Bernard has real pragmatic problems on his hands, along with emotional distress.

Incredibly, after his father's death, he finds himself remembering the old man's rage with "a mixture of awe and fondness." He sees some parallels between them — in their shared sexual ardor and need, and in their shared shock at suffering so many untimely deaths in the family (Bernard's shock may be the reason he gives strangely varying ages for when his brothers died).

The book's title refers to a bill Ed once sent his son, charging him roughly $2 million for the cost of raising him. Bernard was then 28 — and living on a teacher's salary.

If this is grotesque, other passages in the book are laugh-out-loud funny. When Bernard questions Ed about his Atlantic City boyhood ("Tell me more about the boardwalk, Dad"), the answer is pure Essence of Ed: "What do you want from me? Seagulls or something?"

Thank goodness Brian is there to help his partner steer around this contrarian.

Where "The Bill from My Father" takes for granted a marriage-like domestic serenity flourishing between two men, Bruce Benderson's "The Romanian" does exactly the opposite. Benderson, by his own lights, is a conservative, seeing no "progress" in the assimilationist gay desire to follow a heterosexual model of marriage, and insisting on the value of being a sexual outlaw:

"I still saw my homosexuality as a narrative of adventure, a chance to cross not only sex barriers but class barriers ... Otherwise, I told myself, I might as well be straight."

And so, while investigating European brothels for an online magazine, he picks up Romulus, a Romanian hustler half his age, and proceeds to fall in love with him.

The headlong highs and lows of their eight-month affair make for crazed, exhilarating reading. Think Jean Rhys' tales of doomed and reckless love in 1930s Paris. Think a frenzied gay rewrite of "Wuthering Heights."

For this is "amour fou" on a grand scale. First Benderson does everything he can to whisk Romulus away from his native Romania to New York, where Benderson lives. When that doesn't work out, Benderson moves to Bucharest.

There it becomes apparent that even the most ardent dedicatee to the gay-outlaw lifestyle doesn't sit around being "gay" all the time. For one thing, Benderson is a sharp observer, and his details on life in Bucharest and in Romulus' hometown of Sibiu (which the lovers visit) are photo-sharp. For another, Benderson soon develops an interest in Romanian history, particularly in the erotic follies of King Carol II, whose reign was cut short by his love for Jewish commoner Elena Lupescu.

As Benderson sees it, love affairs such as his and Carol's are what makes the world go around. "If it weren't for us, the world would suffer from a dismal lack of stories."

Meanwhile, reality intervenes. Benderson has to work like crazy to keep himself and his lover financially afloat (Romulus cooks lunch but otherwise does nothing but chainsmoke, watch TV and disappear with girlfriends). And "work" for Benderson means, hilariously, translating Celine Dion's memoirs from their native Quebecois French into English: "I felt as if I'd been plunged into a swamp of banality whose shores would never be sighted."

Benderson also has an elderly parent in the picture — his much-adored 96-year-old mother who wishes he'd settle down like the nice middle-age gay couple next door to her.

None of this turns out particularly well, but Benderson is such a compelling character, and Romulus such an enigmatic one, that it scarcely matters.

The sex is explicit (unlike in Cooper's book) but it can't be called pornographic — not when it goes so terribly wrong.

Benderson's narrative is taut, driven, culturally astute, politically cranky and packed with Oscar Wilde-worthy epigrams ("Passion is an emotion that rarely respects its own aftermath"). "The Romanian" was the deserving winner of the Prix de Flore in France, where it was first published in 2004.

To come in from the emotional-erotic storms of "The Romanian" and enter Kenji Yoshino's "Covering" is a bit like having to sit down and do six hours of homework. You know it's the responsible thing to do — but where's the Sturm? Where's the Drang?

Yoshino grew up in Boston, the son of Japanese academics who succeeded in the United States. He became aware of his homoerotic desires in college, and fell into a major depression about them in graduate school. Even after he came out to his parents, he didn't feel comfortable enough to introduce them to his first boyfriend.

In short, he was "covering" — downplaying any gay characteristics he had. And he argues that most minorities "cover" so as to court the approval of the cultural mainstream.

"Racial minorities must 'act white' because of white supremacy, women must hide parenting responsibilities because of patriarchy, gays must hide displays of same-sex affection because of hetero-normativity." He concludes: "If civil-rights law fails to protect the groups against coerced conformity, it will have stopped short of its end."

Yoshino persuasively backs up his argument, citing plenty of court cases. And his dream of legislation that could make covering unnecessary for minority populations is a very nice dream.

But frankly, I need more bad behavior in my reading matter.

My plan: Fumble along on the homefront, like Cooper ... and check out the wild side, vicariously, via Benderson.

Libraries honor Dr. Seuss' B-day

By Ari Shibron
Indiana Daily Student (Indiana U.)

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — The Monroe County Public Library followed the doctor's orders Saturday by prescribing children of all ages a dose of the whimsical, simple wisdom of Seuss literature.

Because March 2 was the anniversary of Dr. Seuss' 102nd birthday, the local library, as well as other libraries around the country, celebrated the legacy of the author by promoting literacy last week.

Bloomington's Parks and Recreation Department co-sponsored the event to educate young people about reading.

"I think Dr. Seuss has left a great legacy for kids, and celebrating with a Seuss festival on his birthday was a great idea," said event organizer Sarah Nix.

The event featured several activities, including an over-sized board game, book-making, face-painting, fishing and prizes.

Several children dressed up as Dr. Seuss characters to honor the day.

According to his official Web site, www.seusscille.com, some of Dr. Seuss' most notable books are "The Cat in the Hat," "Green Eggs and Ham," "One Fish Two Fish Red Fish Blue Fish" and "Oh, the Places You'll Go!" Dr. Seuss is the pen name for Theodore Geisel. After Geisel graduated from Dartmouth College and Oxford University, he began his career as a World War II cartoonist.

After the success of the book "The Cat in the Hat," Geisel's fans would forever know him as Dr. Seuss. Many Seuss fans credit his repetition, rhyme and colorful illustrations as both charming and profound. Seuss is often quoted in graduation speeches for his emphasis on life lessons.

Geisel died September 24, 1991, with more than 200 million copies of his books dispersed around the globe in 15 different languages.

Although the event was geared toward children, adults enjoyed the festival, too.

"I've had a pretty good time," said Bloomington, Ind. resident Jodd Terrell, who took his two granddaughters to the library to introduce them to reading. "I really wanted to expose (my granddaughters) to literature, and this festival was a good way to do it," he said.

Librarian Lisa Kaiser sliced up Dr. Seuss's birthday cake and served it to the festival participants.

"This is great to see this many people so enthusiastic about Dr. Seuss, and I am awestruck by the number of people here," she said.

Nix said she also hoped Dr. Seuss could be remembered beyond Saturday's festival.

"Dr. Seuss has left a legacy for children to enjoy reading, and that is something that should be enjoyed every day," she said.

Jon Stewart in a no-win spot

By David Hiltbrand
Knight Ridder Newspapers

When did hosting the Academy Awards become such a thankless task?

Jon Stewart is the latest victim of the Oscar curse. He was too cynical, too New York, went one school of thought. No, he was too deferential, too reined in, argued others. The one thing most agreed on: It didn't work.

You just can't win. Not when the standard for success is some idealized hybrid of Bob Hope and Johnny Carson. The job has become a recipe for disaster.

The only difference this year is that the carpers didn't even wait until the first commercial to start shredding Stewart's performance. The bloggers were on him like paparazzi on Anna Nicole Smith before he even finished his opening monologue.

Which, by the way, was hilarious. He hadn't even finished saying hello before he slipped in a deft gender-bender gag about Felicity Huffman. Then he started setting them up and smacking them down. Angelina Jolie. Bam. Steven Spielberg. Timber. Hollywood's liberal slant. Whammo.

So why did it go over in the Kodak Theatre like someone shouting profanities in a tabernacle? The Oscar crowd is a glittering assemblage of the most obscenely paid, monumentally self-important individuals in the universe. Mock them at your peril.

"He was no Bob Hope or Billy Crystal," Tom O'Neil, columnist for the awards show Web site TheEnvelope.com, says of Stewart. "He never did the most important part of his job, which is to hug the audience. (The Oscar host) is the ringmaster of Hollywood's annual family reunion. You have to have this sense of amazement about the proceedings. Stewart didn't give us that."

Ever watch a sitcom without a laugh track? That's what Sunday's telecast was like.

It doesn't matter how funny you are. If the crowd at the Kodak is freezing you out, it looks as if you're bombing on TV.

"There wasn't the connection between the host and the audience there might have been in other years, with people like Whoopi Goldberg or Billy Crystal or Steve Martin," says Todd Boyd, a professor of critical studies at the USC School of Cinema and Filmmaking. "When the host is part of the Hollywood community, their comedy panders to knowledge of the industry. When that happens, people in the audience laugh, and those laughs make it seem like it is doing well to those watching on television."

This must be where my personal disconnect with the Academy Awards comes in. I don't see anything particularly Promethean in the act of making movies.

Hope and Carson are held up as paragons of Oscar hosting. But let's

Blame him or blame her: two books approach relationships

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

Is He Really Just Not That Into You?

She says: It's 11 at night. My phone rings. It's one of my best friends. "Hannah, you HAVE to read this book, I saw Oprah talking about it, and it's like someone wrote this book just for you. I'm getting it for you if you don't get it."

I laughed. The next day I was at Barnes & Nobles, purchasing a book that could be re-titled, "Signs He Doesn't Like You."

I like the reason the book was written: to help women stop making excuses for guys who aren't making them happy, and to stop trying to turn a not-that-interested guy into a boyfriend. The book says that if men are smart enough to run the world, they can definitely show you that they're interested. If they don't, they're not interested.

Simple. If he doesn't call, he's not interested. If he won't commit to you, he's not that interested. Basically, if he doesn't do everything right to show you that he's interested, he's not that interested. The author does say that there are exceptions, but then says to bank on the fact that it's not an exception, and to move on with your life. Welcome to the book that screwed with my head and caused me to believe that all the guys I was dating were jerks, screw some things up and hurt a pretty valuable friendship.

In college, it's pretty normal for guys not to want full-blown relationships. Not because they don't necessarily like you — a lot — but because they just don't want the responsibility. And ladies, if he's said this to you, don't go about thinking he'll eventually change his mind. If he changes his mind, trust me, he'll tell you. It's also pretty normal at this age for guys to think that IMing or text messaging is a good substitute for calling, as much as we'd rather hear their voices.

Several months after the first book was published, another, smarter man wrote another book, "Be Honest ... You're Not That Into Him Either," which starts out by admitting that guys can be jerks and could have never meant to call to begin with. Then it says sometimes they just simply forget to call when they said they would. The rest of the book says that women's sexual liberation allows guys to date women without making the effort to show he's interested, because now women can make booty calls too — and most guys aren't going to argue with that. The catch? We usually get attached in the process. Or, we've had so many bad experiences that we settle for much less than we started out to find, and we end up thinking we're attached to someone who we started spending time with when we were lonely — not someone we truly wanted to be with. This book basically says don't waste your energy being upset about someone you didn't like that much to begin with, but you ended up getting involved anyway.

After reading these books, I've gone back to my original opinion – trust your instincts. If something feels off, it probably is. If you think the guy really has feelings for you but doesn't match one author's opinion of what being interested is, then don't write him off. I've said it before and I'll say it again, you are the best judge of your own experience.

But that's just my opinion, and I'm a girl, not a guy. Let's see what a real live college guy has to say.

He says: It's a Friday night at UMass, and you're getting ready to go out for the night. You're at a party with your buddies and meet a girl. She's cute, so you get her number and tell her you'll call her.

Meanwhile, you've got that girl from your 10 a.m. class you've been hanging out with. She's really cute, too. She wants to hang out, but first you've got to set up that date with the girl you met at the party last Friday, assuming that you haven't already made plans with your ex-girlfriend who you hooked up with last Saturday.

OK, so I'm sorry if you're offended by that depiction of the male mind. We're not all like that. But for all intents and purposes, the idea presented there is the correct one. If we're not calling or we just don't seem interested even though your signals are there, there is a reason. Let me start by stating however, that for men, ruling the world is cake when compared to the monumental task of figuring out what a girl wants or is expecting. Sometimes we just don't know what you want us to do. However, more often that not, we don't want a full-blown relationship, and mostly we don't want to be committed because that would mean the end of a beautiful UMass rite of passage called being single. Relationships are for post-college life, single is now. So if it's been more than three days and you haven't gotten that phone call, or you're throwing every signal out there and we're not responding "the right way," it's not that we're trying to be a jerk, it's just time to accept the fact that We're Just Not That Into You.

I would like to make my disclaimer/exception here. There are times where a guy just doesn't have it figured out, and you should give him time. Not all guys are as described above, and there are a lot of nice ones out there. Actually, look around you right now in the DC, the guy who is reading this next to you and looking disgusted is probably the guy you want; go give him your phone number ... and screen name for that matter.

Next week: You know you're a catch. So why can't you get a good guy?

Need some advice? E-mail us at loversonly@gmail.com. You'll get a guy's and a girl's opinion, or just write to one of us. So who is the guy? My best friend since freshman year. He's been my go-to source when some guy has been driving me nuts, and has never once been wrong to this date.

Academy deserves an award

By Ryan Burda
Daily Egyptian (Southern Illinois U.)

CARBONDALE, Ill. — If you watched this year's Academy Awards you saw a few upsets, four first-time winners in all of the acting categories and a first time host who exceeded viewers' expectations — and don't forget all the montages where the Academy promoted people to go to the theater to see movies and not to wait for them to come to DVD.

Despite a lot of skepticism from critics over Jon Stewart's first go-around as host, I thought he did an excellent job with keeping his same comedic timing and one-liners that he produces on a regular basis on "The Daily Show." While the actors and Hollywood people inside the theater didn't seem to find all of Stewart's jokes particularly funny, the viewers at home did.

The opening fell kind of flat, showing several hosts of the past, including Billy Crystal and Chris Rock, turning down this year's hosting duties, leaving only Stewart to carry on the heavy torch of his predecessors.

While he was no Billy Crystal, Stewart managed to fire off a few jokes at political parties, scientologists, a few celebrities and himself, in a bedroom scene with George Clooney. He kept pretty much the same approach as the Daily Show and will hopefully be invited back next year.

One of the problems that worried ABC and viewers was the lack of blockbuster stars attending this year's ceremonies. There was no Tom Cruise bouncing off of his seat preaching his love for Katie Holmes and Scientology, no Brad Pitt and Angelina to adopt a few kids on the red carpet and no Paris Hilton, thank god.

This was more of a time for lesser known actors and actresses to shine in the spotlight and receive some accolades for their work. Phillip Seymour Hoffman, Reese Witherspoon, Rachel Weisz, and George Clooney all took home their first Oscar, which solidified them at the top of Hollywood's "A" list.

Other memorable highlights of the night included the montage of cowboy scenes in Westerns that were homoerotic and hilarious, Will Ferrell and Steve Carrell, the two funniest comedic actors working right now presenting the make-up award, Ben Stiller's green leotard and Three 6 Mafia winning the award for their beautiful rendition of "It's Hard Out Here for a Pimp," featured in "Hustle and Flow." It was nice to see a talented rap group perform and beat out Dolly Parton and that other girl, Kathleen York. The Academy is starting to finally open their eyes and not just give it to the "safe" pick.

The biggest shocker of the night came in the last fifteen minutes when the movie about two love-struck cowboys was overtaken by "Crash," an ensemble drama about racial and social prejudices in Los Angeles.

All in all, I think this year's Oscars were better than it has been in the past few years. Everything seemed to go pretty smooth. There were no major political statements made by Sean Penn or Michael Moore, no wardrobe malfunctions, nothing happened to the stunningly perfect Keira Knightley and there weren't any big controversies.

This year set the bar a little higher for the Academy and hopefully they can make it even better next year.

Oh, and the main thing to remember about this year's biggest award stage: Don't illegally download movies and don't wait to see the movies on DVD. When we do that we're ripping off all of those poor people in Hollywood.

Oscar host meets mixed crowd

face it, that was a different era. In modern times – that is, since 1990 – it's been Crystal (eight times), Goldberg (four times), and Martin (twice). To me, that's a long, nearly unbroken string of boredom.

Does anyone remember Comic Relief, the '80s fund-raisers for homelessness on HBO? Again and again, Robin Williams had to carry Crystal and Goldberg, frantically covering up the fact that they aren't that funny.

Crystal's Oscar reputation rides on the elaborate song-and-dance routines with which he would open the telecast. The first time you change the lyrics to a well-known song, slipping in references to the year's nominated movies, it's clever. But after that, it starts to feel like a campus comedy troupe's spring revue, sprinkled with jokes about the faculty.

Goldberg's appeal simply eludes me, especially at Oscar time. She stands up there, spewing out one stale Bruce Vilanch punchline after another, all the while with that smirky Cheshire cat grin on her face. Reading from a TelePrompTer doesn't make you the second coming of Oscar Wilde.

Every once in a while, the academy will go for someone I consider genuinely amusing, like David Letterman, Chris Rock, or this year's martyr, Stewart. Inevitably, these Hollywood outsiders will be judged harshly in the press the following day.

Letterman was mocked unmercifully for his "Uma, Oprah ... Oprah, Uma" jibe in 1995. I found that wordplay, like the rest of his observations that night, first-rate.

Last year, Rock was pilloried for riffing on the lack of real star power in today's films. Were the comments insulting to Tobey Maguire and Jude Law? Yes, but they were also rather daring and absolutely true. Both qualities are unforgivable in Hollywood.

Now it's Stewart's turn for the vitriol bath. "It's hard to believe that professional entertainers could have put together a show less entertaining than this year's Oscars, hosted with a smug humorlessness by comic Jon Stewart, a sad and pale shadow of great hosts gone by," wrote Washington Post TV critic Tom Shales.

Frazier Moore, the TV writer for the Associated Press, ripped Stewart on numerous fronts, singling out his joke about Bjork, famous for her swan gown, being shot while trying on her Oscar dress by Vice President Cheney. "Tiresome squared. Huh?" Moore huffed.

Really? I nearly did a spit take – in fact, I laughed often during the night, as when Stewart followed a pompous montage on cinema's bravery in confronting societal problems with, "And none of those issues were ever a problem again."

His taped segments mocking the nominees with campaign ads were inspired, and reflected "The Daily Show" host's wry political bent.

But dry and smart obviously don't cut it on Hollywood's big night. Did Stewart appear a little stiff and nervous? Well, yes. But that's a pretty intimidating room. With clubby expectations. And someone obviously forgot to send the job-description memo to Stewart, the evening's designated jester: "You can try to make us laugh, little man. But don't let it get in the way of the flattery."

Irony doesn't play well with this illustrious crowd.

"Stewart was helplessly miscast, to put it in Hollywood terms," O'Neil says. "He presided with some dignity and class and coolness, but he will not be invited back."

For which Stewart should thank his lucky stars.

Dieters look for high-tasting, low-carb snacks

By Jane Snow
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Nobody has ever gotten thin on a diet of Oreos and Pecan Sandies, but Nabisco and Keebler would like you to try.

These days, at the height of America's traditional diet season, cookie and cracker aisles in supermarkets from coast to coast are crammed with boxes of Oreo Crisps, Just Right Pecan Sandies and a host of other munchies portioned into 100-calorie snack bags.

"Eating smarter but looking for great-tasting snacks? You'll love what your friends at Nabisco have created for you," reads the back of Nabisco's 100 Calorie Packs of Chips Ahoy, Wheat Thins, Oreo Thin Crisps and other indulgences that in the past were considered junk food.

At least a dozen popular brands of cookies and crackers have been given the 100-calorie extreme makeover, not counting Pop Secret and Jiffy Pop, which just introduced 100-calorie bags of microwave popcorn, and Pringles, which has launched 100-calorie packs of chips.

The catch is that most of the cookies and crackers are not the snacks you know and love. The Oreos, for example, has been reformulated to resemble a cracker. How does it taste? Is it really a diet food?

To find out, we asked a panel of Akron Beacon Journal readers to rate the 100-calorie snacks in a blind taste test. Their verdict: Some of the snacks are pretty good, although all three tasters said they'd rather have an apple or a bunch of grapes.

That's good news to two local dietitians, who applauded the portion control but said the snacks are mostly empty calories.

"I would want a whole lot more nutrition for 100 calories," said dietitian Donna Skoda, Summit County, Ohio, Health Department's director of community health.

Also, the snacks are expensive, said Audrey Tucker, dietitian at the Summa Bariatric Care Center. A box of six packets of Honey Maid Cinnamon Thin Crisps cost $2.79 in one store. Each little packet, Tucker noted, weighed less than an ounce and contained just "15 to 20 little crackers about the size of a Wheat Thin."

Consumers don't seem to mind, because the products are flying off store shelves.

"Right now they're a hot item in our stores," said Sue Guthier, spokeswoman for Acme Fresh Markets.

Sales of Kraft's Nabisco line alone reached $10 million within five months of its introduction in July 2004, according to Mintel International, a market research firm. Kellogg's line of Keebler Right Bites was rolled out the following June.

"Sales have been good and consumers are definitely interested in having more flavors," Keebler spokeswoman Colleen Cooney said.

Snack manufacturers are counting on the 100-calorie packs to rescue the $4.6 billion cookie industry, which has been hurting because of Americans' preoccupation with health. The rise of Type 2 diabetes, the national focus on obesity and the popularity of low-carbohydrate diets all caused cookie sales to drop 3.8 percent in 2004, the latest year for which figures are available, according to a Mintel report.

But can an Oreo minus the creamy filling, squished cracker-thin and almost stripped of fat, woo back health-conscious snackers?

Apparently so. Tasters loved the Oreo Thin Crisps, which placed fourth in the taste test behind an apple, fresh grapes and yogurt.

Cynthia Young, 51, a middle school teacher, liked the crunchy texture of the Oreo Thin Crisps. Young attends Weight Watcher meetings and snacks on an apple every morning on the way to work. But after work, she wants a more satisfying snack, she said.

"In the evening I want something that makes me feel I'm getting more of a snack," she said.

Of the 19 snacks tasted — 11 commercially packaged 100-calorie snacks, 6 healthful snacks recommended by the dietitians, and regular miniature Oreos and miniature Nutter Butter Bites — five of the new products made it into the top 10.

After the Oreo Thin Crisps came Cheese Nips Thin Crisps in fifth place; Ritz Snack Mix, sixth; Right Bites Cheez-It, seventh; and Right Bites Mini Fudge Stripes, 10th.

A plain apple placed first followed by fresh grapes and low-fat yogurt. Regular mini Oreos placed eighth and regular Nutter Butter cookies, ninth.

For the blind tasting, the products were removed from their packages and served on paper plates. They were identified only with random three-digit numbers. All of the products, including the fruit, were served in 100-calorie portions.

Tasters rated the snacks on flavor, texture, quantity and overall acceptability, assigning from 1 to 25 points in each category for a possible perfect total score of 100. The scores of the three judges were then averaged.

The apple raked in 98.3 points, and the grapes 94.6. The Oreo Thin Crisps, in comparison, earned just 79.6 points — not great, but a lot better than the measly 35.6 points given Right Bites Chips Deluxe. The judges didn't think much of Keebler's Right Bites Sandies Shortbread Cookies, either, which got just 44 points.

"There were some that were tasty but some that were cardboard," Fulmer said.

Some of the dietitians' suggested snacks didn't fare any better. A 100-calorie cup of Jell-O Chocolate Fat Free Pudding Snack came in dead last, Quaker's new Multigrain Cakes rice cakes were 17th, and a single-serve tub of 2 percent cottage cheese tied with the Sandies.

Too bad, because those who are limiting their calories, in particular, should choose more nutritious items than the 100-calorie cookies and crackers as snacks.

"All those are, are a little bit of fat, a little bit of sodium and a little bit of fiber. That's all you get in them. You don't get any of your vitamins or minerals," Skoda said.

Both Skoda and Tucker worry that ravenous dieters will rip through the whole six-packet box in one setting, because the amount in each packet is skimpy. "If you can control your portions and eat just one, you're OK," Tucker said. "I think the problem with them is stopping at one. I can see somebody eating all six packages in that box."

Skoda agreed. "I gotta tell you, I was laughing," she said. "When you open up these little packets and pour them out on a napkin you think, 'My God, the packaging cost more than the contents.'"

But the snacks are popular, and Americans are eating a lot of them. And that, said the dietitians, may be the problem.

Viggiano closing out remarkable UMass career

dicted the success he's had this year coming off of an injury-riddled junior season during which he missed seven games due to an ankle sprain.

"I've been relatively healthy this year," Viggiano says. "You really can't play through injuries. When that happens, you realize how much you love the game – when you're not able to play it."

Viggiano was limited to just 4.5 points and 3.1 rebounds per game last year, following a breakout sophomore season which saw him receive the team's Jim McCoy Most Improved Player Award after averaging 9.5 points and 5.4 rebounds.

Last season may have been a grind for Viggiano, but there were still a few highlights, mainly the 12 clutch points he scored in the 61-59 upset of defending national champion UConn.

Viggiano's performances in games against the premier school from his home state figure to be one of the first things fans think of when they look back on his career, as he always stepped up his game against the Huskies.

"[Against] UConn you're always playing on ESPN against a team full of pros," Viggiano says. "If you don't get motivated to play that kind of game, then you're playing the wrong game. It was the team I watched growing up, so UConn was always a big game for me. I always had a little extra motivation for that game."

In this year's matchup with UConn, a 78-60 loss on Dec. 8, Viggiano turned in one of the most memorable plays of his career. After catching a pass on the left wing, Viggiano turned down an open jump shot to drive into the lane. Taking off from outside the block, he soared over UConn's Hilton Armstrong to throw down an authoritative dunk.

Viggiano counts that dunk as one of the best of his career, neck-and-neck with a monster dunk at Fordham last year. Viggiano says he enjoys catching opponents off-guard with his athleticism.

"Not many people expect a white guy to go up and do that, but sometimes I get lucky and I'll get somebody under there and it's fun," he says.

One of the bittersweet aspects of Viggiano's final season at UMass is that he knows how good this team could be next year. And even though he won't be there to reap the benefits, Viggiano hopes people realize the effort he's put into the building process.

"I think they will be very successful next year, and I hope people will think that I did have a little part in it," Viggiano says.

Gary Forbes, a junior transfer from Virginia who is considered the gem of next year's incoming east, has already made it clear that he recognizes Viggiano's contributions to any future success, as he has promised that if UMass wins any rings next year, Viggiano will receive one as well.

But before Viggiano can start thinking about the future of UMass, there is still some work to be done in the present. The Minutemen will face Xavier tonight at 6:30 in the first round of the A-10 Tournament.

"I've always wanted to play in the NCAA Tournament – that's a goal for everybody," Viggiano says. "We haven't been able to do that yet, but we still have a little ways to go in the season so maybe we can make a Cinderella run. Just to extend everything a little longer, it would be great."

Ford would like nothing more than to see UMass make that run for Viggiano.

"He would deserve it," Ford says. "As much as he's been a survivor for this basketball program, he deserves something a little bit extra special."

Viggiano knows that, unless UMass improbably runs the table in Cincinnati this week, his collegiate career will end at some point in the next four days, but he does not plan on ending his playing days – at least not right away.

"I'd like to play basketball overseas if I could," Viggiano says. "If basketball doesn't work out, I'm getting a degree in sport management. I've always been interested in the athletic department and what they do; maybe [I'll] be an athletic director I know that's a ways off, but I think that would be an ultimate goal."

Even if Viggiano does continue his career after college, he knows that it won't be the same as the four years he spent at UMass.

"I know when I look back on it I'm going to realize how much I did enjoy it," Viggiano says. "It was a great experience. It's going to be hard. I've had a team around me my whole life. To kind of get out on my own in a way is going to be weird. I'm going to miss hanging around the locker room, the conversations that we've had and traveling with the guys.

"I've been all over the country. I've gotten a free education. I'm grateful for all of that, and it's all because of the game. People tell you that it will go by in the blink of an eye, but you don't really believe it until the day actually comes."

And now that the day is drawing closer, it's safe to say that the UMass basketball program will miss Jeff Viggiano as much as he'll miss it.

Jeff Viggiano and the Minutemen take on Xavier in an Atlantic 10 Tournament first-round matchup tonight in Cincinnati. UMass knocked off the Musketeers 65-56 at the Mullins Center on Saturday.

Jeff Viggiano has started in 25 of the team's 27 games this season. He is second to Chris Lowe on the Minutemen with a total of 56 assists.

NFL player's union and league owners begin 'final' meeting

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

GRAPEVINE, Texas — What is supposed to be the absolutely, positively final meeting to solve the NFL's labor problems began yesterday, with owners trying to decide whether to accept the union's latest proposal.

A decision on whether to extend the collective bargaining agreement was unlikely to come down until Wednesday, close to the latest deadline of 8 p.m. EST. It'll take that long for the owners to resolve their differences over internal revenue sharing, the most divisive issue facing them. If they don't get that straight, a deal in unlikely.

Most of the first three hours of yesterday's meeting was spent simply listening to commissioner Paul Tagliabue go through details of the union's proposal.

"It's going to be a while. Quite a while," said Buffalo's Ralph Wilson, one of leading proponents of revenue sharing.

But there seemed to be some hope they would reach an agreement that would extend the contract that runs out after the 2007 season. It came from Dallas owner Jerry Jones, who is 180 degrees away from Wilson on sharing, but suggested for the first time that he might have to give in a bit to let the owners solve their dispute.

"We want to play football," Jones said as he entered the meeting. "We have an obligation to everyone, particularly our fans.

"My gut is we're going to come up with something, but it's still up in the air. It's going to be long and drawn out and tough."

Finding a solution now is critical because free agency, pushed back twice, is scheduled to start Thursday with a $94.5 million salary cap that could go as much as $10 million higher if there is an extension. And although both sides have agreed there will be no more extensions, there would be one more if there is an agreement – until 12:01 a.m. Friday to give teams time to get everything in order.

If there is no settlement, then 2007 would have no salary cap and create the kind of uncertainty that neither side really wants.

Revenue sharing hasn't been dealt with during the negotiations, even though Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the NFL Players Association, has contended all along that no agreement can be reached without it.

If nothing else, the tone of the owners was far different at this meeting than in New York last Thursday, when they took just 57 minutes to reject the union proposal. Later that day, they extended the deadline for free agency for three days and again extended Sunday night just as it seemed talks had broken off.

That led to this meeting and the discussion over revenue sharing, which will be necessary to meet the union's proposal for just under 60 percent of the league's total revenues.

Low-revenue teams such as Buffalo, Cincinnati and Indianapolis say high-revenue teams — Dallas, Washington and Philadelphia, for instance — should contribute proportionately to the player pool because they can earn far more in non-football income such as advertising and local radio rights. Those high-revenue teams might contribute only 10 percent of their outside money compared with 50 percent or more for low-revenue teams.

If there is no agreement, it would leave a number of free agents commanding far less than they thought they could get and a glutted market filled with veterans who could be cut to provide cap room.

Puckett's death leaves an empty feeling

By Dave Campbell
Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — In the middle of a steadily growing memorial to Kirby Puckett, outside the Metrodome and right alongside a street named for the beloved Hall of Famer, one cardboard sign stood out.

"There IS crying in baseball," the message was written, in red ink, hammered over a couple of old Puckett baseball cards taped to the corners.

All around the game, people who were close to the roly-poly outfielder who led the Minnesota Twins to two World Series titles — and even those who only watched him on TV — were saddened Tuesday by Puckett's death.

"This morning, when I got up and took a shower and watched the news, tears started coming out," said Chicago White Sox manager Ozzie Guillen, one of many contemporaries who spoke about the man whose energy, enthusiasm and exceptional skills captivated baseball fans throughout a 12-year career cut short by glaucoma in 1996.

Puckett died at 45 in a Phoenix hospital Monday afternoon, a day after having a stroke in his home.

"This is a great loss for baseball," said former Baltimore Orioles great Cal Ripken, who with Puckett was one of the few stars of their generation who never switched teams. "Puck was one of my favorite people to compete against on the field and to be around off the field. I will always remember how Kirby played the game with joy and how he brought a smile to your face just by saying hello."

A memorial service was in the works. Funeral arrangements had not been finalized Tuesday afternoon.

"We'll take our time and go there, pay our respects, and then come on back down to spring training," Twins general manager Terry Ryan said before Minnesota played the New York Yankees in Tampa, Fla.

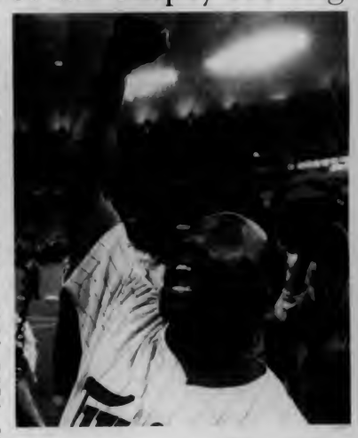
March is for games that don't matter, more tuneups for the regular season, but Puckett's teammates and opponents always remarked how he never loafed — even in meaningless exhibitions.

"He was a tremendous ambassador for the team. I think Dave Winfield said the right thing. He was the only player in the history of baseball everybody loved," said Guillen, who used to kiddingly call his son, Oney, "Little Puck" because he was a bit chubby.

Perhaps the most poignant marker of Puckett's impact on people was outside the Metrodome, thousands of miles from those sunny spring training sites, where dozens of fans shuffled around during the noon hour on a dreary, chilly day.

There were bouquets. There were orange Wheaties boxes, commemorating the Twins' championships. There were bobblehead dolls. There were caps. And plenty of personalized messages.

"I've been watching Kirby since I was young," said 25-year-old Tim Jarvis, who brought a flower pot to set on the sidewalk. "He's the kind of guy when your dad says, 'You want to learn how to hit a baseball, that's the guy to watch.'"



An Ohio native who came to St. Paul to attend school, Jarvis recalled Puckett as one of the reasons why he was excited to move – even though his playing days were long gone.

"That's awesome. I get to go watch baseball in the house that Kirby played in," Jarvis said.

The Yankees' Randy Johnson recalled how Puckett helped his mother put her luggage in the overhead compartment once on a plane. Don Mattingly pointed out that Puckett was the one who gave him his nickname: "Donnie Baseball."

Steve Finley, now with the San Francisco Giants, remembered when Puckett said hello to Ripken while the Orioles stretched before a 1989 game in Minneapolis – and then started chatting with Finley, a rookie he had never before met.

"He had a way of making everyone feel important," Finley said.

Former Minnesota Twins outfielder and Hall-of-Famer Kirby Puckett died at the age of 45 on Monday after suffering from a stroke on Sunday.

UM track ends season

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's track and field teams each finished their respective indoor seasons at the ECAC Championships in Roxbury last weekend. The women sent two athletes and did not score, while the men sent 17 competitors and finished 30th out of 51 teams.

The two girls who represented the Maroon and White were sophomores Kristen Bakanowski in the pole-vault and Christina DeRosa in the 5,000 meters.

Bakanowski had a stellar second year. She has a season-best mark of 12 feet and captured the Atlantic-10 Conference Indoor Pole Vault Championship for the second year in a row on Feb. 18. She became the first Minutewoman to repeat as league champ in any track and field event since Brandy Green repeated as pole-vault champion in 2002 and 2003.

At the ECAC Championships, however, she failed to clear the bar on all three of her attempts. But the opening height was a mere four inches below her season-best, which, UMass women's coach Julie LaFreniere noted, made the competition exceptionally difficult.

LaFreniere added that many extraordinary pole-vaulters did not manage to clear the initial height.

DeRosa placed 15th out of the 23 runners who completed the course. Though she competed in the 5,000 meters only twice prior to the meet, she managed to produce a season-best time of 17:24.13, a performance that excited her coach.

"There's a lot of fantastic athletes at ECAC's, so I was happy with it. I thought she did a nice job," LaFreniere said.

She added that, after allowing her athletes a little bit of time to rest any injuries, they will begin training for the outdoor track and field season.

Besides Bakanowski and DeRosa, LaFreniere expects to see big things from senior sprinter Elisabeth Budd and freshman shot-putter Jordan Veney, among others.

The top three finishing teams at the ECAC Championships were Northeastern with 22 points, Yale (19 points) and Duke (15).

UMass men's coach Ken O'Brien was happy with the way his team finished off its winter season.

"[We had some] great performances," O'Brien said. "The meet was a step above the meets that we've been to this year [in regards to difficulty]. I think the kids performed very well."

The two athletes who made it to the finals in their respective events were junior Erik Hoagland and senior James Godinho.

Hoagland, though nursing an ankle injury over the last two weeks, managed to finish third in the long-jump with a mark of 23 feet, 5.25 inches, and 15th in the triple-jump with 45-11.75. He continues to impress his coach with his clutch performances.

O'Brien said the gritty performance added to Hoagland's demonstration of being the "big-meet competitor that he has been all year."

Godinho, however, was the only Minuteman to contribute any points for the team, coming in eighth place in the 500-meters with a time of 1:04.17. In the preliminary round, he almost broke the school record for the second time in his collegiate career. With a time of 1:03.41, he finished just .43 seconds shy of the mark that he set last season.

O'Brien mentioned that fine performances were also turned in by sophomore shot-putter Sean Calicchio and senior Jon Korhonen as well as the three relay teams.

He, like LaFreniere, said that his team will be given about a week to recuperate before practice resumes for the outdoor season. However, he had no predictions for how his team will fare in the spring.

He did mention that, come spring season, the team will be short a few valued runners. The eligibility of Andy McCarron, Jon Korhonen and Matt Clark is up, marking an end to their collegiate running careers.

"Their skills, in terms of their performances, will obviously be sorely missed," O'Brien said. "But the impact they had on the program in terms of mature leadership and inspiration to their teammates will be missed even more.

"[The younger members of the team] are very grateful for everything that they've contributed to the program."

The top three finishing schools were Penn State (71 points), Cornell (55) and Rutgers (54).

The NCAA Championships will take place next Friday and Saturday. No UMass athlete qualified for the events.

Book details Bonds' steroid use

NEW YORK (AP) – Barry Bonds used a vast array of performance-enhancing drugs, including steroids and human growth hormone, for at least five seasons beginning in 1998, according to a book written by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters.

An excerpt from "Game of Shadows," which details the San Francisco slugger's extensive doping program, appears in the March 13 issue of Sports Illustrated.

"I won't even look at it. For what? There's no need to," Bonds said Tuesday at Giants camp in Scottsdale, Ariz. The Giants said Bonds would not comment any further.

Bonds, who testified before a California federal grand jury looking into steroid use by top athletes, has repeatedly denied using performance-enhancing drugs.

"I've read what was reported," Bonds' agent, Jeff Borris, told The Associated Press. "Barry is looking forward to playing this year and the improved health of his knee, and being as productive as he's ever been."

Phone messages left by the AP seeking comment from Bonds' attorney and publicist were not immediately returned yesterday.

Baseball did not ban performance-enhancing drugs until after the 2002 season.

Authors Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, who led the newspaper's coverage of the BALCO scandal, recount in remarkable detail the specifics of Bonds' drug regimen, which they write started in 1998 with injections of Winstrol, a powerful steroid also linked to Rafael Palmeiro.

According to the book, Bonds was using two undetectable designer steroids, informally known as the cream and the clear, plus insulin, human growth hormone and other performance enhancers by 2001, when he hit 73 home runs for the Giants to break Mark McGwire's single-season record of 70 set in 1998.

The seven-time NL MVP enters this season with 708 homers, seven shy of passing Babe Ruth and 48 from breaking Hank Aaron's career mark.

"Game of Shadows" is scheduled to be published March 27 by Gotham Books.

BALCO, the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative run by Victor Conte, kept track of Bonds' drug use in detail, with folders and calendars that chronicled everything from schedules and quantities to his testosterone levels. Much of that information was obtained by federal agents when they raided the lab in September 2003.

The book "Game of Shadows," which is scheduled to hit shelves on March 27, details five years of steroid use by Giants slugger Barry Bonds.

According to reports in The Chronicle, Bonds testified to the grand jury in late 2003 that he used a clear substance and a cream given to him by his personal trainer, Greg Anderson, who pleaded guilty in the BALCO case last July to steroid distribution and money laundering. Bonds said he didn't know that what he was using was a steroid, the newspaper reported.

In October, Anderson was sentenced to three months in prison and three months in home confinement. Conte was among three other men who also pleaded guilty to their role in supplying steroids to elite athletes.

According to the book, Bonds used several substances in various forms by injecting himself with a syringe, taking injections from Anderson, gulping pills, putting liquid drops under his tongue or rubbing cream on his skin.

Bonds became so experienced and well-versed with the regimen that he occasionally overruled Anderson and took control of his own doping schedule, the book says.

Baseball commissioner Bud Selig had not reviewed the material and had no comment, spokesman Rich Levin said. Selig was en route from Milwaukee to Phoenix for the World Baseball Classic.

Bonds, who will turn 42 in July, played in only 14 games last season, all in September, following three knee operations. He showed signs of his old self in his brief return, hitting five homers in 42 at-bats.

He caused a stir before spring training this year with contradicting interviews in February. Bonds told USA Today that his knee bothered him so much he would probably retire after the season, with or without the home run record. Then he told MLB.com that his knee brace felt good enough for him to possibly play 10 more seasons.

The Chronicle reporters, who based the book on a two-year investigation, included an extensive summary on their sources, including court documents, affidavits filed by BALCO investigators, documents written by federal agents, grand jury testimony, audio recordings and interviews with more than 200 people.

From one perspective, the Minutewomen definitely can hang with an elite team. They proved that last Wednesday against the No. 8 Boston University Terriers, when they went up 3-1 early in the first half and headed into the break trailing by just a goal. But there are two halves to women's lacrosse, and the Terriers dominated the final 30 minutes of play. They outshot the Minutewomen 18-9, outscored them 9-2 and controlled the tempo.

Sure, UMass was missing two of its defensive starters at the time. But it's going to take 60 minutes of solid lacrosse – which you can argue they put together in their win against Harvard last Saturday – to beat a team like this. Bolduc is confident in her team's ability to do this, if not for the fact that she believes her team is finally getting it, then for the simple fact that she's drawn a more focused game plan based on what she saw from her office desk.

"We know that we're going to need to take control in the midfield," Bolduc said. "We know that we can't make lazy passes on the perimeter near the crease. We know what to do [today] … draw control and possessions will be key, too."

Regardless, it's hard to argue against Dartmouth's success. The Green boast the Ivy League Defensive Player of the Week in captain Kristin Zimmer. The Alexandria, Va., native got the honors on March 6 for her efforts in the Syracuse game, when she caused a team-high four turnovers to accompany one ground ball and one draw control, and against New Hampshire, where she had a season-high six caused turnovers, five ground balls and one draw control.

Then there's the Dartmouth attack, which provides no small task for a defense that has improved thanks to being back at full strength but still has work to do. Pennsylvania native Whitney Douthett spearheads the attack with a team-leading nine points on seven goals and two assists in two starts.

But if the Minutewomen do control that midfield game, and Bolduc's words evolve from passionate to prophetic, folks could be talking about this as a game of the year – if not, at least, a nice upset.

Connerty Continues to Roll

Coming into the season, senior attack Kerri Connerty was preparing to undertake a dual roll of scoring leader and captain/mentor for a youth-laden team in need of a little guidance. Right now, she's done a fairly good job at both.

She has scored in a team-high 17 consecutive games, dating back to last season, and is currently the team leader with eight points on five goals and three assists.

You might say the breakout of freshmen Kaci McCormick and Meaghan Reddy had something to do with being comfortable, and good leadership can reflect that.

"Kerri is definitely doing a great job leading out there," Bolduc said. "By example, and by being a great role leader. [She's] recognizing, almost as a coach now, to pull on the team, motivate them at times or to get on the team at times to push harder and work harder. She's very much taken on that role, and it's great. It's awesome."

Look for her to rack up a few more points today to extend her streak to 18.

No Hiding This 'Cuse Fan

Asked if she was secretly rooting for her alma mater – Syracuse – in watching the Orange-Big Green game online, Bolduc isn't afraid to admit her allegiance to the program she graduated from.

"Oh yeah, I'll say it. I'm not afraid to say it," she said. "Syracuse, after UMass, is my No. 2 team."

Bolduc added there was a bit more hype for the game as well. Last season, the Orange dropped a heartbreaking decision to the Green in the first round of the NCAA Tournament, which was played at Dartmouth. It doesn't need to be overstated that Syracuse was pumped for the game.

"If you listen to the press conference of my coach [SU's Lisa Miller, after the game], she talks about how they had a countdown of how many days, how many minutes, how many hours [until game time]," Bolduc said. "This game was huge."

Digital Inspiration

In an effort to get pumped up, according to Typadis, the team listened to Al Pacino's famous "Inches" speech from the 1999 Oliver Stone football movie "Any Given Sunday" before their loss to IU on March 1. Before Saturday's game against Harvard, their first win of the season, they watched the cult classic "Rudy."

Additionally, Typadis says she enjoys listening to various 1980s music to get pumped up for games, including Michael Jackson and tracks from the movie "Rocky," such as "Eye of the Tiger."

UMass sophomore midfielder Alana Jakas, who has missed the team's first three games this season, is expected to return to the lineup soon.

Viggiano working on final chapter

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

All Jeff Viggiano needs to do to be reminded of how much he's been through since becoming a member of the Massachusetts men's basketball team four years ago is look at the poster he has hanging in his apartment from his freshman season.

Looking back at the poster Viggiano sees countless faces of players who have moved on for one reason or another. It seems that the only constant within the basketball program over the past four years – which has undergone changes in almost every aspect, from the athletic director's office to the coaching staff to the players to even the managers – has been Viggiano.

While teammates have graduated, transferred, quit and been kicked off the team, Viggiano has been the one who kept coming back, and regardless of what changes have gone on around him, he has always taken the court and done everything that was asked of him by his coaches.

"I've always said the easiest thing you can do on the basketball court is work hard," Viggiano says. "All it takes is effort. You can't control making shots, but if you work hard everyday, you know good things are going to happen."

It's that workman-like attitude that has made Viggiano such a popular and respected player during his career at UMass.

UMass coach Travis Ford is in his first season in Amherst, but he's well aware of all Viggiano has endured in his time with the Minutemen.

"He's been a survivor of this program," Ford says. "You have to look at what he's been through. He's been through coaches, many teammates and injuries – a lot of things that could have really soured his experience here at UMass, but he's the most positive guy. He's meant a lot to UMass basketball, and that's a testament to the type of person he is."

The 6-foot-6, 215-pound forward from Suffield, Conn., was not a heralded recruit coming out of Suffield High School, as the players he competed against were not on par with the competition many of his collegiate teammates faced.

"My high school competition wasn't exactly what some of these guys were playing against," Viggiano says. "Some of these guys had pros on their teams, and I was playing with guys that will be intramural superstars in college."

Even though Viggiano wasn't challenged by top-notch opponents in high school, his talent was undeniable. Viggiano scored 1,540 points in his career, and averaged 28 points, seven rebounds and four assists as a senior en route to being named Connecticut's Gatorade Player of the Year. Such an impressive high school career caught the eye of then-UMass coach Steve Lappas, who made Viggiano his final recruit of the incoming 2002 class.

Though Ford was coaching at Eastern Kentucky when Lappas recruited Viggiano, he was more than happy to inherit the type of player he says he looks for on the recruiting trail.

"He means a lot to our basketball team," Ford says. "Like I've said on many occasions, he's probably our most valuable player for the fact that he is the most versatile player on our team. I like him on the court because he can do a lot of things. He makes everyone else better when he's on the court.

"Jeff is my type of player. I like his style of play, I like him as a person, and as a basketball player he can shoot it, he can dribble it, he can defend, he's athletic and he has good size. He's the type of young man that I've told my staff on numerous occasions that I want to recruit."

It's been a long journey, but Viggiano wouldn't change any of it. And he's been rewarded this year with the healthiest and most successful season of his career.

"I've had a lot of fun this year," Viggiano says. "I think it's been my best year, and a lot of that has to with the condition I'm in and the freedom that we're allowed to play with."

The numbers back up Viggiano, as he has turned in a well-rounded season. Viggiano averaged 9.0 points and 3.6 rebounds per game in the regular season, while leading the team in steals and finishing second in both assists and blocks.

While Viggiano has put up solid numbers this year, his greatest contributions have come from the intangibles he provides. Being the only senior on the team, Viggiano was thrust into more of a leadership role this year, as he was named a tri-captain along with juniors Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme. It is not in the soft-spoken Viggiano's nature to get in teammates faces, but Ford believes Viggiano's "leader by example" approach is just as effective.

"He's one of those quiet leaders," Ford says. "He's not a very vocal guy, but he leads by going out and doing it the right way. You don't ever have to worry about him. He's done whatever he's been asked to do, and he's been a great role model for some of these kids about how to come to work everyday and do your job. Guys look up to him, and I don't think he even realizes it."

Viggiano couldn't have pre-

A Connecticut native, Jeff Viggiano will be most remembered for his 12-point shining effort in last season's 61-59 upset of the UConn Huskies.

Forward Jeff Viggiano is the only senior on the Minutemen this year. The four-year player is averaging 9.0 points and 3.6 rebounds per game for the Maroon and White during his swansong season.

UMass opens A-10 Tourney

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The day has come for the Massachusetts men's basketball team (13-14, 8-8 Atlantic 10) to show its worth. The postseason is another story altogether – records and rankings are out the window and all that remains is 40 minutes of basketball to determine who goes on and who goes home.

For UMass, it will be the Xavier Musketeers in the first round – the same team the Minutemen beat 65-56 just five days ago. Common knowledge says that it is very difficult to beat a team twice in a season, let alone twice in one week.

The Minutemen and Musketeers shot back and forth last Saturday, before UMass pulled away in the waning minutes. UMass coach Travis Ford doesn't see much difference between Saturday's game and what he'll see tonight.

"Both teams have the same advantages, any way you want to think about it," Ford said. "It was a really tight game where neither team really dominated the other team so I don't see the teams changing a whole lot really. It was such a tight basketball game."

Senior Jeff Viggiano played inspired basketball in his last home game as a Minuteman. He scored 12 points, added five rebounds and mixed that in with a couple of thunderous slams and put-backs that had the Mullins Center crowd on its feet.

It will take everything that Viggiano has left in the tank to come away with a victory tonight. The Minutemen have been notoriously bad away from the Mullins Center. They went 3-11 on the road in the regular season, including some dismal performances at Temple and Richmond. UMass will need to show up tonight in order to get a victory from a team hungry for revenge.

"We've broken down every single play that we did, offensively and defensively, against them," Ford said. "I don't think either one of us hurt each other with any one thing. It was such a tight game. They led for a lot of it, then we came back at the end and won. So I don't think anyone is going to make any drastic changes."

Maybe the Minutemen won't have to change the style of play, but something will need to be done to change the road mentality for this team. No one doubts the UMass talent, but sometimes it just doesn't seem to be mentally there.

The Minutemen didn't bring intensity in the second game against Temple, and in the last road game of the season against the Richmond Spiders, they seemed to roll over when the game became intense.

"Hopefully we can make some 3's," Ford said. "That is going to be key for us if we can make some 3-pointers. Rashaun [Freeman] needs to make some things happen in the post, and we got the ball to him a couple of times [in the last game] but they just did a good job defending him."

Freshman guard Chris Lowe, a recent selection for the A-10 All-Rookie team, gave his thoughts on what the Minutemen need to do to get a win tonight.

"We just played them a couple days ago so you look at the tape," Lowe said. "You look at the positives and look at the negatives, play harder than we did before and cut down on the turnovers a little bit."

Junior captain Rashaun Freeman echoed Lowe's statement.

"Obviously, we have to be ready to play because they are going to be ready to upset us," Freeman said. "I think we kept them in the game by turning the ball over 12 times in the first half."

Turnovers and road games are both sore spots for this team – nagging pains that the Minutemen will have to remedy if they are to advance in the A-10 Tournament.

Junior forward Rashaun Freeman and the Minutemen will be looking for their first victory over Xavier in the A-10 Tournament in the program's history (0-2 all-time).

Bolduc believes an upset is in the cards

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Eleven days ago, the Dartmouth women's lacrosse team traveled to the Carrier Dome in Syracuse, N.Y. and gave the Orange everything they could handle.

As the score might indicate – an 11-10 decision won in double overtime by Cuse – it was a must-watch for avid fans of the sport, and no doubt the best game played so far by any two teams this season. It was a beautiful display of fierce lacrosse, with both teams trading goals back and forth like it was recess time on the playground.

It was also a chance for Massachusetts coach Carrie Bolduc, who watched the game from her computer in her office along with her assistants, to see what kind of competition she'll be facing this year. UMass plays both teams this season; they'll play the Orange on March 15, but today they've got the Big Green to worry about.

But judging on what Bolduc saw on film, she's not incredibly worried about the No. 3/6 Big Green, who will host the Minutewomen on their home turf, Scully-Eaton Field, in Hanover, N.H. at 3 p.m.

"Dartmouth is beatable," said Bolduc, whose Minutewomen haven't watched any film of the Big Green aside from that Syracuse game. "Sure, they're good. I mean, they're in the Ivy League; they went to the Final Four last year, but we're prepared. We know what to do [today]."

Sophomore attack Kathleen Tsipadis, who currently leads the Minutewomen in goals scored (seven), makes almost the same claim.

"I think we're just as athletic as them and maybe even faster than them," Tsipadis said. "If we minimize our mistakes, we can hang with them, even beat them. I believe in us. I definitely think we can play well against them. We're just about as strong as them. It's about using our head. They're a very experienced team, but I think we're starting to come together now."

Man accused of murder plans to plead insanity

The Westfield man accused of murdering a University of Massachusetts student will plead the insanity defense at his trial.

The trial date was pushed back to March 29 in Hampshire Superior Court in Northampton.

Bryan Johnston, 24, elected to use the defense "not guilty by lack of criminal responsibility" through his defense attorney, Alexander Z. Nappan, during a court hearing on Monday.

Johnston is accused of shooting UMass student David E. Sullivan, 22, in Sullivan's Meadow St. apartment in Amherst on Dec. 6, 2004.

Johnston and Sullivan were long-time friends who grew up together in the Berkshires.

Police said Johnston called Sullivan late on the evening of Dec. 5, 2004 and asked him to hang out. When Sullivan refused, Johnston drove to his house from Westfield, where the two got into an argument and shots were fired, police said.

Johnston's mother told police that her son was going through steroid withdrawal at the time of the murder.

Prosecutors are seeking over 90 witnesses and 1,000 pieces of evidence to be presented at trial, which is expected to last 10 days.

In an interview with the Springfield Republican, Nappan said there is no question that Johnston shot Sullivan.

"The issue is, 'Was he criminally responsible for his actions?'" Nappan told the newspaper.

Issues brew for governor and judicial panel

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — A clash is brewing between Gov. Mitt Romney and some former members of the panel he appointed to help screen potential judicial candidates.

Administration officials have criticized the 21-member Judicial Nominating Committee, saying it has moved too slowly to make recommendations to Romney on candidates to fill vacancies on the bench and hasn't done enough to send up names of minority and women candidates.

But some members of the panel recently removed by Romney say those criticisms are unfair.

Eric Fehrnstrom, Romney's communications director, said Romney is frustrated with the slow pace of nominees the board had sent him. Since January 2005, the panel has rejected 77 percent of those who have applied to be a judge, he said.

"The function of the [commission] is to weed out unqualified candidates and send up a pool," Fehrnstrom said.

That's exactly what the commission has done, according to several panel members recently removed by Romney. They say many of those who nominated themselves simply weren't qualified.

"The real question isn't whether someone is an attorney for 10 years, which is all it takes to apply, but is this a person

Payano endorses new candidates in election

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

President of the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts Pavel Payano gave an emotional speech to senators last night, expressing his disappointment about the recent fighting throughout the senate.

Payano also announced his, and current student trustee Valerie Louis's, full endorsement of Senator Elvis Mendez for president and Secretary of Public Policy and Relations Mishy Leiblum for student trustee.

"There are quite a few potential candidates in this upcoming election," said Mendez. "I've had the honor to work with some of them. And based upon my interaction with the candidates, there are two who are clearly the most able, most hard-working students for the job."

"We hope to run a fair, clean campaign," said Lieblum. "And we hope the rest of the candidates will do the same."

Member of "Take Back Umass" Jeff Napolitano also announced his and former SGA President Eduardo Busamante's endorsement of Mendez and Lieblum.

Supporters of "Change SGA," along with three area governors, announced their endorsement of Senator Shawn Robinson for president and Senator John Williams for student trustee.

Two representatives from the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity also announced their representatives for the March elections. Matthew Fox is running for student trustee and Michael Makarski for president.

In his opening remarks Payano expressed the optimism he felt in his first days as president and shared his disappointment with recent infighting between senators.

"Several months ago, when I convened the first meeting of the Senate, I made sure to look at all of your faces and I saw within all of you the future of the SGA," said Payano. "Senate was once full of chaos and division, where students feared to be a part of, feared of getting taken up into a bitter, infighting feud. This was the SGA that I wished to change, and up to this point I saw progress on the horizon."

Payano admitted progress had been made during his administration, but said a change in SGA was necessary.

"We have made progress, but certainly not enough," said Payano. "It is in vain that I would like to call for a change to the SGA. I have tried very hard this year to keep the SGA harmonious and focused, but there is certainly more to achieve. I say it is time for me and Valerie to move on, and change to come to student government."

In praising his two nominees, Payano criticized the recent actions of a number of senators.

Students march to protest war

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

More than one hundred students gathered yesterday to protest the war and continued occupation of Iraq by U.S. troops.

The University of Massachusetts Antiwar Coalition organized the protest, leading students who had gathered at the Student Union steps to Whitmore, where they presented a petition of their demands to administrators.

For about a month, students from the Antiwar Coalition have manned an informational booth in the Campus Center and walked around campus, gathering more than 700 signatures for their petition. The Coalition has made three demands of the administration. They have called on the University to stop allowing military recruiters on campus, stop allowing the campus police to work part-time for the Federal Bureau of Investigation and to prohibit all research funded by the Department of Defense and its agencies.

According to a recent press release issued by the Coalition, UMass employs an officer who works for the FBI, but is not accountable to the UMass Police Department or UMass administration. UMass researchers have also received grants from government agencies such as the National Security Agency and the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency.

It is this partnership with the government that the Coalition believes UMass must stop.

Justin Jackson, a graduate student and one of the coordinators of the march, said that UMass' "continuing partnership with military recruiters, the FBI, and the Department of Defense is unconscionable and potentially illegal. Our University can no longer maintain its credibility with the majority of its students, staff and faculty who are opposed to the illegal invasion and occupation of Iraq, as long as it maintains those relationships."

The Coalition recently suffered a "set-back" in their demands about recruitment on campus, according to Jackson.

The Supreme Court ruled on Monday that colleges and universities that accept federal funding from the government must allow military recruiters on their campus.

The case was brought to the court as a free-speech challenge from law schools and professors who claimed they should not have to associate with military recruiters or promote their campus appearances.

However, in a unanimous decision, the Justices of the Supreme Court ruled in favor of the argument made by the Bush administration, that after the terrorist attacks, and during the war in Iraq, the government had a responsibility to bolster its recruitment.

Jackson says, however, that this ruling doesn't mean the fight is over and said that there are several other things the campus administrators can do to appease the Coalition's anti-recruiter demands.

"We'd like to see recruiters moved to a more appropriate place on campus," said Jackson, "like the ROTC building. That way the recruiter wouldn't actively be getting in people's faces to join the war in Iraq."

Jackson also suggested that the administration make a public statement declaring that they disagreed with the recruiters discriminatory actions towards gays in the military. Although UMass is required to let the recruiters on campus, Jackson thinks that such a statement would at least show the administration's support for those who have demanded that the recruiters not be allowed on campus.

Students marched from the Student Union to Whitmore [illegible] presented the administration with a petition demanding the end of the University's ties with the war in Iraq.

Mentoring helps girls to reach their potential

By Eva Piccuzzi

In a community where nearly one in three ninth graders drops out before 10th grade, where 45 percent of births are to teen mothers and where 42 percent of children live in poverty, the Mentors and Teens Connecting in Holyoke MATCHMOST aims to reverse current social trends by providing young women with opportunities to develop and achieve their full potential.

Girls Incorporated of Holyoke began as the Holyoke Girls Club 24 years ago, and has grown into a leader in youth development programming for girls throughout the Pioneer Valley. The Mentor Program, located at The Holyoke Teen Center, is a unique program that provides girls with a one-on-one mentoring relationship to prepare them for college and beyond.

"Mentors meet with the girls and get them interested in college, figure out what their goals are in life and explore what they want to do when they grow up," said Vivianna Valiente, mentoring program volunteer coordinator at Girls Inc.

Valiente has recently initiated a recruitment campaign trying to reach women of Holyoke who would be willing to spend eight hours a month with a middle school teenage girl.

"The mentor doesn't have to be a parent. It just has to be a woman who is caring and mature and wants to spend time with one of the girls," said Valiente.

According to Mentoring Program Director Jenny Whitley, Girls Inc. has registered 84 girls for the Mentor Program; however, only 28 of the girls have mentor matches. The girls range from the age of 12 to 18 and attend John J Lynch Middle School and Dr. William R Peck Middle School in Holyoke.

"We have young women coming back that don't have mentors, so we must be doing something right," said Daisy Jimenez, a Youth Team member.

Holyoke has been battling an ugly reputation since nationwide attention broadcasted its increase in youth violence, school drop-out rates and teenage pregnancy. In a campaign to combat the effects of poverty, the city is calling for an increased effort of community members to an Competition

The "Biggest Loser" Dorm Competition for energy conservation kicked off last week, and some dorms have already pulled ahead in the MassPIRG-sponsored event. The 15 dorms listed below have reduced their energy use the most since the competition began on Monday, Feb. 27.

The competition will go until Thursday, March 16, and the winning dorm will be awarded two YCMP vouchers per student living in the dorm and a social bash for the dorm the week after Spring Break. All campus dorms are automatically entered, and the dorms are compared on an "energy percentage-saved" basis. Keep your eyes peeled for energy conservation tips on door hangers throughout campus, as well as on bulletin boards in your hall.

Payano expresses disappoint with senators' fighting

"It is my honor to have known them and to have worked with them. I'm sure that other candidates may be up to the challenge, but it is these two which I believe the student body can fully entrust government to," said Payano. "Perhaps most important, the most significant aspect about these two candidates, a quality which seems to be lacking in the last few days, is their maturity. I expect them, as well as all other candidates, to run a healthy, clean campaign."

Supporters of "ChangeSGA" shot back in response to Payano's remarks in an interview with the Daily Collegian.

"Maturity is an elected official taking criticism," said Senator Sean McNair.

"Supporting this movement seems like the mature thing to do," said Senator Jenn Kennedy.

"We think it's ironic that he's calling for a change, the same thing we're doing, at the end of his administration," said McNair.

In hopes of maintaining a clean election, supporters of "ChangeSGA" are looking to push a motion that would have every voting box personally escorted by police to prevent any "stuffing" of the boxes.

Elections start Tuesday, March 14 and end Wednesday, March 15.

Romney and former judicial panel clash

who has demonstrated through their practice that they have the qualities to become a judge," said John Mirick, a Worcester trial attorney removed from the panel by Romney.

Lawyers with 10 years experience can nominate themselves for a judgeship. The panel is charged with whittling those names down to a handful.

Howard Kalabus, a Boston attorney and longtime member of the commission, said he was surprised by his removal.

"This group did a wonderful job. You have to question why break them up," he said.

Stephen Chow, a business litigator in Boston also removed by Romney, said the criticism about not recommending enough minority or women candidates was also unfair.

Chow said the panel tries to find candidates who have experience as prosecutors, defense attorneys and civil attorneys.

"The problem is that there aren't that many people like that in the pipeline," he said. "Women and minorities there tend to be fewer who have been on the defense and prosecutor side with some civil experience."

Fehrnstrom defended Romney's decision to shake up the board.

"It is not unusual for the governor to make changes on the board in order to bring new insight and perspective," Fehrnstrom said.

David Yas, publisher and editor-in-chief of Massachusetts Lawyers Weekly, said Romney is trying to replace members of the committee with individuals more in tune with himself.

"He's slowly disbanding this system that he created," said Yas. "He's stacking the [panel] with certain people to get the wheels turning the way he wants them to."

In 2003, Romney announced a plan to overhaul the system of nominating judges. Candidates would be barred from making some political donations and would submit "blind" applications, removing their names to further discourage political picks.

Romney was responding in part to the widespread impression that the judicial nominating process in Massachusetts was rife with cronyism.

A 2002 review of nomination records by The Associated Press found more than half of the judges recommended by the commission in the previous five years had donated to the administrations of the governors who appointed them.

Fehrnstrom said Romney remains committed to those goals.

Time off school proves good for some, disastrous for others

By Dana Caldwell
The Daily Vidette (Illinois State U.)

NORMAL, Ill. — Frustrated and tired from midterms? Thinking about taking a semester off? While taking time off is a bad idea for some, students should consider all of their options before leaving school. According to an article in the Washington Post, undergraduates who take more than a semester break from their courses are at greater risk of not graduating at all. Amy Roser, coordinator for student academic services at Illinois State University, said there are many reasons why a student would take time off.

"Some students take a semester off because of academic reasons, while others take time off for personal or financial reasons," Roser said.

If a student is dismissed, ISU's reinstatement committee looks at many factors to allows a student to return to the university.

"We look at their academics, how many times they had been on probation, their grade point average and how far along they were in their degree program," Roser explained.

Roser said the committee also looks at the student's career outside of the classroom, and how involved they were on campus.

"We would look at the students' participation in Project Success, which is our intervention program for students who are on probation which helps them get back on track," Roser said.

Stacy Kolbus, a sophomore early childhood education major, took a semester off for personal reasons, and said it was a beneficial decision for her.

"I left because I moved to Washington with my boyfriend. I felt my decision to leave school was alright, because I planned on working at a day care," Kolbus said.

Once returning from Washington, Kolbus knew she wanted to return to school.

"When I came home there was never a time I didn't think about returning. For most jobs you are going to need a degree, but taking the semester off helped me realize that," Kolbus said.

Students who leave the university must be readmitted by the reinstated committee.

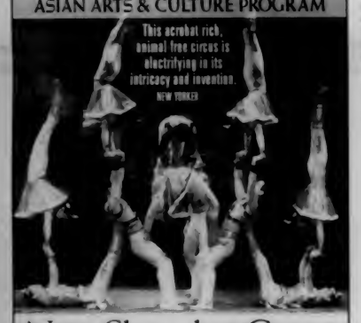
"What we try to do at the reinstatement committee is find the best path for the student who is returning to ISU, but for some students, we have to say they need to complete their degree elsewhere," Roser said.

Amy St. George, a junior biological science major, said her roommate left this semester because of ISU's academic probation policy, and does not think she'll return.

"I heard ISU is making the rules to get back in really hard, and they're not letting as many students who were on academic probation 'return,'" St. George said.

For some students, like St. George's roommate, leaving ISU may be the end of their academic career.

"I don't think she'll have the grades to get back in. She really didn't care about school. She found out last semester that she was on academic probation and still never raised her grades," St. George said.



Roser said she recommends that students who plan on taking a semester off talk with their academic adviser about their decision, and to make a plan on how they will get their academic goals back on track.

"I counsel students to take a semester off when they have a lot going on in their lives, that way when they do return they can focus on their studies," Roser explained.

Roser sees students who take a semester off and do not return, and said students have to be motivated to know they can take a semester off and will return.

"When I came back from taking a semester off it was really hard. I moved across the country, and coming back was an adjustment. I was away from my boyfriend and family and had to return to my friends at school, which was hard. A semester is a long time to not be in school and it's really hard to get your butt back in gear. If I had taken more than a semester off I don't think I would have returned," Kolbus said.

Poll: Americans want execution for Saddam

By Will Lester
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Two-thirds of people in the United States say Iraqis are better off now than under Saddam Hussein, but many longtime U.S. allies are less optimistic, AP-Ipsos polling found.

Iraq is struggling to form a government, and the trial of Saddam is in its fifth month. A surge in violence after the Feb. 22 bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine in Samarra raised fears that Iraq could descend into civil war.

Of the eight other countries surveyed, only residents of Britain, Italy and Canada were more likely to say Iraqis are "better off" now than they were under Saddam than to say they are "worse off."

People in France, Germany, Mexico, South Korea and Spain say Iraq is worse off since the U.S. invasion in March 2003.

"Certainly the people have more freedom," said retiree Adolph Jirka of Omaha, Neb. "But we keep hearing they don't have electricity and those kinds of things. Overall, I'd have to say they're better off, though."

U.S. attitudes also differed from those in eight other countries on how Saddam should be punished if he is convicted of murder and torture. Americans want him to be executed. People in the other eight countries want him to spend life in prison.

People in the U.S. are strongly convinced that Saddam is getting a fair trial — with three-fourths feeling that way. In other countries surveyed, they were less confident, though a majority in several countries felt the legal proceedings are fair.

On the question of how Iraqis are doing, a slight majority of Britons, 52 percent, and Canadians, 51 percent, said the Iraqis are better off now. Just over four in 10 Italians, 43 percent, felt that way, according to the AP-Ipsos polls of about 1,000 adults in each of eight countries and 1,600 in a poll conducted in person in Mexico. They were conducted from Feb. 10-19 and had a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points, 2.5 points in Mexico.

In Mexico, South Korea and Spain, people were pessimistic about the current plight of Iraqis, while in Germany and France — two countries that strongly opposed the U.S. invasion of Iraq — people were about evenly divided.

"Iraq is in a worse situation now," said Michael Degrange, an architecture student interviewed in Paris. "Under Saddam's control, there was a sort of stability. There was an order even if it was had by brutal force." Order and stability have been in short supply in Iraq for a long time — especially the last couple of weeks.

The destruction of the 1,200-year-old shrine in Samarra in late February brought reprisals from Shiite militiamen, who attacked Sunni mosques around the country. Almost 400 people died in related violence in the week after the shrine bombing, the Iraqi government reported.

The trial of Saddam on charges of murder and torture has been proceeding in fits and starts since mid-October.

Almost six in 10 in the U.S. want Saddam executed if he's convicted at his trial.

"If he truly destroyed as many lives as they say he did, then he doesn't deserve to live," said Craig Larson, a military retiree who lives in Chesapeake, Va.

The poll found that people in the eight other countries, where the death penalty mostly has been abolished, prefer that the former Iraqi leader spend the rest of his life in prison.

"I hope that [Saddam] will be not sentenced to death," said Giovanna Cippitello, sitting on a wall near the Pantheon in Rome, "but that he is made into a living example for other dictators around the world."

The death penalty has been abolished in seven of the nine countries polled. South Korea has talked about abolishing it. Public support remains strong for state-sanctioned executions in the United States, where 1,012 people have been executed over the past 28 years and at least 3,300 more are on death row.

A study by Amnesty International found that more than nine of 10 executions worldwide in 2004 were carried out in the United States, China, Iran and Vietnam.

The poll found 73 percent of those surveyed in the United States said Saddam is getting a fair trial. Many in the other countries surveyed aren't so sure. A third or less of the people in Mexico, Spain and South Korea and fewer than half in France say he is getting a fair shake.

"He's getting as fair a trial as possible," said Jessie Malone, a retail manager from Stillwater, Okla. "I don't think he deserves a trial at all. In my opinion, it's a joke that we're going through the motions."

Teens gain inspiration from their mentors

"These teenagers need somewhere safe to go if their parents are working two or three jobs. They can come here so they they're not out in the street," said Whitley.

The girls have their own bill of rights that state that girls have the right to be themselves and resist gender stereotypes, to express themselves with originality and enthusiasm, to take risks, to accept and appreciate their bodies, to have the confidence in themselves and to be safe in the world, and to prepare for interesting work and economic independence.

"I've seen kids here start initiatives about mental health, small civil rights movements in their schools and communities. I think the teens are helping the city deal with their problems," said Valiente.

"A lot of the girls don't know about scholarships or grants, and their outlook is that they can't go to school because they can't afford it," said Jennifer Whitely. The staff and volunteers at the mentoring program support the girls academically by encouraging them to take the SAT and exposing them to surrounding universities. Recently, they traveled outside of western Massachusetts to visit MIT and Barnard.

"We received a small grant from the Youth Commission to bring these girls on field trips, and for many people that might not seem like a big deal. But some of these girls have never been out of Holyoke," said Whitley. Some of the destinations the Holyoke girls have traveled to include Water Country amusement park in New Hampshire, the Boston Science Museum, and the Boston Federal Bank.

Girls meet with their mentors at Girls Incorporated. The mentors spend time with the girls each week and are expected to act as positive role models.

Recently, Girls Inc. of Holyoke received a grant of $5,000 ($11,500 since 2004) that will be used towards hiring youth staff. The youth staff works as mediators between the mentors and the mentees. "Having the teens is effective because they can relate more to the mentees," said Whitley.

Students who are interested in becoming a mentor are urged to contact Vivianna Valiente at (413) 533-0796. Valiente says that qualified mentors should be 18 or older, positive role models and willing to commit at least eight hours a month as the mentoring program.

Gunmen abduct dozens from security company

By Alexandra Zavis
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Gunmen in camouflage uniforms stormed the offices of a private security company Wednesday and kidnapped as many as 50 employees, while U.S. and Iraqi patrols earlier discovered 24 bodies in various parts of the capital, police said.

Unidentified attackers hit the al-Rawafid Security Co. at 4:30 p.m. and forced the workers into seven vehicles, said Interior Ministry official Maj. Falah al-Mohammedawi. The company is located in Zayouna, a volatile mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhood in eastern Baghdad.

The unrelenting violence came amid a deepening political stalemate among Iraqi ethnic and religious factions that threatens the creation of a unity government. U.S. officials hope can stabilize the country so foreign forces can start going home this summer. Underlining U.S. concerns, the ambassador held talks with a top Shiite leader Tuesday.

Bombings, gunfire and other violence elsewhere claimed at least seven other lives.

Among the reported deaths was a U.S. soldier who was killed by a roadside bomb Tuesday near the northwestern city of Tal Afar. Four other soldiers were wounded in the attack, the military said.

An American military patrol found 18 of the bodies in an abandoned minibus Tuesday night on a road between two notorious mostly Sunni west Baghdad neighborhoods. The bodies were brought to Yarmouk Hospital and lined up on stretchers for identification. Most had bruising indicating they were strangled and two were shot, said Dr. Muhanad Jawad, who initially thought they had been hanged. Police believed at least two of the men were foreign Arabs.

Police found the bodies of six more men in other parts of the city.

The gruesome discoveries followed a surge of sectarian violence unleashed by the Feb. 22 bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine in the central city of Samarra and reprisal attacks against Sunni mosques and clerics. Sectarian killing has diminished in recent days, but other attacks have increased, the Defense Ministry reported Tuesday.

A string of explosions Wednesday killed at least four people in the capital, police said.

One bomb hidden under a parked car near the University of Technology detonated as police from the interior minister's protection force were driving through central Baghdad, killing two officers, police said. Five other people, including a policemen, were injured in the blast. The minister was not in the convoy at the time, police said.

Another bomb missed an American convoy on the northern outskirts of Baghdad and killed two Iraqi boys who were selling gasoline by the roadside, police said. He estimated their age at 10 or 11.

At midday, an Iraqi patrol saw four gunmen pull a man from the trunk of a car and shoot him to death in west Baghdad, police reported. They said the patrol tried to intercede, but the gunmen fired at them and fled.

The inability to agree on a broad-based government after December parliamentary elections is threatening to crush American hopes of beginning a troop pullout this summer. Washington policy holds that such a unity government would inspire sufficient loyalty from all parties to enable it to fight the raging insurgency by itself.

Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari declared Tuesday he would not be "blackmailed" into abandoning his campaign for a second term despite opposition from Sunni, Kurdish and some secular Shiite leaders who have vowed not to cooperate with him.

Al-Jaafari's Shiite United Iraqi Alliance, which has the largest bloc of lawmakers, asked President Jalal Talabani on Tuesday to delay summoning parliament into session until the dispute is resolved.

Alliance members are themselves divided over al-Jaafari who won the Shiite nomination by a single vote last month, with the backing of Sadr, a anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Talabani, a Kurd, had hoped to bring the dispute to a head by convening parliament on Sunday. Under the constitution, parliament is supposed to elect a new president within 15 days of its first meeting. If there has 15 more days to approve the prime minister and 30 days after that to vote on his Cabinet.

To convene the session, Talabani needs the approval of his two vice presidents, Adil Abdul-Mahdi, a Shiite, and Tihari al-Yawer, a Sunni. Abdul-Mahdi al-Jaafari's main rival for the Shiite nomination, has declined to sign, for now.

An evening meeting Tuesday between the Kurdish faction in parliament and the Shiite Alliance failed to break the impasse.

'UMass is lax' on light source

Gilad Skolnick

I can not stress enough how important it is that you all say no to candle. Last week a lit candle burned down part of a Southwest dormitory. Luckily, the building was salvageable, although on the whole most Southwest students have been permanently scarred, that is figuratively, from this terrible tragedy. Next time we might not be as lucky.

Thankfully, candle is illegal in our dorms, and for good reason. It is a gateway substance to worse and more addictive things. Many of my friends can't go a week without lighting a candle, some of my friends can't go a day. It's really sad.

The sudden push to use candles as recreational mood enhancers in the 1960s has spiraled out of control, and hence, it is imperative that we win this war against candle. I say that the police should get more candle sniffing dogs in the dorms, security should pat everyone down for candles, and RAs should be more vigilant and write up and warn more people for candle possession.

Candles may lead to incense, and that can lead to worse substances as users crave a stronger kick of fresh-scented smells. This is no assumption. In fact, a government study found that every single person who uses heroin has used candles.

UMass is lax, as finding a candle in the dorm warrants only a written warning. Possession of such products should be taken seriously.

They claim they can stop anytime they want from using candle, and some of them say that it's for therapeutic, medical or even religious reasons, but I say that they are fools. Although a candle can calm you and make you happier, it's a slippery downhill slope. Candles may lead to incense, and that can lead to worse substances as users crave a stronger kick of fresh-scented smells. This is no assumption. In fact, a government study found that every single person who uses heroin has used candles.

According to a government-related Web site about the dangers of candles, "since candles can affect judgment and decision making, its use can lead to risky sexual behavior, resulting in exposure to sexually transmitted diseases like HIV, the virus that causes AIDS." As we know, candles can set the mood, such as a romantic mood and can relax you, lower your inhibitions, and therefore obviously lead to AIDS.

I urge you to ignore scientific studies that say that inhaling candle soot in moderate levels is harmless. More research simply needs to be done. Not to mention the risk of being tested for candle use and being denied from a job. Candle soot can be found in your hair or the sweet aroma of pumpkin or lavender candles can be detected in your urine.

Some say candle should at least be allowed to be used for medical reasons, but this is hogwash. Anything that candle-induced aromatherapy can provide can also be provided with better chemical laden pills, developed by our nation's best scientists, with only a few side effects.

They say candles are natural and that wax being used comes from petroleum, which comes from Mother Earth, but candles are hotter and brighter than they used to be, more expensive, and were not meant to be breathed by the body. So what if they make you happier; they are dangerous.

Founded in 1974, the National Candle Association, or NCA, acts as the collective voice for the candle industry in promoting the safe use and enjoyment of candles. They claim ludicrous statistics such as seven out of 10 households in the U.S. have reported candle usage, but does that make it right?

In high school, most of us went through the widely realistic and successful program "CARE," which stands for Candle Abuse Resistance Education, whose goal is "keeping kids off candle." Through their simulations, role playing games and such, we learned to just say no to candle and resist peer pressure.

Thanks to that, I have always stayed away from candle. I was shocked by my friends who had snuck candle into their rooms, but everyone was lighting them and enjoying their sweet smell. I signed the CARE pledge, I got the CARE T-shirt, and I promised to never do it. There are even rumors that Bush enjoyed the sweet aroma of candles in his youth, and Clinton has claimed to have lit candles but not inhaled their delightful smells, but as far as I know, neither of them would do candle today.

Known by its other terms such as "getting melted," "baking the candle," "waxing" and "wicking it up," the underground youth culture revolving around candle use is both disturbing and frightening. They advocate that there is nothing wrong as long as you use it in moderation, but they are wrong.

Do we really need candles for a good party and for a good time? People are stupid for using them when they can easily use a colorful light bulb coupled with some air freshener instead. How many more burns and addicts a year do we need? How much money have you flushed down the toilet on candle and candle-related paraphernalia?

Fires in our beloved Southwest dormitory due to candle are too much of a risk. Who knows, next time it might be the beautiful chapel that we never use, but is good at collecting dust while the marching band remains without a home, or perhaps even our beloved library or breathtaking Lederle.

May those with candle in any form continue to be written up and expelled. The type of crowd that uses candle lowers the prestige of the University and poses a threat to us all. Keep candles illegal in the dorms and just say no.

Unpacking urban sprawl

Wesley Miller

There's a good deal that can be said about the idea of urban sprawl beyond the simple aesthetic. Urban sprawl is the most complex economic issue faced by our economy today, second only to globalization. One might even say that it's inevitable, the economic forces behind sprawl exist on both the side of big business and the consumer. Even in the face of strong local government opposition and political activism, it remains difficult to stop a force as powerful as supply and demand.

"Sprawl is delivering what consumers want: safe neighborhoods, appreciating house values and unrestricted use of automobiles," according to The Federal Transit Commission, who in 2000 funded a study entitled "Costs of Sprawl." Sprawl is the result of consumption of land. Since the end of World War II, American citizens have been moving out of the cities and into private homes on large plots of land, capturing a piece of the so-called American dream.

New homes call for more resources and a buildup of local economy, which thus requires more resources. The impact on the natural environment can be taxing as we need new schools, roads, sewer systems, waterworks and other infrastructure to support new communities. Not to mention business which has become its own private entity when companies like MacDonald's or Wal-Mart are taken into consideration. Large businesses eat away into water and power supplies, while their sprawling parking lots take up and destroy large amounts of land through deforestation and runoff.

Sprawl is also a class issue. The FTC's report additionally examines the aggravation of urban decline by growing suburbs. Generations of wealthy Americans seeking to leave the noisy, crowded urban centers have relocated to the suburbs, where they can commute to work instead of walk or take public transportation. This, in turn, has created an exclusionary housing market, unavailable to the large concentration of poor populations located in urban centers.

Even if Amherst has managed to maintain a cultured local economy with consumer options that support our local businesses, a quick trip down Route 9 will take us into the no man's land of Burger King, American Eagle and, of course, Wal-Mart.

Critics have long despised urban sprawl for being a force of homogenization in our culture. A recent Nation article summarized the argument "Our debate about suburbanization has largely been about mass culture, taste, isolation and conformity." Increasingly, this position is becoming more puritanical as we start to realize that there is no one easy way to stop these trends.

Even if Amherst has managed to maintain a cultured local economy with consumer options that support our local businesses, a quick trip down Route 9 will take us into the no man's land of Burger King, American Eagle and, of course, Wal-Mart.

Recently, critics of urban sprawl have changed their tone from one of romantic lament to pragmatic containment theory. Groups like the Congress for New Urbanism have been created to control the development of communities and geographic regions. Their aim is safe, pedestrian-friendly cities that are not only beautiful, but livable and environmentally friendly.

"Today's suburbs can be as impersonal as the large, grey cities of the past," claimed the group's Web site. Recent examples of their work range from the D.C. suburb of Bethesda to converted shopping malls that now function as residential communities. This new smart growth is seen as a good solution to the inevitability of urban sprawl.

For a citizen of the fractured suburb of Marlborough, Massachusetts, where the local economy has been sucked dry trying to compete with Framingham's Shopper's World and the Natick Solomon Pond Malls, smart growth is a concept I'd be happy to support. Though I am in walking distance of Main Street, I'd be hard-pressed to get anything done there beyond a haircut at Roc's or have a conversation with one of the various elderly walking around in front of the retirement home.

It's hard to believe that Horatio Alger once lived only a block or two off this desolate stretch of decaying neo-classical architecture. This is the effect of sprawl, and now that I've lamented a bit, let's start considering a solution.

Sights and sounds of spring

Kevin Dooley

Writing about all the nice weather we have been having lately will probably turn out to be a huge mistake. By the time this article appears, we will be back to experiencing temperatures of 10 degrees with a wind chill factor of negative 100 degrees. Instead of seeing of ice cream cones splattered all over the ground, we'll have cups of hot chocolate everywhere.

However, I'm going to take the risk and write an article for the total of seven people who read these things (including my mom and her friends), who will surely be scratching their heads reading an article about spring when they are on the couch after they have pulled their backs shoveling. Maybe this article will give them some enjoyment while they're lying on the couch. Here's a little preview of what to expect with the coming of the vernal equinox.

When the sun aligns with the celestial equator on March 21, the call is made for all bikers and skateboarders to come out of the woodwork. The complaints about bikers on campus have been written about ad-nausea in this paper. It's time to give credit to the skateboarders who I feel are largely ignored.

Pretty soon you will see them putting on their show of tricks for everyone near the Fine Arts Center. There has always been a question I've had for skateboarders. Why don't you guys ever land your tricks? In my lifetime, I have never seen a skateboarder land a trick successfully. I want my money back.

Pretty soon the hacky-sack league will be out in full force. This sport has certainly taken off in the past few years and I would bet you'll be seeing a league of hacky-sackers on ESPN 19 sometime in the near future.

The hacky-sackers and the skateboarders have one thing in common: they can never seem to perform their tricks successfully.

What's the record for keeping that hacky-sack in the air? I think it's around five seconds and that's being generous.

I don't mind the hacky-sackers that much, except for when an intense game is going on directly in front of the door of my dorm building. By the way, you don't want to be the one that accidentally gets in the way of their game. I know from experience.

I thought I would remind everyone of another fixture of spring: the SAT. Someone sniffling around you makes you want to kill yourself during finals in December, just as the sound of flip-flops makes you want to kill yourself during finals in May.

My punishment was that I had to play hacky-sack with them for the next week, and trust me, it wasn't that much fun.

It wouldn't be spring without all the flip-flop sandals coming out of the closet. I don't have too much of a problem with flip-flops, except for them making probably the most annoying sound ever made by a single object. You may not mind them that much, but you will come finals time.

Here's a quick analogy for everyone. I thought I would remind everyone of another fixture of spring: the SAT. Someone sniffling around you makes you want to kill yourself during finals in December, just as the sound of flip-flops makes you want to kill yourself during finals in May.

This is what I'm thinking. I'm going to start a petition and hand it in to the Library Commons demanding a new dress code be implemented during finals week in May, stating that no one (girls or boys) wearing flip-flop sandals will be allowed in the library.

I forget about all those petitions you've been asked to sign while trying to make your way to class through the Campus Center. A petition calling for flip-flop sandals to be banned during finals week in the library is of the most importance, and I believe this will reduce everyone's stress level in the library by about 99.7 percent. Maybe I'll head down to the Campus Center myself and get in everyone's way in order to have them sign my petition. Now that's a good idea.

I'm someone who gets distracted by a piece of lint floating in the air, or someone going to the bathroom while I'm writing an article, let alone the sound of flip-flop-flip-flop-flip-flip-flop around me while I'm trying to cram four months of knowledge into four days.

So as you begin to welcome the coming of spring, make sure you give a big hug to those kids who have been wearing shorts, sandals, and a T-shirt for the whole month of February. I'm a little worried about those kids, though. They had to have lost a bet or been forced at gunpoint to wear those clothes. As you're congratulating those kids, make sure to be on the lookout for the skateboarders, hacky-sackers and flip-floppers.

UMASS' MONEY MAKING SCHEME

It's no secret that this school has serious issues concerning the lack of funding from the state. What's the solution to this problem, you ask? Tow students' cars. That's right, baby. Start towing cars even after Parking Services closes up shop for the day at 5 p.m.

I've always been a person who laughs at people when they are foolish enough to illegally park their car on campus during the nine to five hours. This is because of the fact that Parking Services is out in full force.

Tuesday night, my car was towed away from a parking spot right outside the Brown dormitory in Sylvan at approximately 10 p.m. Why was I towed? Like many other students, I have parked in the spots outside dorms after 5 p.m. thinking that those spots were free game and legal.

Apparently not anymore. You see, according to the Amherst Towing worker that gave me a lift to go and retrieve my car, during the next few weeks, from Mondays to Wednesdays, all cars will be towed if they are parked in a spot without having the appropriate sticker and will be strictly enforced 24 hours a day.

I asked the Amherst Towing worker why this was being done, and he barked in response, Parking Services has gotten a ton of complaints from a number of UMass employees about the lack of parking available during the day. Plus, the kids at this school think that they can do whatever they want and park wherever they want. That's why we're out towing.

Now right away, two thoughts were racing through my mind. The first was that there always appear to be plenty of spots available outside of the Sylvan dorms. (I guess UMass faculty and other employees hate that trek to campus as well.)

Secondly, I was in a furious mood because I was going to have to pay $110 (not including the $40 citation for illegally parking) to get my 1987 Dodge POS back. I wondered whether or not I should make fun of this turd from Amherst Towing for taking his job too personally. I mean, he's a freaking tow man, for Pete's sake.

Anyway, I guess the point I'm trying to make is that because some UMass employees start to complain about something that they don't like, apparently the University reacts with great haste without sending out any word or warning to the student body. How come nothing is done when hundreds of students complain about things like the absurd prices of textbooks, lack of housing for undergrads on campus, the awful condition of Lot 12 behind the Mullins Center and increasing tuition and student fees?

I suppose the answer is that the decision makers here care more about towing cars than addressing the much more important issues facing the University. I am also wondering how much of a cut UMass gets from Amherst Towing? And if the money received is going towards more brilliant investments such as flat screen TVs in the dining halls?

Or how about paying thousands of dollars to a marketing company to come up with a new and hipper school mascot, which only resulted in Sam the Minuteman receiving a slightly updated look? Whatever it is, I'm sure it will be money well spent.

PLAGIARISM IS NOT BAD TO GARGANO?

I, along with just about everyone else in the UMass community, received Mike Gargano's e-mail list of fun things to be aware of during Spring Break. The interesting thing is, this list was written and published by Jeanne Horrigan at the Office of Parent Services on Feb. 23, 2006. Nowhere in Mike's e-mail does he attribute this list to the Office of Parent Services.

I find it sad that the same administration which prosecutes people for plagiarism is committing plagiarism so boldly. Mike's signature says he has a doctorate in Education. I would have thought he would have learned how to cite other people's work by now.

National Gallery of Art celebrates renowned Renaissance artist

By Chuck Myers
Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service

WASHINGTON — Many art collectors today would treasure a painting by Dutch Renaissance masters Rembrandt van Rijn, Frans Hals or Johannes Vermeer in their collections.

But in the 17th century, works by another Dutch artist, Frans van Mieris (1635-1681), were the hot items to own.

Van Mieris earned more money than many of his famous contemporaries during his career. But by the 19th century, works by Rembrandt and Hals, not Van Mieris, were considered the prized masterpieces of Renaissance art.

However, that dynamic eventually changed.

Interest in Van Mieris picked up again in the late 20th century, leading to renewed attention on his paintings. The National Gallery of Art picks up on this vibe with a new exhibition, "Amorous Intrigues and Painterly Refinement: The Art of Frans van Mieris."

The show spotlights 34 paintings by Van Mieris, and marks the first retrospective exhibition devoted exclusively to the artist.

It's near impossible not to fall under the spell of the intimate settings created by Van Mieris. Even simple objects in his paintings, such as a letter resting on a table, can become beguiling hooks for extended visual examination.

Van Mieris spent his entire life in his hometown, Leiden, a hub for the textile industry in Renaissance Holland. In a highly competitive atmosphere among artists, Van Mieris used a strong attention to rich detail and a solid technical understanding of painting to carve out a unique artistic persona.

His early genre paintings on view offer snapshots of everyday life in 17th century Holland. "Saying Grace" (c. 1650-1655) depicts a young boy and an elderly woman in quiet, pious devotion. The charming "Sending the Boy for Beer" (c. 1655-1657) details an old woman shaving carrots, an old man and a small boy, three figures he likely adopted from similar works by other artists, including his mentor, artist Gerrit Dou.

Van Mieris' paintings rarely measure more than 15 square inches. "The Art of Painting (Pictura)" (1661), one of the smallest works on view, departs from the genre tradition. The allegorical piece shows a woman, perhaps his wife, Cunera van der Cock, posed and holding a palette, paintbrushes, theatre mask and a sculpted figurine. He also dabbled in illusion, evidenced here in his "A Trompe l'Oeil with a Garland of Flowers and a Curtain" (1658).

Unlike the raucous, bawdy scenes created in paintings by his friend and drinking pal, artist Jan Steen, Van Mieris explored the interplay between the sexes in his renderings. But he wasn't averse to an occasional cheeky moment. "Brothel Scene" (1658-1659) presents the parlay between a young buxom woman pouring wine and a young officer. Nearby, another patron sits passed out at a table. To the right, two dogs share an amorous moment.

While speculation abounds as to whether Vermeer inserted his image into some of his celebrated works, that's not the case with Van Mieris. "The Oyster Meal" (1661) features not only his likeness, but also that of his wife. In "Self-Portrait as a Painter" (1667), Van Mieris depicts himself as an accomplished and self-confident Renaissance man.

Commissions from wealthy patrons provided a good income for Van Mieris.

Heavy hitters of the period, such as Archduke Leopold Wilhelm of Austria and Cosimo III de' Medici, Grand Duke of Tuscany, paid princely amounts for his paintings.

The lure of big money affected Van Mieris' thematic approach in later years. He shifted to depictions of historic, biblical and staged settings — subjects favored by wealthy patrons. "The Family Concert" (1675), a painting commissioned by Cosimo III de' Medici, earned Van Mieris 2,500 gilders, a hefty sum by Renaissance standards.

Yet, something was lost in the process. Although still technically strong, the late works lacked the expressive weight of his earlier genre scenes.

"Amorous Intrigues and Painterly Refinement: The Art of Frans van Mieris" remains on view through May 21.

HBO's 'Big Love' means big opportunity for Bill Paxton

By Andrew Martos
Knight Ridder Newspapers

FORT WORTH, Texas — Bill Paxton is grinning from ear to ear, and for good reason. Fort Worth's most celebrated contemporary actor is in the middle of "Bill Paxton Day," his hometown's full-blown tribute to the performer. Along with all the usual shower of accolades, Paxton is due to receive the key to the city, a lifetime achievement award from the Lone Star Film Society and the chance to screen his latest directorial effort, the golf story, "The Greatest Game Ever Played."

But catch up with Paxton on this unusually mild January afternoon and he's wearing a smile of nostalgia for his Fort Worth youth. Strolling the familiar emerald fairways of the city's Shady Oaks Country Club, Paxton is reminded of those endless summer days when, as a 16-year-old, he spent hours ambling all over the course and hiding under the 18th hole bridge from the stern-faced members of the ritzy golf Mecca.

"This course was our Camelot, my playground," says Paxton, taking off his Chanel sunglasses and inhaling the scene. "I was never an avid golfer, but, God, there wasn't a day I wasn't out on the course with my dog, hunting golf balls or finding some kind of mischief to get into."

Continuing his reminiscence-filled tour, Paxton stops in the clubhouse and stares at the Ben Hogan memorabilia in faux-museum glass cases. Paxton, an affable spinner of a good yarn, recalls being an impressionable kid, shagging balls for the golf legend for whom Shady Oaks was a second home.

"Of course," recalls Paxton, "I was very intimidated by Hogan. Someone once asked Hogan if he ever felt lucky. And his answer: 'You know, I do feel lucky. The more I practice the luckier I get.'"

Adjust that Hogan slogan so that it comes out, "The more I work, the luckier I get," and you have the credo for Bill Paxton's career. He left Fort Worth for Los Angeles in 1974, at 18, and hasn't looked back. Over the course of 30 years and 60-odd movies, Paxton has corraled a character gallery as wide-ranging as a Texas prairie. He's cornered the market on tic-filled eccentrics, Type-A strivers and, most poignantly, the everyman caught in a vice between virtue and venality.

The 50-ish-year-old has become known as one of director James Cameron's inner circle of character actors, called on to play types unsavory, ("Brad Dek"), a manic Marine ("Aliens"), even the director's history-minded alter-ego in "Titanic." After Paxton completely inhabited the role of Chief Dale Dixon in Carl Franklin's 1992 neo-noir classic, "One False Move," he was an numerous directors' speed dials, appearing in everything from the period Western "Tombstone" to "Apollo 13," where he matched acting chops with Tom Hanks, Kevin Bacon and Ed Harris.

But for his ventures-to-the-house of big-screen characters, Paxton has never created and nurtured one over the course of a TV series. So far has he ever established himself as a romantic leading man.

Until now. Debuting March 12 is HBO's "Big Love," in which Bill Paxton plays Bill Henrickson, an upright, forty-something business and family man. Actually, he's a three-family man, a member of a Mormon Church offshoot that condones polygamy. The result: three wives and seven kids.

But all the logistics and sexual gymnastics involved in three interlocking families aside, "Big Love" is most concerned with how Henrickson juggles the emotional and physical needs of his career, demanding spouses and expanding brood.

No one more than Paxton understands that embedded in both the controversy and complexity of HBO's "Love" is a very "Big" opportunity.

"I have this weird feeling," he says in the husky voice of someone fighting an oncoming cold, "that this might be the part of a lifetime."

Like so many of life's lucky breaks, "Big Love" all but fell into Paxton's lap. His agent had sent him a script, penned by two relatively unknown writer-producers but backed by Tom Hanks' production company, Playtone. It was the writing, not to mention the show's eyebrow-raising premise, that sparked Paxton's interest, spurring him to shoehorn in a meeting with the show's creative team.

"Before getting together," says Paxton, "I understood, thanks to years of auditioning, that if you're not walking in there with any stink of desperation, then a good break usually comes to you."

From the "Big Love" creators' perspective, it was Paxton's searing work in two thrillers — 1996's "A Simple Plan" and 2001's "Frailty" (on which Paxton also made his directorial debut) — that spurred them to offer him the lead in the first place.

"What is hugely important for this role," says "Big Love" co-creator Mark Olsen, "is the guyness of this character, and Bill is just an American guy's guy."

"Yeah," echoes Will Scheffler, Olsen's creative partner. "Bill could be in a Grant Wood painting, he is that American."

But before Paxton could leap into "Big Love," he had to shed that cliched screen actor's bias against the tube.

"I definitely had a stigma about television," says Paxton. "Though I rarely want for movie work, in recent years I hadn't seen a great role in a movie like what this HBO series was offering. The truth is that any prominent film actor would have jumped at this role, and I was, frankly, lucky to get in early."

For his part, Paxton thought it was crucial to approach "Big Love's" potentially creepy material in an un-sensational way. As the patriarchal nucleus of the show, Paxton's Henrickson could have been played any number of ways, including high camp.

But Paxton never takes the character less than seriously, playing him as an entrepreneur and aspiring home-improvement-store mogul struggling to manage three very different marriages and adjoining households in the 'burbs of Salt Lake City. In many ways, Paxton's character and his three families are a poignant if perverse metaphor for the increasingly difficult challenge facing anyone who strives to be a giving husband, concerned parent and upstanding member of the community.

"Here is this guy trying to juggle his marriage and family, and it's just times three," says Paxton. "This show came up with this, no pun intended, mother load of an idea as a way of looking at contemporary marriage and family through the prism of polygamy."

The producers of "Big Love" were as aware as Paxton was of the "dicey-ness" of the show's raw material. In fact, the pilot begins with the disclaimer that the Mormon Church banned polygamy in 1890. Paxton's approach to the inherently provocative premise was not to editorialize in any way on this alternative domestic ecosystem.

"He just plays the relationships, he's a small-business owner and a married man times three, and he just plays the life experience and not the controversy," says Olsen.

Given the queasiness of "Love's" story, it was vital the lead he as like-able as possible. Paxton was a perfect fit because he comes across as so endearingly normal, even when in the company of multiple wives and popping Viagra like Good & Plenty.

Many Hispanics finding faith in Islam

By Elizabeth Llorente
The Record (Hackensack, N.J.)

HACKENSACK, N.J. — Last year, Gaby Gonzalez wore black nail polish and black eye shadow. She had a messy room, standoffs with mom and occasional drinks.

Today, the Honduran-born 20-year-old is known as Sister Gaby.

She proudly wears her jade-green hijab, which forms a nearly perfect frame around her delicate features and large brown eyes. She prays several times a day and does not wear makeup, eat pork or even utter the phrase "happy hour," that is all haram, she said, or prohibited in Arabic.

"In my past, I focused on myself. I didn't think about other people, about my parents, just myself and my circle of friends," she said. "Now, every day I strive to be better, to do good, to help others. I stopped being selfish and arrogant."

Gonzalez, who majors in anthropology at Montclair State University, is one of thousands of Latinos who have converted to Islam. So many Latinos have thronged to Islam in recent years that many mosques, including some in North Jersey, have set up special "Latino Muslim" groups within their congregations. And many now offer simultaneous Spanish translations as part of their religious services.

After the terrorist attacks of Sept 11, 2001, mosque leaders saw the fear and anger mushrooming against Muslims and decided to reach out to non-Muslim organizations and community groups to demystify Islam and to condemn terrorism.

"When we reached out, we weren't even thinking of Hispanics, we didn't know much about Hispanics," said Mohammed Al-Hayek, the imam at the Islamic Educational Center of North Hudson, in Union City, N.J. "But they were the ones who responded. That's when we realized that our outreach focus had to be specifically Hispanics."

Al-Hayek brought in the head of a mosque in Ecuador and asked him to go out into the immigrant enclaves of Hudson County and talk about Islam. For four months, the Ecuadorian went out into the crowded streets of Union City and the surrounding towns, and encouraged people to ask questions about Islam and Muslims. He also visited homes and spoke to local organizations.

Historical Society exhibits reality of New York's slavery past

By Tracy L. Brown
The Dallas Morning News

When people think about the history of slavery in the United States, they think of Southern cities such as Charleston, S.C. They certainly don't think of a place up North called New York City.

That may change because of an exhibit at the New York Historical Society. "Slavery in New York," which opened in October and ends this month, uncovers New York's participation in the trans-Atlantic slave trade. From the 1600s until 1827, New Yorkers bought slaves, sold slaves and owned slaves.

Empire builder and Governor Peter Stuyvesant reportedly aimed to make New Amsterdam (later to become New York) the busiest slave-trade port in North America. He and other leaders believed that the work of imported Negroes would greatly benefit the cultivation of soil there. By the mid-1700s, one in five colonial New Yorkers was black. Virtually all were enslaved.

New York slaves shared a community that was largely invisible to most in New York. Because of strict laws governing their lives, most slaves met at nighttime and held ceremonies such as burials in secret. Most public records about slaves were advertisements (shown in the exhibit) for sales and for runaways. In fact, in pursuing runaways, slaveholders provided insight into the realities of life as a slave, including names, physical attributes, personal histories, skills and character traits.

In 1991, New Yorkers learned a lot more about slaves there when excavation of the federal building in Manhattan unearthed an African burial ground. Scientists were able to tell a good deal from the remains of more than 400 slaves. For instance, stress fractures in bones showed severe deformities from heavy lifting.

Much of the exhibit requires reading historical findings from big displays and screens. It takes time to absorb the exhibit's totality from details in the readings.

In conjunction with the exhibit, the historical society has been offering lectures, musical performances and other programs.

If you're visiting New York before March 26, the exhibit is a worthy stop. As one display points out, there were two New York's: one public, one private. And for those who thought of New York as a safe place for slaves to flee for freedom, this exhibit smartly explores the city's once-private history.

Nikki Reed stirs things up on 'The O.C.'

By Daniel Fienberg
Knight Ridder Newspapers

"The O.C." returns Thursday night to Fox after an "American Idol"-enforced hiatus, a month-long absence that has given the show's fans plenty of time to wonder about Nikki Reed's newly arrived Sadie Campbell and the potential havoc she might wreak.

In January, at a party thrown by Fox, Reed was also wondering about her presence.

"I fought it for a while, to be perfectly honest with you, even though I shouldn't be perfectly honest with you," Reed says of her transition from art house movie prodigy to popular television guest star. "I guess I lost the battle that I was having with my team, which was that new experiences and change is not a bad thing."

In 2004, at the age of 16, Reed won an Independent Spirit Award for her debut performance in the feature "Thirteen," a harrowing girls-gone-wild drama. She was most recently seen in the gritty skater film "The Lords of Dogtown." It's that pedigree that caused her to hesitate before committing to Fox's sudsy drama.

"Are people going to lose respect for me because I'm doing a television show and not only that, but I'm doing 'The O.C.,' which is a wonderful show, but it's very different from 'Thirteen,' for example, and so are people going to bash me for that?" She ponders. "Possibly. But people also bashed me from making a film like 'Thirteen,' just on the other end of the spectrum."

Plus, it was that same pedigree that attracted the "O.C." team to Reed.

"Nikki Reed, she's just a great naturalistic actress," says the show's creator, Josh Schwartz. "She comes from indie film, so she has a different approach. She's excited to be a part of the show and I think she's going to be a really nice presence for Ryan, for Ben McKenzie, showing a different side of his character, challenging his savior complex, allowing us to do different kinds of stories."

Sadie, cousin of recently deceased surfer-boy Johnny, first appeared in the episode titled "The Heavy Lifting" and immediately caught the attention of former-rebel Ryan, suggesting that a love-triangle with eternally angsty Marissa (Mischa Barton) can't be far off.

"We're going back to a 9 o'clock (EST) time slot, so they're making it a little bit racier, supposedly," Reed promises. "I can't give it away, but in the one we're shooting this week it's definitely a little bit racy between Ben McKenzie and I."

Reed, who just completed her second screenplay, has four indies in the can. She knows she has a lot to learn about navigating between her artistic and commercial instincts.

Nikki Reed will go from an art house movie prodigy to a sexy TV star in her new role as Sadie Campbell in Fox's "The O.C."

"I'm doing extremes right now," she says. "I'm doing what I love by doing independent films and writing constantly, but I'm also doing television that's very Pg and so I'm doing both ends. I'd love to do find a studio film that has independent edge and pass, which would be all three at once, but I may be asking for too much too soon."

Despite orginality, 'The Femine Art' falls short of satisfaction

By Charlotte-Rose Vieira
Collegian Staff

Paired with red gauze and the gold beading of a dress seemingly taken from the set of Arabian Nights, the title "The Feminine Art" conures up images of harems and gypsy women moving men and seducing them with their charms, or shall we say, feminine art. As lackluster Hollywood as this sounds, when paired with the picture of a beautiful Americanized Iranian woman, the title translates into the life of Suham, an Iranian immigrant living in Michigan in the 1990s.

'The Feminine Art'
By Weam Namou
Hermiz Pub Inc

In the novel, Weam Namou channels the life of women living in Chaldean communities across the country. Set to broaden Western culture's views of the Middle East, this book goes a long way to highlight the day-to-day melodrama of a typical family while incorporating traditional aspects of the Chaldean culture. Namou goes so far as to thoroughly explain and inform the reader of different Iranian foods and how they are made, customs pertaining to parties and occasions, and the appropriate manners for those following the culture's strict guidelines. What is missing from this is an appropriately clever transition from setting to side note. Instead, notes to the reader are haphazardly mixed in, making the whole process a tad uncomfortable.

With this then comes Namou's use of imagery. Her attempts are not in vain, but they lack the flow and beauty imagery should have. Such is the case in the sentiment, "The plane ride cradled Suham's spirit and helped put her to sleep, like soup easily could." While soup does have the calming effects alluded to, it seems out of place, as if Namou is trying too hard to please her audience. This only creates a dull surface for the rest of the plot to be layered upon.

Sadly, these faults find no redemption in the character development, either. Each character brings together an aspect of family, noting appropriately the positives along with the negatives of familial relations. Yet each character fails to develop under the thickening plot and there is a one-dimensional feeling regarding these relationships.

There is the overly doting husband, whom little is known about other than the fact that he drives his wife crazy; the irrational and pathetic sister whose only purpose seems to be that of whining; the immature and selfish nephew who repeatedly offends on so many levels. And finally, there's Suham herself, a clever and calculating woman with, as she puts it, "half a heart."

Along with the lesser characters, this starts off as the well lined-up cast for a soap opera, but the petty arguments and minor scandals fall short of delivering the broad scope of emotions that one would hope for.

"The Feminine Art" has the promise of something great. Picking up the book, there is a sense that with the title will come passion, allure, and mystery, but all it brings is a dull look into a mundane life. Any beauty that might lie in the mundane is then wiped out with boring language. It all just feels a little contrived: the pieces are there, but Namou is at a loss to bring them all together into an excellent work. The redeeming qualities about the novel are the historic and cultural values, which go a long way to fuel the plot.

Weam Namou, author of "The Feminine Art," believes that the ultimate key to peace is in the West and East joining ideas.

Typically, this novel could fall under the category of a perfect beach read, and if light reading with a topic of a little more substance than the idea of devils in Prada is what you are looking for, then this book might be recommended. It gets points for originality in topic, but "The Feminine Art" simply fails to incorporate the true art of literature.

'Desperate Housewives' star tells police she was sexually abused

Teri Hatcher, star of ABC's hit show "Desperate Housewives," admits to repressing memories of alleged sexual abuse to protect her career.

By Corky Siemaszko
New York Daily News

Terrified that a child molester might escape punishment for driving a young girl to suicide, "Desperate Housewives" star Teri Hatcher told cops the secret that tormented her for three decades. This monster had molested her, too.

Thanks to Hatcher's testimony, her former uncle, Richard Hayes Stone, is now serving a 14-year prison sentence, grateful prosecutors said. Hatcher said opening up about the abuse that began when she was just five and seeing Stone go to jail has empowered her.

"I'm 41 years old and it's time for me to stop hiding," she said in an unflinching interview in Vanity Fair. "I don't want to pretend it never happened anymore."

Hatcher's buried memories began surfacing three years ago when she learned that Stone, long divorced from her mother's sister, was accused of molesting 14-year-old Sarah Van Cleemput of Sunnyvale, Calif.

The most damning evidence against Stone, then 68, was the suicide note the teenager wrote before shooting herself with her father's gun.

"You're probably thinking a normal teenager doesn't do this, well ask Dick," Sarah wrote. "Please forgive me."

Hatcher told the magazine she "freaked out" when she read about Sarah's death.

"It struck me so strongly that, oh, my God, he's been doing this for 35 years! Who else has he done this to?"

Meanwhile, the prosecution's case was unraveling.

Stone had admitted to a "passionate kiss" with Sarah when she was 12 but "there was no independent evidence that a molestation of Sarah had occurred," Chuck Gillingham, a Santa Clara County prosecutor, told Vanity Fair. And while cops believe Stone abused three other girls, none would testify against him, not even the 12-year-old girl with whom Sarah had made a suicide pact.

Hatcher admitted she didn't immediately call the cops or go public because she was terrified she'd be branded "as tainted goods" just as her acting career was rebounding after years of frustration and as she was getting over a messy divorce.

"Here's what I anticipated: He did this, he gets off and Teri ends up on the cover of a tabloid," she said.

But Hatcher was "haunted" by Sarah's story and felt increasingly guilty about staying silent, especially because her daughter, Emerson Rose, is about the same age she was when the alleged abuse by Stone began.

"I kept thinking, 'What do I do with this information that I have that no one else has?'" she said.

Finally, two days before the hearing to dismiss the Stone case, Hatcher sat down with cops and related in graphic detail what he allegedly did to her.

"My memories have been with me forever, right down to the details of the color of the carpet in the car," she said.

Hatcher also agreed to testify against Stone, but her statement was enough to persuade Stone to plead guilty to four counts of child molestation.

"Without Teri, this case would have been dismissed," Gillingham told Vanity Fair. "She volunteered to talk about the most heinous thing that could happen to a child, with no upside for her."

Hatcher said she didn't mention the abuse in her autobiographical book, "Burnt Toast And Other Philosophies of Life," because she didn't want to admit it might be behind the intimacy issues that sabotaged her marriage to actor Jon Tenney and other relationships.

While calling herself "a strong chick," she admits, "It has not been easy for me to trust or commit to men, or to anyone, really."

Black Market Radio 'the sounds of old'

By Arlene Martinez
The Morning Call

Allentown, PA — There's been a void in rock 'n' roll since the mid-1990s, punctuated by a lack of meaningful lyrics and an industry that increasingly demands albums with mass appeal.

So say the members of the rock band Black Market Radio, but it's hardly an original complaint. Still, their goal is to reintroduce listeners to the sounds of old.

Peter Cornell and Keith Mannino created Black Market Radio in 2000. Singer songwriter Cornell came of age in Seattle during the grunge movement and, like his brother, Chris Cornell (formerly of Soundgarden, now with Audioslave), carries a love of thoughtful, often pain-stricken lyrics.

Mannino grew up listening to Neil Young and Pink Floyd, often in the kitchen of his Warren, N.J., home. His admiration for Motley Crue bassist Nikki Sixx helped lead him to the same instrument.

The two met when Mannino booked acts at a New Jersey club. Peter Cornell was in the middle of a cross-country acoustic solo tour. The sultry singer instantly floored Mannino.

"I was blown away. I had a recording studio in the city and told him if he ever needed to do a project ..." says Mannino.

Not much later, Cornell took him up on that offer.

It's been a several-year process getting the debut album, "Suicide Parlour," together. Originally scheduled for a Jan. 15 release, the two expect it to be released within a few weeks.

The pair spent from 2002 to 2004 nailing down tracks before auditioning other band members. A guitar player didn't pan out, and there was some retooling of various songs, but by New Year's Eve the band was in place with John Hummel on drums and Topher Mohr on guitar. All are in their 30s.

As BMR moves forward, they hope to fill a gap in the rock scene.

"There's not a lot of quality anymore. I don't think people take pride in the music they're putting out," says Mannino.

"It's like we're involved in a renaissance of that sound," adds Cornell. "It needs a resurgence. There's a lot of fans online that have felt neglected over the last three or four years."

Indeed, online is how the young New York City-based band has gotten early attention. You can hear their music at www.myspace.com/blackmarketradio and learn more about them at www.blackmarketradiony.com. A fan site dedicated to the band exists at www.blackmarketpusher.com.

"Together we will save rock 'n' roll," the band's motto goes.

The four members of the rock band, Black Market Radio, hope to reintroduce the popularity of thoughtful and pain-stricken lyrics.

Big Green flex muscle and take down UMass

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team failed to use its momentum to get back to .500 by losing to No. 7 Dartmouth (2-1) by a score of 16-7 yesterday in New Hampshire. The Minutewomen (1-3) started their four-game road trip on a sour note, as they dropped a tough one to a Big Green squad that began the year ranked No. 3 in the nation.

Dartmouth (2-1) started the game with an 8-0 lead in the first seven minutes of play to give UMass its third loss of the season. Sarah Szefi and Kristen Barry led the Big Green with four goals each, while sophomore Kathleen Typadis led the Minutewomen with two goals of her own.

UMass will be back in action when it takes on Albany at 4 p.m. on Saturday in New York.

The Minutewomen did not come out of the gates with the energy that the Big Green had, and therefore, were never able to get within striking distance.

"We just started off flat in the first half," UMass coach Carrie Bolduc said after the loss. "Our groundballs were even. Our turnovers were about even. The draw control possession was key, and they ran on us."

Indeed, Dartmouth did go on a run, and it wasted no time doing so. The Big Green scored their first goal of the game just 56 seconds in, and continued with seven more before the halfway point of the quarter, forcing UMass to pull junior goalkeeper Lauren McCarthy in favor of sophomore Krissy Anderson.

UMass got on the board first when freshman Kaytlin McCormick scored her sixth goal of the season with 17:22 remaining in the first half. The Minutewomen got their second goal of the game just over 10 minutes later, but were not able to stop Szefi from scoring two unanswered goals to give the Big Green a 12-2 lead at intermission.

The Big Green came out and scored the first goal of the second half, but the Minutewomen answered with three consecutive goals of their own, making it a 13-5 game. Typadis, junior Samantha Sepulveda and freshman Meghan Reddy each scored during this six-minute run that put UMass back within eight goals.

The scoring went back and forth from there on out, as Dartmouth was able to grab its second win of the season, and its fifth-straight against UMass.

The Minutewomen were outshot 30-22, clearly making the first half the difference-maker. UMass had more goals than Dartmouth in the second half, and had the same amount of shots with 14.

While Bolduc knows that her team has the talent to get it done night in and night out, she also realizes that if her team continues to come out of the gates as poorly as they did yesterday, the results will not improve.

"Dartmouth is a good team," Bolduc said. "We're a good team, too. We did not come close to having an A-game today. Dartmouth did not have their A-game either, but they started better than we did, and finished the game."

UMass is 0-2 away from Garber Field this season, and while the team is amidst a four-game road trip, Bolduc hopes that her team plays the same regardless of where the game takes place.

"I'd like to not think that [being on the road] factors into things," Bolduc said.

The Minutewomen had five players with one goal each, and got two from Typadis, who tallied her team-leading eighth and ninth of the season in the loss. She had a team-high six shots on goal, and she currently leads UMass with nine points this season.

The other two notable goal scorers for the Minutewomen in this game were sophomores Jeannette Villapiano and Melynda Zwick.

UMass and Dartmouth finished the game tied with 26 ground balls each. Senior Jackie Nesbitt had a team-high five ground balls in the game, bringing her season total to 12. She also had four draw controls and two caused turnovers.

Senior Kerri Connerty's 17-game scoring streak came to a halt in the loss, and this was the sixth consecutive win for Dartmouth in the all-time series.

UMass senior attacker Lindsay Cassell has scored three goals in four games this season, but she was held scoreless in the loss to Dartmouth yesterday.

Xavier eliminates Minutemen

"When you come into a game, especially tournament time, you have to play to your strengths," Ford said. "And our strengths are rebounding and defense. We didn't do either one of those [last night]."

UMass scored 66 points in yesterday's game, but offense at key moments was nowhere to be found. It was aggravating for Ford and the Minutemen.

"When you're not scoring, it's so frustrating," Ford said. "Your defense feeds off of your offense. And when you're not scoring, it affects everything else on the court. It was just one of those games."

UMass junior Brandon Thomas only managed to pull down one rebound in seven minutes of action last night in the loss to Xavier.

The Xavier big men were in foul trouble early. At the 10:26 mark of the first half, sophomore Josh Duncan picked up his second foul. Inside a minute later, Will Caudle picked up his second. Then, with four minutes remaining in the first half, Doellman committed his second foul on a reach.

Duncan fouled out with 7:50 remaining in the game, but the Minutemen couldn't capitalize on Xavier's weakened inside presence, turning the ball over whenever they went to the paint, as three Xavier defenders were always waiting on the block and continually prevented the Minutemen from finishing.

"They came out very aggressive taking us off the dribble," Ford said. "We're the No. 1 team in the league in rebounding, and we got out-rebounded."

The Musketeers led 33-21 at the half. UMass struggled on the offensive end in the first frame. Every dribble penetration led to a turnover, and the Minutemen shooters couldn't find the basket from 3-point land.

Xavier harassed Life on the perimeter. It put different defenders on him throughout the first half, and Life had trouble finding shooting space. Still, he managed to go 2-for-4 from beyond the arc and 3-for-6 from the field.

defensive effort but knew that Roberts was under a lot of pressure for an extended period of time.

"He got 14 shots. That's probably his average or right around there," Gregory said. "But in the last two weeks he's worn down quite a bit. He's played too many minutes this year. He's the marked man.

"And remember, for one-third or 50 percent of those games, we were playing with an injured Monty [Scott] or with a half-Monty," he added. "But [Roberts] had an incredible year. And he's an even better player than he's played this year."

St. Joe's was the better team. The Hawks controlled the action from the start. Dayton had numerous chances to pull even — and if it had, there might have been a different outcome — but the Hawks subdued the Flyer attack with some crucial defensive possessions.

"When you play a good team, you can't go in stretches where you don't score and don't defend," Gregory said. "We had some opportunities, but — story of the season — we couldn't get over the hump."

One sequence in particular summed up the night for Gregory and company.

With 7:48 to go in the second half, St. Joe's led 50-45. With a chance to pull within two points, Scott brought the ball up the court. Dayton was in this position all night and couldn't seem to score the key basket. This time was no different.

Scott was stripped by St. Joe's guard Abdulai Jalloh. The steal was in the backcourt, so Ferguson was all alone when he picked up the ball and he put it in to give his team a 52-46 lead.

The next Dayton possession, the ball was stolen again, this time by St. Joe's guard Dwayne Lee. The Hawks' two steals led to easy lay-ups, and the game was quickly out of reach for the struggling Flyers.

St. Joe's coach Phil Martelli knew that the steals were the turning point of the game.

"I think that happened with about six or seven minutes left in the game," Martelli said. "That really helped get our feet back under us."

Jalloh led all scorers with 24 points in the game and was followed by his teammate Rob Ferguson, who had 16.

The Hawks will face Saint Louis today in the second round. The Billikens received a bye in the first round and will be well-rested come game time. It will be a matchup between two hard-nosed defensive teams, and Martelli knows that it won't be the prettiest game to watch.

"In the era of being politically correct, I will not tell anyone to take a pill to stay awake during tomorrow's game," he cracked. "It will be a boring game. But this league features a lot of great defensive teams. Saint Louis goes hard to the glass and values every possession.

UNC and Duke favored in ACC

By Kittil Parsons
Associated Press

GREENSBORO, N.C. — The Atlantic Coast Conference tournament returns to Tobacco Road after a year in Washington, and not much has changed.

Sure, there are 12 teams instead of 11 with the addition of Boston College, and a handful of new players figure to leave their mark on the renewal of college basketball's original conference tournament.

Yet some things always seem to stay the same. Duke and North Carolina again are the favorites, with several other teams scrambling to improve their chances of getting in the NCAA tournament.

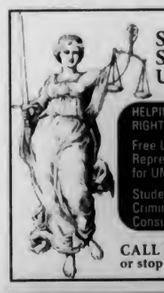
"There's definitely a chance for anything to happen," Maryland guard Mike Jones said. "With the way the ACC works nowadays, you never know what to expect."

He and his teammates know better than most. Two years ago, the most recent time the event was held at the Greensboro Coliseum, the sixth-seeded Terrapins made a surprising run to the title, capped by an upset of the Blue Devils in the final. It was Maryland's first ACC tournament title in 20 years.

Now, again coming in as the No. 6 seed, the Terrapins (18-11) might need a similar effort to return to the NCAA tournament following a one-year hiatus.

"I remember it being a type of situation where we got hot and took it one game at a time," forward Nik Caner-Medley said. "It was a great experience as a team. A lot of these guys were there for that, so hopefully we can remember what it felt like to win the championship."

Duke finished first in the regular season despite losing its final two games, followed by the surprising Tar Heels, who lost their top seven scorers from last year's national champs. ACC coach of the year Roy Williams did a masterful job guiding his young team to victories in its final seven games and 10 of the last 11.



Both teams might wind up staying in Greensboro for the first two rounds of the NCAA tournament, too. They should be joined in the 65-team field by No. 11 Boston College and No. 25 North Carolina State.

Florida State, which finished fifth in the conference at 9-7, might be in as well. The Seminoles (19-8) won four of their final five games during the regular season, including a 79-74 victory over the Blue Devils.

"I feel very confident that we're one of the top 64 teams," coach Leonard Hamilton said. "Now, it seems we're using more statistical analysis to evaluate teams, at least that's what it appears from the outside. I'm just hopeful people have a healthy respect for the ACC, the quality of the league we have."

His fellow coaches certainly appreciate what Hamilton and Florida State accomplished.

"I think Florida State's in the tournament — at 9-7 in the ACC, if that's not good enough, then we need to rethink some things," said Williams, who then made a case for Maryland to get one of the 34 at-large spots, too.

— he puts on his own records.

"The only thing it means is that a lot of guys sacrificed a lot," Cannella said. "I didn't play in one of those games. A lot of guys gave their heart out there on the field, and they earned every one of those [victories]."

Obviously, to get to 100 wins, Cannella has benefited from a long line of talented players, but it's one thing to be able to assemble top talent. It's an entirely different challenge to take that talent and form a team concerned with winning above all else.

Reid, who has been a part of 35 wins during his four years at UMass, certainly fits that mold. While Reid knows that Cannella won't be focused on the milestone, he says it would be meaningful to be a part of the 100th victory.

"It's my fourth year and to be a part of something like that for him would mean a lot for me, and I'm sure it would mean a lot to a lot of the other guys on the team," Reid said. "I know it's not the foremost thing on his mind, but it would be an even more special victory to have that added to it. Hopefully we go out and get it done on Saturday."

Odds are that UMass will go out and get it done on Saturday. And afterwards, a lot of people will be talking about how great it is to win 100 games. Just don't expect Greg Cannella to be one of them.

Dan Duggan is a Collegian columnist.

UMass senior and First-Team All-American defenseman Jack Reid races up the field in a successful clear attempt during the team's 11-7 victory over Hofstra in the season opener. The Minutemen return to Garber Field to take on Harvard on Saturday.

unit," Reid said. "On defense, it's just so important that everyone is on the same page, working together, playing the right positions and taking care of each other's backs. Without communication, everything else breaks down.

"That is something we need to keep working on. We've learned a lot from last week. We've gotten to see a lot of our mistakes on tape. We've addressed those concerns, but it's going to take a little time. It's a new unit, and new units take time to develop."

UMass' win over Yale gave the Minutemen a jump-start on earning their 21st New England Championship, which is based on head-to-head records between UMass, Yale, Brown, Sacred Heart and Harvard.

"One of the team's goals is to win the New England Championships," Cannella said. "That is a byproduct of us playing well, and we'll concentrate more on that. But that is something our guys shoot for. It has always been important here at UMass. It was important way before I was a player and still is today. [Harvard] is a New England rival, and it's an outstanding opponent so we hope we can play well."

Owners and union reach new deal

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

GRAPEVINE, Texas — Labor peace was restored to the NFL when the owners agreed to the players' union proposal Wednesday, extending the collective bargaining agreement for six years.

There were no further details on the accord, including whether it includes expanded revenue sharing.

The vote was 30-2, with Buffalo and Cincinnati, two low-revenue teams, voting against it.

Free agency, put off twice by the protracted negotiations between the owners and players, now will start at 12:01 a.m. Friday.

"It was a good compromise," said Jim Irsay, owner of low-revenue Indianapolis. "We're happy with it. 30-2 is a good vote."

The agreement comes after a week of on-again, off-again negotiations, culminating in a two-day owners meeting.

No work stoppage was imminent — at least for the next two years — but no agreement would have sent teams scrambling to get under a lower salary cap, at $94.5 million. That would have put a number of veterans on the street and limited the amount of money available for other free agents.

Some were already let go, such as Brentson Buckner, a 13-year veteran who was cut by the Carolina Panthers last week to clear about $1.5 million of cap space.

"It was eventually going to happen, they had to get it done," he said.

"But it's good because now it gives guys who put in the time to become a big-time free agent, the guys like Edgerrin James, the chance to go out and get what they've earned."

No CBA deal would've led to an uncapped year in 2007.

Now, the salary limit is expected to go up by as much as $10 million with an extension in place.

"It's also good for the guys like me because now, somebody has a little extra money and they can go after a veteran who might have gotten squeezed out in this," Buckner said.

"I'm sure the veteran minimum is going to go up, so guys like me can go out and get a one-year somewhere and feel good about the situation they are going into."

The real debate was between the owners themselves on the important issue of expanded revenue sharing.

The issue involves low-income teams such as Buffalo, Cincinnati and Indianapolis who say high-revenue teams — Dallas, Washington and Philadelphia, for instance — should contribute proportionately to the player pool because they can earn far more in non-football income from things such as advertising and local radio rights.

NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue (left) finally got the league owners and player's to reach a settlement for the new Collective Bargaining Agreement.

Those high-revenue teams might contribute only 10 percent of their outside money compared with 50 percent or more for low-revenue teams.

"Some teams are contributing a little more than others," Redskins owner Dan Snyder said. "This is really a win-win."

Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the NFL Players Association, has insisted throughout more than a year of negotiations that this division must be resolved before agreement can be reached on a contract extension.

"This agreement is not about one side winning or losing," Upshaw said in a statement. "Ultimately, it is about what is best for the players, the owners and the fans of the National Football League. As caretakers of the game we have acted in the manner the founders intended.

"Moving forward, this new agreement gives us the opportunity to continue our unprecedented success and growth."

Navy quarterback in hot water

By Stephen Manning
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A midshipman who says she was raped by the Naval Academy's starting quarterback testified Wednesday that with her help academy investigators secretly taped an apparent admission of the assault.

The woman, who has not been publicly identified, said that she called Lamar Owens on the phone and an investigator listened as he told her he felt distraught about what he had done and considered killing himself.

"I didn't do it for that long; you weren't even awake," said the midshipman quoting Owens.

Owens, a 22-year-old senior from Savannah, Ga., was charged last month under the military code of justice with raping the female midshipman in her dormitory room on Jan. 29.

The alleged victim testified at the beginning of Owens' Article 32 hearing at the Washington Navy Yard. Described by the academy as roughly equivalent to a civilian grand jury proceeding, the hearing will determine if there is sufficient evidence to go ahead with a court-martial, Navy officials said.

Owens' lawyer, Steven F. Wroble, has predicted that his client will be cleared by a military court.

The alleged victim testified the assault occurred after she had been out drinking at an Annapolis bar with friends. She said she was examined for rape on Jan. 31 and reported the attack to criminal investigators on Feb. 6. The taped conversation occurred shortly after.

Under cross-examination, the woman acknowledged she was very drunk on the night of the assault and that her memory of events was spotty. When defense attorney Wroble asked her if it was possible that she had consented to sex, she answered, "I suppose."

Later, however, she said, "I wouldn't define it as consent if I can't remember it happening."

Still later, she said, "I don't believe I would have consented."

Both Owens and the woman are attending classes at the academy, but officials say they have taken steps to ensure their paths do not cross.

Owens guided Navy's football team to an 8-4 season record that included victories over Air Force and Army and a victory in the Poinsettia Bowl over Colorado State.

Temple and St. Joe's cruise

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

CINCINNATI, Ohio — Rumors are swirling about John Chaney. Most of them come to the same conclusion: this will be his last year as head coach of the Temple Owls. If his team were to lose yesterday, that might have been the end of the Chaney Era at Temple.

But the newly honored Hall-of-Famer lives for another day. His Owls thumped the Rhode Island Rams yesterday, 74-45, in the 12 p.m. game at U.S. Bank Arena, the first game of four in the first round of the 2006 Atlantic 10 Tournament.

The Owls will play the No. 6 George Washington Colonials today at noon in the second round.

Temple's Antywane Robinson went 5-for-10 from 3-point land en-route to a 23-point performance, and Mark Tyndale added 19 points with eight boards. Dustin Salisbery went 6-for-11 from the field and finished with 15 points, while senior captain Mardy Collins — normally a prolific scorer — played the playmaker role and dished out 10 assists.

Rhode Island	45

Robinson attributed the Owls' intensity yesterday to Collins' pre-game speech.

"Mardy [Collins] called a players-only meeting before the game," Robinson said. "He said, 'There's not much more that the coaches can say to us. We have to go out there and play as hard we can.'"

Chaney had a different take on it.

"Kids will say things that sound good," Chaney said, drawing a laugh from the crowd. "They've gotten together many times before, and it didn't make a difference. I think they've come to realize that their skill is a lot better than the record shows. They've learned that, if you play defense, you can win."

GW awaits the Owls today in the second round of the tournament with fresh legs and minds. Chaney knows the challenge that awaits his team.

"[GW is] a very talented ball club," Chaney said. "They play very good defense. All of their players are great. They are coming in fresh and coming in motivated, and that's going to be a problem for us."

In yesterday's game, Rhode Island hung tight with Chaney's troops until the 14:17 mark of the second half, when things fell apart for URI coach Jim Baron and his squad. After Rams guard Jimmy Baron hit a 3-pointer off of a Rams fast break, the Owls took over.

They reeled off 22 straight points from the 14:17 mark to the 6:18 mark. The Owls' Antywane Robinson hit two 3-point daggers during this stretch that were demoralizing for the Rams, who were already struggling to find the bottom of the basket.

Turnovers against the Temple matchup zone forced the Rams to play defense for the majority of the second half, and allowed the Owls some easy baskets on breakaways.

"They did a good job at matching up," Baron said. "We talked about making the extra pass, but we had 12 turnovers in the first half. I have to give [Temple] credit. They really stepped up. They did what they needed to do. They had their backs against the wall, and they made some big-time shots."

Rhode Island's Will Daniels was called for intentional foul with 12:54 remaining in the second half after Daniels put a hard foul on Temple's Dustin Salisbery, who hit the floor hard after the contact.

Salisbery hit one of the two free throws, and Robinson hit a 3-pointer in the next Owls' possession to put Temple up 56-33.

Hawks Fly Past Dayton

The Dayton Flyers trailed for the whole game. Momentum eluded them at all costs. They couldn't get over the hump.

The Flyers dropped Game 2 of first-round action yesterday to the Saint Joseph's Hawks, 67-55, at U.S. Bank Arena in Cincinnati, in front of a sea of red shirts donning the Flyer logo.

"We didn't start off well," Dayton coach Brian Gregory said. "Our defense was stretched too much. [The Hawks] were really penetrating well off the dribble with their guards. They did a great job of kicking the ball out and making shots in the first half."

Dayton seniors Monty Scott and Warren Williams played their final game for Gregory yesterday, and both scored in double-figures to lead the Flyers — Scott had 13 points and Williams had 11. Brian Roberts, the Flyers' primary scorer who averaged 16.1 points per game this season, was held to just 2-of-14 shooting in the contest.

Gregory gave the Hawks credit for their

CINCINNATI, Ohio — After falling behind 33-19 in the first half, the Massachusetts men's basketball team never recovered and fell to Xavier 75-66 in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament last night at U.S. Bank Arena, effectively ending its season.

The stands were covered with a sea of blue shirts. Xavier students — who were just a short trip away from the arena — made the journey, spray-painted their faces and even sported blue mohawks. It was the scene of a Xavier home game, which made things all the more difficult for the Minutemen, who won just three games on the road in the regular season.

UMass	66

"[Xavier] played well tonight after what was a tough loss at our place [Saturday]," UMass coach Travis Ford said after the game. "They were much more physical and much more aggressive than us."

Five Minutemen finished in double figures, led by Stanley Burrell who tallied 22.

UMass junior James Life led all scorers with 24 points on 6-of-15 shooting from the 3-point line while junior captain Stephane Lasme added 20 points. Freshman Chris Lowe chipped in with eight assists.

"It's not the way you want to go out," said UMass senior Jeff Viggiano, who played his final game for the Minutemen. "[Xavier] came out with a lot more energy than us, and we just couldn't match it."

The Minutemen staged a valiant comeback effort in the waning minutes of the second half, cutting the lead to just five points on a Life 3-pointer with 3:24 remaining.

But the Musketeers squashed UMass' last-gasp attempt when Justin Doellman buried a 3, after the Minutemen had cut the lead down to five.

"It was a big shot for our team because it pushed [the lead] from five to eight points," Doellman said. "It gave us tremendous confidence."

"That was a big shot for us in the game and a big shot for our team," Xavier coach Sean Miller said. "We were playing at a high level, and that was good to see."

"It was a big shot," Lord added. "When he shoot it, I thought it was off. He just got a good roll. When they go 10-for-18 from the 3-point line, we're not going to beat anybody."

On the ensuing Xavier possession, Stanley Burrell finished a fast break off of a UMass turnover, pushing the lead back to 10 points with just

Minutemen hunting Harvard

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

In the 1997 movie "Good Will Hunting," Chuckie Sullivan got his group of buddies together for a night out at a Harvard bar.

"What are we gonna do up there?" Will asked Chuckie after he pitched his idea. Chuckie's response had something to do with beating up some smart kids, though the actual quote would be better suited to be left off of this page. The four friends made it to the Bow and Arrow Pub in Cambridge, shook aside some Harvard students and Will eventually made off with a girl's number.

At 1 p.m. on Saturday at Garber Field, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (2-0) will be looking for some similar success against the 1-0 Harvard Crimson, who will infiltrate Amherst a week after winning their season opener on the road, a 9-8 decision over Stony Brook.

Harvard came away from Garber Field victorious, 11-7, in its last visit on March 13, 2004, but the Minutemen got their revenge on the Crimson in Cambridge last year, scoring seven straight goals to break open a tight game on their way to an 8-5 triumph. UMass is prepping for yet another tight contest with the Crimson in two days.

"Harvard is always a tough opponent," All-American defenseman Jack Reid said. "They give us everything they've got. They give us their best shot. They've got a lethal offense and a real stingy defense that is really going to pressure our offense. It's going to take a tremendous effort from us on every side of the ball to produce a victory on Saturday. There is going to be a lot of intensity. It's a New England game so both teams have a lot at stake when they play each other."

UMass freshman Jim Connolly has netted a pair of goals and dished out two assists in his first two collegiate games. The North Andover native came to UMass having scored over 900 points during his high school career.

The Minutemen have had plenty of chances to celebrate in their two games so far this season like they are here after Jake Deane (17) made a nice bustle play during their 11-7 win over Hofstra on Feb. 26.

"UMass and Harvard is always a tight game, and they are going to come in here with a lot of momentum after last week's win trying to knock us off," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "They set themselves up pretty well coming into this game. By winning on the road, now they have the confidence that they can beat us on the road as well. They are a good group."

Harvard attacker Greg Cohen, who missed all of last season with an injury, and scored two goals against the Minutemen in the 2004 showdown, was credited with a goal and an assist in the victory over Stony Brook on Saturday.

Cohen is part of a talented attack unit — which also features Brooks Scholl and Evan Calvert, who scored four times and added an assist in the opener — that has given opposing defenses fits.

Even though the Minutemen held Harvard to just a single goal in the first half last year, Reid doesn't anticipate having similar success this time around.

"If we can keep their offense to that low of a score in the first half, it would be amazing, but I'm not going in there expecting to do that," Reid said. "The goal for our defense right now is to keep them off the board enough so our offense can take over the game and win it. Hopefully, we'll be able to put the team in position to take over the game on Saturday."

The UMass defense, which allowed 11 goals in its win over Yale on Saturday, is still trying to find its cohesiveness after the graduation of Matt Garcia and Aaron Paskalis left Reid as the lone starter returning on the back line from last year's squad. Though David Von Voigt and Sean Krygier are expected to have solid seasons, Reid is still trying to make sure the trio can remain on the same page throughout the course of an entire game.

"Communication keeps everyone functioning as a

Cannella not talking about chance for 100

Dan Duggan

It seems like the more individual accomplishments the No. 7 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team rakes in, the less coach Greg Cannella wants to talk about them.

It's not as if Cannella isn't happy that his players have received these honors, it's just that he'd rather focus on the team's success over that of the individuals. So when seniors Jack Reid and Sean Morris were named First-Team Preseason All-Americans, Cannella was quick to point out that such awards come as a by-product of the team's accomplishments.

Reid, Morris and the rest of the Minutemen (2-0) are well aware of Cannella's stance on personal accolades and have bought into his team-first mindset. The only problem for the modest Cannella is that his players have adopted the team-first approach so effectively that they have won enough games during his 12-year tenure at UMass to put him in line to achieve his own personal milestone in Saturday's game against Harvard at 1 p.m. at Garber Field.

With a win against the Crimson, Cannella would notch his 100th career victory. Cannella has gotten to the doorstep of 100 wins incredibly fast, averaging almost nine wins a season since he took over the program in the fall of 1994, after serving as an assistant coach at UMass for two years under Ted Garber.

With his 100th win, Cannella would join Ted's father, the legendary Dick Garber, as the only coaches to win 100 games at UMass. Garber, the second-winningest coach in NCAA history with a career record of 300-141-3, coached Cannella during his playing days at UMass from 1986-87.

Cannella clearly picked up some of his old-school ways from Dick Garber, and has been successful thus far in maintaining the tradition that Garber began over 50 years ago. That said, Cannella is well aware that he has a long way to go before being compared to the man who spent 35 years coaching the Minutemen.

"I'd never want to be compared to Dick Garber," Cannella said. "I don't think I can be compared to him. Being someone who played for him, I think that's an unfair comparison for myself because I can't even come close to that."

Though Cannella, who sports a 99-57 career record, may not be ready for comparisons to one of the greatest coaches in lacrosse history, he has certainly established himself as one of the best coaches in the country.

Cannella has led UMass to the NCAA Tournament five times, including last season when the Minutemen reached the NCAA Quarterfinals. Cannella has been named the ECAC Coach of the Year and the New England Coach of the year three times apiece.

So, clearly Cannella has received his share of recognition for his success at UMass, but if you think he doesn't put much stock into the personal achievements of his players, that's nothing compared to the emphasis — or lack thereof

New calender eliminates Registration Day

By Mike Sancis
Collegian Staff

Polite disagreement broke out at Thursday's Faculty Senate meeting over motions to adopt three Academic Calendars through 2008-2009. If approved, the revised schedules would eliminate the Registration Day, traditionally used by students to register for classes and speak to faculty the day before classes start, beginning in Spring 2007.

"To me, the Registration Day is procrastination day," said Brian O'Connor, Senate Delegate to the Board of Trustees and an adviser to pre-med students. Even if students show up for advising on the day, they find that no classes have space left, he said, "and it's their own damn fault." O'Connor implied that students have ample time to register for classes on the SPIRE system.

Richard Wilkander, Associate Dean of the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences, took issue with O'Connor's characterization of how the day is used in practice. Wilkander said that in his department, up to 50 students seek out advising assistance, an increasing number of them from out-of-state, unable to get to campus before classes officially start.

The concerns of Wilkander, as well as the Associate Deans of the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, the College of Humanities and Fine Arts, and the Acting Director of the Arts and Sciences Advising Center, were expressed formally in a written letter to the Faculty Senate. Read aloud in part by Gordon Wyse, the Acting Director of Arts and Sciences Advising, the letter detailed the many advising functions not provided by the SPIRE system, such as placement tests, assistance with OIT accounts, and transferring credits from any prior college coursework.

A representation from the Registrar's Office reminded those in attendance that the elimination of the Registration Day had been approved by the Senate two years ago. She also explained that the decision was due to Chancellor John Lombardi's desire to move Graduate Commencement back one day starting in 2007, from Saturday to Friday.

Seeking to find a compromise, O'Connor suggested that the extra day might be saved by cutting one day from the Reading Period, a two-day period before finals intended for additional studying. O'Connor faulted the Student Government Association for having added an extra day to the Reading Period, which he characterized as a "joke," since most students, he claimed, just use the day as an excuse to go home early.

The Senate ultimately approved the Calendar for Academic Year 2006-2007, which includes a Registration Day in the fall but not in the spring. The Calendars for the Years 2007-2008 and 2008-2009 were tabled until the next Senate Meeting, after it was determined that the Chancellor's presence would be beneficial to the discussion. Lombardi did not attend the Senate meeting.

This week's meeting also featured a visit from State Representative Ellen Story, who delivered the opening remarks and who followed a visit last week by State Senator Stanley Rosenberg. As with the senator's visit two weeks ago, Story was warmly recognized for her longstanding relationship with the University of Massachusetts in the question and answer portion of her address.

Dubai to end stake in U.S. ports

A security guard speaks to a truck driver entering Seagirt Marine Terminal Wednesday, in Baltimore. Dubai Ports World, an United Arabs Emirates state-owned company, would operate it if the Patriot Act is approved.

By David Espo and Andrew Taylor
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Bowing to ferocious opposition in Congress, a Dubai-owned company signaled surrender Thursday in its quest to take over operations at U.S. ports.

"DP World will transfer fully the U.S. operations ... to a United States entity," the firm's top executive, H. Edward Bilkey, said in an announcement that capped weeks of controversy.

Relieved Republicans in Congress said the firm had pledged full divestiture, a decision that one senator said had been approved personally by the prime minister of the United Arab Emirates.

The announcement appeared to indicate an end to a politically tinged controversy that brought President Bush and Republicans in Congress to the brink of an election-year veto battle on a terrorism-related issue. The White House expressed satisfaction with the outcome.

"It does provide a way forward and resolve the matter," presidential spokesman Scott McClellan said.

"We have a strong relationship with the U.A.E. and a good partnership in the global war on terrorism and I think their decision reflects the importance of our broader relationship," he said.

A leading congressional critic of the ports deal, Rep. Peter King, applauded the decision but said he and others would wait to see the details. "It would have to be an American company with no links to DP World, and that would be a tremendous victory and very gratifying," said the New York Republican, chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

"This should make the issue go away," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. The Tennessee Republican was one of several GOP leaders to tell President Bush earlier in the day that Congress was ready to ignore his veto threat and scuttle the deal.

Several Republican officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Frist and Sen. John Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Armed Services Committee, had been privately urging the firm to give up its plans.

After weeks of controversy — and White House veto threats that spokesman Scott McClellan renewed at midmorning Thursday — the end came unexpectedly.

The House Appropriations Committee voted 62-2 on Wednesday to block the deal, and GOP congressional leaders privately informed the president Thursday morning that the Senate would inevitably follow suit. Senate Democrats clamored for a vote, increasing pressure on Senate Republicans to abandon the president.

It was unclear how DP would manage the planned divestiture, and Bilkey's statement said its announcement was "based on an understanding that DP World will not suffer economic loss."

The firm finalized its $6.8 billion purchase Thursday of Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co., the British firm that through a U.S. subsidiary runs important port operations in New York, New Jersey, Baltimore, New Orleans, Miami and Philadelphia. It also plays a lesser role in dockside activities at 16 other American ports.

Despite the furor, the company's U.S. operations were never the most prized part of the global transaction. DP World valued its rival's American operations at less than 10 percent of the nearly $7 billion total purchase.

But that portion of the deal set off a political chain of events unlike any other in Bush's five years in office. Republicans denounced the deal, saying they were worried about the effects it would have on efforts to make ports safer from terrorist threats. Democrats did likewise, and capitalized on the issue as well as a way to narrow the polling gap with the GOP on issues of national security.

State deems Wal-Mart land as wetlands

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

The land that the proposed Wal-Mart Supercenter was to be built on has been classified as wetlands by the state.

The Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection recently upheld the wetlands ruling made earlier this year by the Hadley Conservation Commission, agreeing that much of the land that was to be home to the new Supercenter is actually a wetland area.

The new Wal-Mart is planned to be 212,000 square feet, and was designed to contain a gas and oil change station as part of the store.

David Elvin, a Hadley resident and member of the Hadley Neighbors for Sensible Development, is the person who first presented the petition regarding the wetlands to the Hadley Conservation Commission. He called on the Wal-Mart developers to "stop trying to go around environmental laws."

"We're just asking them to follow the law," said Elvin, "and they're not doing it."

It is not yet certain whether Pyramid Co., the owners of the Hampshire Mall where the Wal-Mart is planned to be built, will appeal the state's ruling. If they choose not to, or if the ruling is upheld under appeal, the building plans for the Supercenter are likely to change drastically. Under Massachusetts law, wetlands that will be altered due to construction must be "replicated," or reconstructed, elsewhere on the property.

The Wal-Mart development team also has the option of redesigning their plans to avoid building in the designated wetland area. However, Planning Board member William Dwyer has said that "the wetlands issue is pretty core to the layout," and the property would require serious redesigning to take into account the newly recognized wetlands.

The next public hearing regarding the issue of the Supercenter will be held in June, giving the developers a chance to alter their design plan and present them to the Hadley Planning Board.

Newspaper opens campaign for Jill Carroll

By Bassem Mroue
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The Christian Science Monitor has launched a campaign on Iraqi television stations, hoping to win the release of reporter Jill Carroll who was kidnapped in Iraq two months ago.

The newspaper's videotaped message appeared on the private Sharqiya television Wednesday afternoon, a day after it was first broadcast by state-run Iraqiya TV, according to the Monitor.

Carroll, a free-lance writer for the Boston-based paper, was kidnapped on Jan. 7 in Baghdad's western Adl neighborhood while going to interview Sunni Arab politician Adnan al-Dulaimi. Her translator was killed in the attack about 300 yards from al-Dulaimi's office.

The Monitor's Arabic-language plea for Carroll's release begins with a line of print that reads "Please help with the release of journalist Jill Carroll."

Pictures of the reporter then appear on the screen, including one that shows her in an Islamic veil.

A narrator says: "Kidnapped American journalist Jill Carroll loves Iraq, and now she needs your help. Time has come for Jill Carroll to return home safely."

The campaign coincided with the two-month anniversary of her kidnapping and was an attempt, the newspaper said, to put her face widely in front of the Iraqi people.

"We're doing this to keep Jill in the minds of the Iraqi public, so that if people were to see her they would know who she is and could help her," said David Cook, the Monitor's Washington bureau chief.

Iraqi Interior Minister Bayan Jabr has said Carroll was abducted by the Islamic Army in Iraq, the insurgent group that freed two French journalists in 2004 after four months in captivity.

Jabr also said he believed the 28-year-old reporter was still alive. The deadline set by her captors for the United States to meet their demands expired late last month.

Three videotapes of Carroll delivered by her kidnappers to Arab satellite television stations identified the group holding her as the previously unknown Revenge Brigades.

The kidnappers have publicly demanded the release of all women detainees in Iraq, but the owner of a Kuwaiti TV station that aired one videotape of Carroll last month said the group provided more specific conditions that he refused to reveal.

Carroll grew up in Ann Arbor, Mich., and graduated from the University of Massachusetts.

U.S. to hand over notorious prison to Iraq

By Sinan Salaheddin
Associated Press Writer

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The U.S. military said Thursday it would begin moving thousands of prisoners out of Abu Ghraib prison to a new lockup near Baghdad's airport within three months and hand the notorious facility over to Iraqi authorities as soon as possible.

Abu Ghraib has become perhaps the most infamous prison in the world, known as the site where U.S. soldiers abused some Iraqi detainees and, earlier, for its torture chambers during Saddam Hussein's rule.

The sprawling facility on the western outskirts of Baghdad will be turned over to Iraqi authorities once the prisoner transfer to Camp Cropper and other U.S. military prisons in the country is finished. The process will take several months, said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad.

The Abu Ghraib prison west of Baghdad currently houses 4,537 out of the 14,589 detainees held by the U.S. military in Iraq.

The U.S. government initially spoke of tearing down Abu Ghraib after it became a symbol of the scandal. Widely publicized photographs of prisoner abuse by American military guards and interrogators led to intense global criticism of the U.S. war in Iraq and helped fuel the Sunni Arab insurgency.

But Abu Ghraib was kept in service after the Iraqi government objected. Planning for the new facility at Camp Cropper began in 2004, Johnson said.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the U.S. wants to turn Abu Ghraib over to the Iraqis fast as possible.

"There are facilities being built so that the U.S. can pull out of Abu Ghraib. Then it will be up to the Iraqi government to decide what they want to do. I do not know that the Iraqi government had decided. It's an Iraqi decision, I just don't know that they've made that decision."

But the Iraqis were all but certain to use Abu Ghraib as a jail for some time at least, because they do not have the money to build new ones at1. The Iraqi Cabinet announced Thursday that it hanged 13 insurgents, the first executions of militants since the ouster of Saddam.

The announcement listed the name of only one of those hanged, Shukarr Farid, a former policeman in the northern city of Mosul, who allegedly confessed that he had worked with Syrian foreign fighters to enlist fellow Iraqis to kill police and civilians.

"The competent authorities have today carried out the death sentences of 13 terrorists," the Cabinet announcement said.

Farid had "confessed that foreigners recruited him to spread the fear through killings and abductions," the government said.

A judicial official said the death sentences were handed down in separate trials and were carried out in Baghdad.

"The 13 terrorists were tried in different courts and their trials began in 2005 and ended earlier this year," an official of the Supreme Judiciary Council said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he feared reprisal from insurgents.

In September, Iraq hanged three convicted murderers, the first executions of any convicts since Saddam's ouster in April 2003. They were convicted of killing three police officers, kidnapping and rape.

Capital punishment was suspended during the formal U.S. occupation, which ended in June 2004, and the Iraqis reinstated the penalty two months later for those found guilty of murder, endangering national security and distributing drugs, saying it was necessary to help put down the persistent insurgency.

The authorities also wanted to have the option of executing Saddam if he is convicted of crimes committed by his regime. Under the former dictator, 114 offenses were punishable by death.

Bush signs Patriot Act renewal into law

By Nedra Pickler
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A day before parts of the USA Patriot Act were to expire, President Bush signed into law a renewal that will allow the government to keep using terror-fighting tools passed after the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks.

Bush's signature came two days after the House gave final approval to the legislation over objections that it infringes on Americans' privacy. The president said the law has been vital to protecting Americans from terrorists.

"The Patriot Act has accomplished exactly what it was designed to do," Bush said during a signing ceremony in the White House East Room. "It has helped us detect terrorist cells, disrupt terrorist plots and save American lives."

Sixteen provisions of the old law were set to expire Friday. Political battles over the legislation forced Congress to extend the expiration date twice.

To get the legislation renewed, Bush was forced to accept new curbs on the Patriot Act's powers.

These new civil liberties protections for the first time say explicitly that people who receive subpoenas granted under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act for library, medical, computer and other records can challenge a gag order in court.

Some say the protections did not go far enough.

"Today marks, sadly, a missed opportunity to protect both the national security needs of this country and the rights and freedoms of its citizens," said Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis.

But Republicans want to take the law into the upcoming midterm elections to show they are acting to protect national security.

The legislation renews the expiring provisions of the original Patriot Act, including one that lets federal officials obtain "tangible items," such as business records, from libraries and bookstores, in connection with foreign intelligence and international terrorism investigations.

Other provisions clarify that foreign intelligence or counterintelligence officers should share information obtained as part of a criminal investigation with counterparts in domestic law enforcement agencies.

Yet another provision is designed to strengthen port security by imposing strict punishments on crew members who impede or mislead law enforcement officers trying to board their ships.

The law also takes aim at the methamphetamine trade by imposing new restrictions on the sale of over-the-counter cold and allergy medicines, which contain a key ingredient for the drug. Customers will be limited to buying 300 30-milligram pills in a month or 120 such pills in a day. The measure would make an exception for "single-use" sales — individually packaged pseudoephedrine products.

By Sept. 30, retailers will be required to sell such medicines from behind the counter and purchasers would have to show ID and sign log books.

Investigation justifies police shooting of teen

By Brandie M. Jefferson
Associated Press

PLYMOUTH — Two police officers were justified when they shot and killed a teenage robbery suspect as he allegedly drove his car toward them, according to an investigation by Plymouth District Attorney Timothy Cruz.

Cruz also said Thursday that the blood alcohol level of the suspect, Anthony McGrath, was above the level at which a minor can be prosecuted for driving under the influence.

McGrath, 16, was shot by officers Edwin Almeida and Richard Tavares Jan. 10 after he allegedly led the officers on a chase through downtown.

A six-week investigation concluded the officers who fired at McGrath had reason to believe their lives were in immediate danger, Cruz said. Investigators found that one of the officers who shot at McGrath was in the path of the teen's car when it began to accelerate, Cruz said. The officers fired only after their orders for McGrath to halt were ignored, he said.

Police Chief Robert Pomeroy, who joined Cruz at a news conference to announce the findings, said many of the circumstances that led to the shooting "were in Mr. McGrath's control."

Study: Girls regret 'going wild'

By Danielle Nagy
Daily Toreador (Texas Tech)

LUBBOCK, Texas — To some college students, the words "wild" and "Spring Break" are as frequently paired as the words "bikini" and "sunshine," yet the American Medical Association's recent study is trying to engrave one more word into college students' vocabularies: "Caution."

More than 80 percent of college women and recent graduates who participated in the AMA's new survey reported increased drinking habits during Spring Break, and nearly 75 percent reported the weeklong vacation increased sexual activity.

The study, which polled 644 randomly selected college women and graduates from across the nation, was conducted to uncover the female outlook on the issue, said Richard Yoast, director of the Office of Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse with the American Medical Association.

"The way Spring Break is portrayed in the media encourages outrageous behavior and promotes a negative perception of women," Yoast said. "No one had really asked students what they think about this, so what we wanted to do was find the perspective of women."

He said females are the more victimized gender in the media's portrayal of what goes on under the sweltering sun.

Roughly 40 percent of the study's participants said they regretted passing out, or not remembering what they did after having too much to drink during the break, meanwhile 13 percent stated they had been sexually involved with more than one partner in the span of the single week, according to the report.

Additionally, more than half ofrespondents admitted to being underage when they first consumed alcohol during the famous mid-semester vacation, according to the report.

Yoast said although he does not believe the level of binge drinking has increased dramatically during the past few years, he does notice that media coverage of the event has continued to grow.

"The impression is it's gotten a lot worse lately," he said. "It's really just increased media coverage."

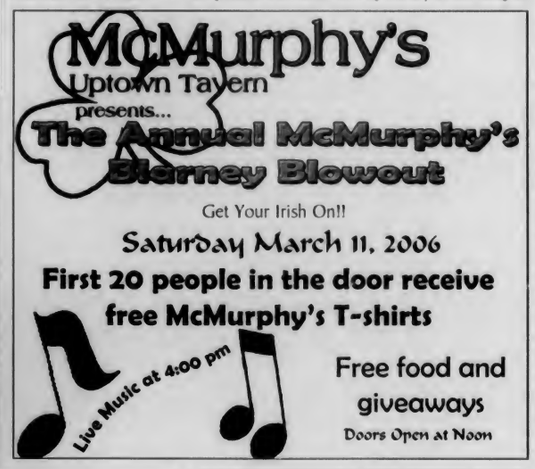
Indeed, it seems plenty of college students have been absorbing the message the media is sending; according to the study, 30 percent of women said Spring Break trips complete with alcohol and sun are a necessary part of the college life.

Some Texas Tech University students offered similar opinions on what exactly Spring Break entails and why it goes hand-in-hand with drinking.

Darci Lampman, a sophomore fashion design major from San Antonio, Texas, said people tend to drink more during the break because they spend the day at the beach and cap their nights off with a trip to the nightclubs.

"People also tend to drink more when they are with their friends instead of their parents," she said.

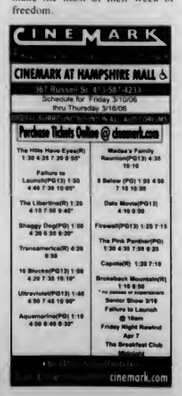
Nick Smith, a sophomore mass communications major from Euless, Texas, said people drink more because they are free of their regular responsibilities for a week.



"People can just let loose," he said. "They don't have to worry about anything."

Yoast said the AMA is striving to inform students there are safe alternatives to a week of pure drinking-related festivities.

Do not go to a Spring Break location where alcohol is heavily promoted, he said. Instead, there are plenty of ways one can volunteer or enjoy the break with friends and fun — minus the binge drinking, he said.



The Web site www.national-wellness.org offers some tips on how Spring Breakers can safely make the most of their week of freedom.

New election brings SGA to crossroads

Greg Collins

The campaign season is heating up for the upcoming Student Government Association elections for the presidency, student trustee and area governments, which will culminate in two days of voting on March 14 and 15.

Members of the student body not involved directly with the SGA (such as being a senator or being part of an area government) are unfairly derided for their lack of participation and interest in their governing bodies. Few will argue that the relationship between SGA representatives and constituents is crucial towards improving campus life, and more specifically, supporting student-run organizations that depend on the student legislature to allocate a certain amount of funds towards their causes. Yet one reason many UMass students have low confidence in the current SGA is due to its preoccupation with developing initiatives that do not accurately reflect students' inherent concerns.

Throughout the time any legislature is in session, it is important for its members to recognize the concrete concerns of their constituents. When they fail to recognize this, legislative opinion sometimes does not consider the original purpose of a representative institution. For instance, as an elected body whose foremost priority is to serve the students who currently attend the University, the SGA should be concerned with enacting legislation that directly benefits and accounts for the pressing needs of its constituents, such as legislating for more efficient washers and dryers, increasing the number of UCard swipe vending machines in dorms and reforming the EPOCH program.

Expressing strong disagreement with the administration in a forceful but respectful manner is a more effective approach if the goal is to improve campus life.

Unfortunately, this year the SGA has already devoted a large amount of time towards more wide-ranging initiatives, such as higher education and diversity reform. It is not clear that these efforts, while raising important issues, reflect the attitudes and urgent concerns of UMass students.

There has also been a tendency for many of the SGA's current members to criticize harshly the UMass administration for various decisions it has made pertaining to student life. If they continue to practice this habit, it will perpetuate the stereotype that student government leaders are incapable of engaging in civil discussions with UMass officials. It will be of a great service and honor for SGA senators to show the proper respect to administrators.

In turn, they will gain respect from those administrators, and this will increase the opportunity for policy reform that will ideally benefit students. The SGA will severely hurt its chances of accomplishing this task if its representatives continue to practice irresponsible and immature behavior towards Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano and other administrators dealing directly with student life, such as producing fliers and posters depicting such people as being malicious and oppressive. Expressing strong disagreement with the administration in a forceful but respectful manner is a more effective approach if the goal is to improve campus life.

SGA senators and officials will do more of a service to their constituents, as well as to themselves, if they stop such counterproductive behavior. Such black and white attitudes impede true progress, for if such an adversarial mentality persists, there will be little hope for finding a middle ground between students' needs and administrative concerns.

When author Lee Harris said, "Compromise is reason in and of itself, both in terms of the process by which the compromise is achieved and in terms of the result achieved by the compromise," he could have been referring to an improved relationship between the SGA and the UMass administration in addition to general political structure and processes.

Make no mistake. The SGA would not be fulfilling its responsibilities if it did not question the intentions and motives of UMass administrators regarding policy changes affecting student life. But it should carefully consider the impact these changes have directly on the student body, and then determine whether the SGA has the authority to counter this, and whether this application of authority serves the students justly.

The hope is that students will recognize the importance of the approaching elections and make an effort to become aware of the crucial issues facing the student body in the near future. In turn, the candidates who are elected president and trustee, as well as SGA senators, have a moral and political obligation to lobby in support of a student body that deserves better representation in the legislative and executive branches than what they have been getting the past few months.

When SGA representatives begin to truly fulfill the needs of their constituents, then many more students, as well as UMass administrators, will have deeper respect for the SGA. This will translate into an environment in which improved student life and not personal political preferences are at the forefront of legislative initiatives.

Abortion: the American Holocaust

World Perspectives
Ben Duffy

Outside the university is a solemn memorial to 6,504 Jews slaughtered by the Nazis. A small plaque marks the spot where, on Oct. 22, 1940, Jewish men, women and children were assembled to be shipped off to death camps for years. "The Final Solution" was not agreed to until 1942. We've killed 47 million in the last 33 years, according to the Allan Guttmacher Institute, a generally pro-choice foundation named for a former president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America.

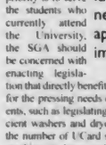
Doing a little math here, I can see that the Nazis have us beat in actual murders per year with 2.4 million to our measly 1.4 million. But we've had our infanticide operations going for 33 years now, and no one has been brought to justice. So when talking about total murders, we've certainly outdone the Nazis. Our 47 million dwarfs their paltry 12 million.

But we've had our infanticide operations going for 33 years now, and no one has been brought to justice. So when talking about total murders, we've certainly outdone the Nazis. Our 47 million dwarfs their paltry 12 million.

Since Roe v. Wade was decided in 1973 (our Wannsee-Konferenz), approximately 47 million unborn children have been slaughtered in the womb. Of these, 93 percent were for elective reasons; in other words, for reasons other than rape, incest or because the mother's life was in danger. They were abortions of convenience.

The Nazis had their death chambers and we have ours. The Nazis denied that their victims were fully human, and so do we, it's always easier to kill someone when you refuse to entertain the notion that he/she is alive in the first place. The Nazis believed that they were creating a better world by eliminating unwanted elements of the population, and so do we. The Nazis used Zyklon-B to gas their victims, and we force our unborn children to absorb a salt solution that leads to the mother giving birth to a dead, badly burned baby. And the similarities go on.

I propose that we shut down our American death chambers. Let's begin the long process of atonement, erecting memorials to those killed in our American Holocaust, the same way the Germans erect memorials to their victims. Let's have our own Nuremberg and Frankfurt Auschwitz trials. I would start by putting Supreme Court Justice Harry Blackmun in the dock, but he's already dead.



Nonetheless, he wrote the majority opinion for the criminal Roe v. Wade decision, and he signed his name to the death warrant of 47 million (and counting) unborn children. Then we can move on to the infanticide specialists troops, I mean women's health specialists), the Auschwitz cadre of our modern genocide. I would say that we should also arrest the plaintiff of the Roe case, Norma McCorvey, but she's changed her mind and now works for Operation Rescue, a pro-life group.

I hope that one day all the killing will come to an end, and abortion will be buried with all of the other human evils that we once embraced. I hope that my grandchildren will learn about abortion in their history books and look back on it with the shame that German children feel when they learn about the Holocaust.

I hope that they will stare at our society in disgust, asking themselves how such an atrocity could have gone on for so long. How did we convince ourselves that something so wrong could be so right? The answer to that question is on the Guns monument because "too many looked the other way. Too few put up resistance."

Hefty problem with lefty professors

Gilowen Jenkins

When mainstream news is slow, stale or critical of the Bush administration we can always count on FOX News for a plentiful dose of irrelevance. On break from the "Christmas is under attack diatribe" and prepping for the Easter rant, right-wingers latched on to the recent Academy Awards ceremony to bemoan more on those out-of-touch liberal heathens. Beyond these carefully timed rants, another issue seeps through, too, one not as carefully timed to seasons or larger external events, but similar in its useless bickering. I'm speaking of the same old complaint, on the right, of those darn liberal professors subverting student's minds and wasting taxpayers' dollars.

This argument, like the other ones, seems part of a packaged crusade to reinforce the false notion that liberalism is terrorism, sedition or just plain evil. Why does the right pick a seemingly harmless issue and bloat its significance? Probably to distract from some of the larger threats to our civil liberties and security we face with our Republican-controlled government. Given my position as a college student, I'll choose only to address the latter rant of the supposed problem of the raving liberal professors.

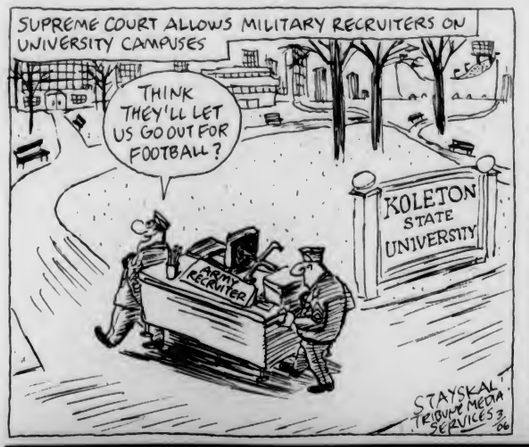
At the center of this argument is a man named David Horowitz. In his new book, "The Professors: The 101 Most Dangerous Academics in America," Horowitz echoes the familiar gripe from many better and lesser known right-wing authors and pundits. For Horowitz, America's campuses have been hijacked by crazed liberal professors whose propagandizing wastes taxpayer dollars and tears at the fabric of our culture. Mr. Horowitz's book serves as a companion piece to his "Academic Bill of Rights," which serves to fight the discrimination of conservatives in the hiring process and the liberal slant of coursework and classes offered.

Sitting in class, it can be amusing to see a ranting liberal professor and the blank stares of an audience who has either heard it before and/or could do without the condescending tone of the speaker.

Looking at this argument at face value, it seems rather exaggerated. I'm certain we could point to 100 or more dangerous conservative minds in the college system, but let's say, we agree with Horowitz and others' assumption that universities are dominated by leftist professors. What's the big deal; it's really the only place left for any measurable liberal thought? For the sake of diversity, can't liberals have one place to call home? Whoops, I forgot Conservatives don't do diversity too well.

As mentioned, Horowitz isn't alone in his whining, or in his rather droll format of ordering these complaints into a top 100. Not but a couple months ago, we had another conservative author, Bernie Goldberg, tell us who the top 100 people are who are screwing up America in his book titled by the same name. Bernie lists the usual: artists, feminists, academians, comedians, etc. Again, these are people with no real power, but threats to the insecure, manic right-wing mind nevertheless.

Getting back to this notion of liberal professors, I'm also curious why conservatives get so upset, because at least from my personal experience, the raving lefty professors seem to have a counter-intuitive effect on their audience. Sitting in class, it can be amusing to see a ranting liberal professor and the blank stares of an audience who has either heard it before and/or could do without the condescending tone of the speaker. They should be cheering these supposed lunatics.



There are times when I'm not amused, however. I sometimes find myself challenging these leftist professors even if I agree with them in principal. I'm not offended by the distraction from the material and a waste of my dollars, rather, I can be grateful for the chance to debate that a liberal education provides.

The pessimist in me can see this experience is sad and telling, though. To see the flustered look from anybody who might awake from their slumber and challenge the ivory-towered intellectual. The fact that this challenge should come from an identified progressive seems too much to handle in the similarly fragile state of liberal thought.

At the risk of ranting myself (though I fear I already have), I say no. My gripe isn't that professors inject the political opinions into coursework, it's that they don't do well enough. Elective presentation and rhetoric is often the first thing missing from these bookish liberal professors.

The best professors are the ones who only allow you to guess their political views, because they are never made explicit. Instead, these professors rely on humor, wit and professional experience to impart not only the objectives of the course but their equally valid opinion as well. These professors don't fit into a box or a top 100 list. If anything, they're the ones the radical right should be concerned about, even though they're a dying breed.

HIGH SCHOOL GRAMMAR NOT NEEDED FOR DOCTORATE

In a letter published yesterday, John Redue expresses surprise that Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano, who holds a doctoral degree in education, apparently does not understand the rules of citation.

I encourage Mr. Redue to take a look at Dr. Gargano's dissertation. Doing so will lie to rest any assumptions he may have about the correspondence between academic competence and attainment of an advanced degree. Dr. Gargano's work demonstrates that one need not achieve high school level proficiency in grammar to obtain a doctorate, nor need one be sensible enough to ask a literate friend or the University's writing center to proofread one's final draft before publishing it.

As it happens, I have a copy of Dr. Gargano's doctoral dissertation, which I will make available for browsing in the office of the Graduate Student Senate in Campus Center 919, during office hours: Monday to Friday, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. A portion of it is also available online, at http://tinyurl.com/o3hsx. I encourage everybody to take a look at it, in order to gain some insight into the intellectual caliber of the man whose deplorable conduct has caused so much strife at UMass.

UNFULFILLED UNIVERSITY MISSIONS

The article "New Website causes controversy inside SGA" uncritically reproduces a number of baseless claims made on the site, including ones about the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA).

SCERA has a broad mission: to serve as an advocacy of student interests with the state government and the University administration, and to conduct research on issues of interest to the student body. Students, public officials and University observers across the state have recognized the tremendous challenges before us under this mission and the University's mission as a land grant institution.

SCERA used to have four full-time professional staff members, but has been cut down to having none. Considering these missions and past staffing levels, the proposed budget for SCERA is actually an under-funding, not the "pet project" the Web site claims it to be.

Further, despite these unfulfilled missions, the campus administration is now refusing to hire a director for the third time in a row, and fired the graduate assistant on Wednesday. From disregarding Freedom of Information Act requests, to freezing student funds, to cutting student groups, this campus administration has been consistently hostile to students.

Now, more than ever, we need to take back our University.

New Portman film raises question, 'Is violence justified?'

BY JOE NEUMAIER
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

Forget its R rating — should "V for Vendetta" come with a Code Orange alert instead?

The movie, opening March 17, is a futuristic fable about a woman named Evey (Natalie Portman) living in a rigidly controlled London in the year 2020, when everyone is monitored by an oppressive government.

She falls in with a mysterious masked terrorist called V (Hugo Weaving) and becomes his willing prisoner in an underground lair. But after experiencing the kind of officially ordered torture that forced V to fight the system, she comes to embrace his view that the only way to rebel against evil is by doing evil, like blowing up buildings.

Clearly, the movie is more "1984" than "Star Wars," with a dash of "A Clockwork Orange" and "Brazil" thrown in, as well as elements from such hot-button fantasies as "The Matrix," "Fight Club" and "Minority Report." Written and produced by "The Matrix's" Andy and Larry Wachowski, the film is based on a graphic novel first published in 1980. And unlike "Munich," it's a big-screen look at terrorism not of 30 years ago, but the kind Americans woke up to on Sept. 11, 2001.

"It's impossible to project what people's reactions will be to this film," says Portman, who shaved her head for the role (Evey's torture begins with her long hair being shorn). "Rather than wagging a finger, it asks, and raises questions, when, if ever, is violence justified?"

Following "V" is April's "Flight 93" (about the hijacked airliner forced down in Pennsylvania) and in August, Oliver Stone's "World Trade Center," films that specifically dramatize the national tragedy. In development is "The Counter-Terrorist," based on the life of the former FBI agent who was head of security at the WTC when it fell. There's also the current Showtime drama "Sleeper Cell," which follows a federal agent infiltrating U.S.-based jihadists; and come June, bookstores will be stocked with John Updike's novel "Terrorist," about a would-be Islamic suicide bomber in New Jersey.

In a more innocent time, of course, movies like "The Siege" (1998), "Collateral Damage" and "The Sum of All Fears" (both made in 2001 but released in 2002) dealt with terrorism in action-adventure or "What if?" scenarios.

But now, less than five years after Sept. 11, are audiences ready for films to seriously tackle contemporary terrorism?

"'V for Vendetta' is definitely a provocative work that inspires strong reactions," says Portman. "One of the advantages of having it take place in an imaginative future world is that it can say many more things. And though the graphic novel was made 25 years ago, it's relevant today."

Last July, "V for Vendetta's" relevance was taken up a notch further when terrorist bombings in the London underground left 52 people dead. Suddenly, the story, which has always involved its title character using an abandoned subway to blow up the Houses of Parliament, became eerie (ironically, the movie was the first-ever production approved to film around Parliament, for a scene in which oppressed citizens rise up against their government.)

Warner Bros., the film's distributor, delayed its release from last November to this spring, officially because of special effects work that needed to be done. "It felt right (to delay release)," says James McTeigue, the film's director, who was editing the movie in London at the time of the attack. Still, he adds, "you can't control if the real world echoes your art.

"The movie is about the individual's right to push back against fear. Filmmakers want to deal with what's going on in the world, and if that's the case, how do you not talk about terrorism?"

"We're in a new era," says Daniel P. Franklin, author of "Politics and Film: The Political Culture of Film in the United States." "Prior to 9/11, Hollywood dealt with terrorism in a very simplistic way. Now, these films may be where real conversations about the subject take place. But any movie that says anything except 'it's wrong' runs the risk of getting negative attention."

"V for Vendetta" also contains what could be seen as reflections of current Bush administration controversies, though the film's been in development for almost a decade. Yet its depiction of a leadership that uses fear as a tool and engages in wiretapping and surveillance may be seen as overtly political.

"I don't want to make propaganda, I never would," says Portman, who has in recent years voiced support for Israel, among other causes. "I don't look for political works to do. But I was excited to make a big action movie that had actual substance to it. And 'V' has a theme that's been always true: people fighting against unjust regimes. Here it just happens in an imaginary world."

The film's "imaginary world," unlike many of the movies and projects coming up, may help audiences wrestle with tough ideas, says David Lloyd, who co-created the graphic novel 25 years ago with Alan Moore.

"A sci-fi setting has wider reach," says Lloyd. "It can be more effective. There may be people who see 'V' as a sort of justification of terrorism and close their mind. But if you don't talk about terrorism and try to understand why people do it, you never solve the problem."

But ultimately, says "V's" producer, the action impresario Joel Silver ("Die Hard," "Lethal Weapon"), the future of films about terrorism may hinge on a very modern reality.

"This story is more important now than ever," says Silver. "But movies are made to make money. So if people go to films like this, we'll see more of them."

Natalie Portman lends her star power to "V for Vendetta," a new film that references present day terrorism.

Film 'Duck Season' reflects the younger generation

BY HANH NGUYEN
ZAP2IT.COM

LOS ANGELES — "Duck Season," writer/director Fernando Eimbcke's first film, was released in 2004 to very little fanfare, until it began winning awards worldwide and, most importantly, the attention of Alfonso Cuaron, director of "Y Tu Mama Tambien" and "Harry Potter and the Prisoner of Azkaban."

"I fell in love, well, not immediately, because for the first 10-15 minutes, I was just so jealous about it. 'I should have done that movie. Look at that. It's amazing,'" says Cuaron. "The good thing is that God gave us admiration so we don't spoil our liver, and I changed envy to admiration. The film is very deceptive because it could look like a tiny movie in which not much happens, and thematically I think everything happens."

The Warner Independent Pictures and Cuaron's Esperanto Films release centers on Flama and Moko, two 14-year-old boys bent on spending a lazy Sunday playing XBox. When the power goes out, they must amuse themselves as well as Rita, an overbearing 16-year-old neighbor, and Ulises, a pizza delivery man who refuses to leave until he gets paid.

Their fight against boredom takes many forms: baking special brownies, testing the wish-fulfilling properties of colored candles, running into a wall wearing a helmet, shooting a BB gun at decorative china and contemplating a painting of ducks that Flama's parents are fighting over in their divorce.

Eimbcke, who originally studied cinematography, deliberately chose to make the film black and white to highlight the claustrophobic action.

"The story is so simple and all the things that are happening are so tiny, so black and white helps people from being distracted," he explains. "Also, black and white helped us to play with volume and geometric forms of the place that the color wouldn't let us play with."

Casting Daniel Miranda as Flama and Diego Catano as Moko unfortunately created the wrong chemistry with the original actress playing Rita.

"We found the other kids weren't afraid of her, so we called another Rita (Danny Perea) and I swear I saw the kids' hands shaking," says Eimbcke with a laugh. "Moko and Flama stayed really afraid of Rita during the whole shoot. I tried to keep that fear in them."

In the film, Rita gives Moko his first kiss (and ear-licking) and helps Moko discuss his vague fantasies concerning his best friend. Cuaron believes that Eimbcke's respectful portrayal of the young characters appeals to both older audiences as well as younger viewers, which is why he was shocked that the MPAA gave the film an R rating for its language and drug content.

"There's a big rejection, a big fear about young people seeing themselves reflected on the big screen [the way they really are]. I think young people are not scared, it's the older people that are scared about it," says Cuaron. "They're OK to 'ridiculize' them, to humiliate them and to show a different reality that can be even grosser and they are fine with it. This movie is an R-rated film? Come on."

"Duck Season" opens in New York and Los Angeles on Friday and expands to top U.S. markets two weeks later.

Gannascoli proud to be a 'wisegay'

BY DENIS HAMILL
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

NEW YORK — Call him the Brokeback Mobster.

"My character in 'The Sopranos' would say, 'It's the year of the queer,'" says Joe Gannascoli, who plays gay mobster Vito Spatafore in the HBO mob hit. "But then he's a real wisegay."

The Brooklyn-born actor, who for five seasons was one of the semi-regular wannabes in Tony Soprano's crew, had his biggest moment on the series last season when it was revealed that he was a closeted gay. It was never addressed again, opening yet another unanswered story line in the show, along with the Russian gangster who got away in the New Jersey Pine Barrens and the fate of Lorraine (Dr. Melfi) Bracco's rapist.

What can Gannascoli say about his character in the coming season?

"That's in the closet, too," says the actor, whose friends call him "Joe Soup" because he once owned a restaurant in New York called Soup as Art.

"All I know is that, at the end of last season when Vito 'went down,' things started looking up for me."

OK, without breaking omerta, how does a knock-around heterosexual guy from the streets of Brooklyn feel about playing a gay character in the ultra-macho TV show?

"I have no problem with it," he says. "I had read about a couple of real-life gays in the mob and suggested the idea to one of our writers, in the hopes of getting more work. Eventually it was incorporated. Some real macho guys on the set asked how I could do the role. But it was something I wanted to do.

"I used to work as a waiter in an all-gay restaurant named Company on Third Ave. in Manhattan," he adds. "It was a great job. I got along great with the gay customers. I'm secure in my own sexuality, recently married, and I'm an actor. An actor acts."

He says playing a gay gangster made him more sensitive. "I was rooting like crazy for 'Brokeback Mountain' in all the awards shows," he says. "And after five seasons in the background of one of the greatest shows in TV history, it was sure nice to get some recognition."

It's not like Gannascoli isn't busy, though. In January, St. Martin's Press published his first hardcover novel, "A Meal to Die For," a hilarious, mobbed-up murder mystery set in the restaurant business of his native Brooklyn, where he founded the popular restaurant known as 101 in the shadow of the Verrazano Bridge.

"All the pieces of my life, food, gambling, Brooklyn, all come together in this semi-autobiographical book," says the once-obese Gannascoli. Especially food.

He recently lost 200 pounds with stomach surgery, down from more than 400. (He appeared on the TV show "Celebrity Fit Club," in which stars try to lose weight competitively, but he gained 12 pounds.)

"I grew up on Gravesend Neck Road and Avenue U," says the actor, who now lives with his wife, Diana, on Long Island. "My brother became a lawyer, so I went to St. John's for a couple of years, following his footsteps into law."

But Gannascoli loved food more than school and dropped out of college after two years to work in restaurants, apprenticing under the great chefs of Manhattan.

"And I wound up working in Commander's Palace in New Orleans," he says, "considered by many as the best restaurant in America."

In 1986, Gannascoli was back waiting tables at Jack's restaurant in Manhattan, where he met an actor-waiter who suggested he audition for a play called "The Juicemen." "I got the role. I got bit by the acting bug."

Gannascoli landed small stage and film parts. But food always beckoned. In 1990, Joe Soup opened 101 and in 1992, 101 Seafood.

"But the most expensive thing on my menu was my gambling," says Gannascoli. "To pay off debts, sometimes I'd move cases of shrimp that fell off the back of a truck. Or expensive wine. Or olive oil. I was a food fence.

"Those experiences formed the autobiographical character in my novel. But the day I lost $60,000 on four football games, I made a deal for my partner to buy me out and I flew to L.A. to become an actor."

Gannascoli spent three years in L.A., hustling film roles. He came back to New York, landing small parts in films like "Two Family House," "Mickey Blue Eyes" and "Money for Nothing," where Benicio Del Toro introduced him to Georgianne Walken, who was casting "The Sopranos."

He was cast as Vito Spatafore, whose biggest moment was "whacking" Jackie Jr. in the season three finale. Until, that is, last season, when we learned that Vito was a closet homosexual, a capital crime inside the mob.

"I will say this about the new season," says Gannascoli. "I'm certainly in it. And for that Vito would say, 'This could be the year of the queer.'"

Glover jumps to 'Numb3rs' drama

BY KATE O'HARE
ZAP2IT.COM

Facing the prospect of a week off from playing Machiavellian tycoon Lionel Luthor on The WB's Thursday-night hit "Smallville," John Glover could have gone golfing, taken a quick trip to Hawaii or just kicked back with a good book.

Instead, he decided to play the role of a CIA-approved psychic on Friday's episode of CBS' mathematical crime drama "Numb3rs."

"I had the best time," Glover says. "I had that episode [of 'Smallville'] off, and they called about it. I read the script. For five years, I've not played anybody else on film. I go do plays every hiatus, but I just jumped at the chance to be another person."

In "Mind Games," Los Angeles-based FBI Special Agent Don Eppes (Rob Morrow) and his team (Alimi Ballard, Diane Farr, Dylan Bruno) are called in when a search team finds three dead women in a wilderness area. The case takes a strange turn when Don discovers that Samuel Kraft (Glover), a psychic who had once worked for the CIA, led the search.

When Kraft offers to help the FBI with the case, Don goes along, but brother Charlie (David Krumholtz), a university mathematician who consults on Don's cases, objects strenuously, claiming psychic abilities are bogus. Unexpectedly, this brings Charlie into conflict with his colleague, astrophysicist Larry (Peter MacNicol), who allows for the possibility that Kraft's abilities may be real.

"They worked on that a lot," says Glover. "It was interesting. Everybody was very juiced when we were doing it. I hope it turns out good. I think it will."

One other incentive for Glover to do the episode was director Peter Markle. "I'd worked with him a couple of times," he says, "maybe 14 years ago, on a couple of movies. It was nice."

"There's a scene with Peter and David where they're in Peter's house and they're having that argument [about psychic abilities] sitting on either ends of the room. It was written very differently. Peter got them to improvise that, so what is filmed is basically the script, the ideas of the script, but he's got that kind of improvisatory rawness.

"I had a scene after that, so I watched him working on that. It was so interesting to watch him work."

There's another scene where Charlie, believing he's caught Kraft faking his powers, confronts him at the FBI offices.

"We had the best time together," Glover says. "I just think he's magnificent. He's such an actor. He's funny, but at the same time, he's so dedicated to what he does. I was truck with him, as a person and as an actor."

Glover has a bit of a different look in the episode. He still has Lionel Luthor's curly mane of hair and beard, but he added a samurai-style ponytail and glasses. According to Glover, the script called for reading glasses, but that didn't work for him.

"I knew that there was something that, if I was unfocused in my literal physical vision, I could see more psychically. That's why I wanted the glasses to be real glasses. He had to unfocus what his eyes saw to see more with his metaphysical self."

Kraft works by drawing his visions. Glover admits the scenes of him sketching were a bit of movie magic. "They had an artist come in. I was standing over his shoulder while he was doing it, and my mouth was hanging open. It was like a stream of consciousness, the way he drew."

"Smallville" star, John Glover, starred in an episode of CBS's drama series "Numb3rs" on Friday, in which he played a CIA-approved psychic.

in the playoffs]," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We don't talk about 14-1-2. We talk about getting ourselves ready and committing ourselves to doing what we've got to do and doing it in a very sincere and steadfast way, so that it's not sporadic. We're coming, and we're coming in full force. That's been the message. There is no compromising our effort, our focus or our direction this week."

Werner and fellow captain Marvin Degon weighed in on exactly what UMass needs to focus on to take care of business in Boston.

"We're going to have to get pucks to the net," Werner said. "[John] Curry is pretty good on the first shot so we're going to have to get some rebounds. We're going to have to dictate the play, the speed of the game, use our speed, get the puck into the offensive zone and work on our cycles."

"Just prepare for a war," Degon said. "We're going to have to go in there and battle. BU is a tough team. They're a tough team in the corners. They like to grind, and we like to grind so it's going to be a real battle in the trenches."

PLAYOFF PRESSURE

Playoff hockey is widely known to provide the most intense of atmospheres in sports, and that had clearly carried over to the Minutemen, who looked as focused this week as they have all year. Cahoon was asked just how much different the playoffs were from the regular season.

"How much different am I right now?" said Cahoon, who was rocking back and forth intently staring straight ahead. "You've got to be on your toes and get after it. Hockey players show up, and the guys that aren't players stay at home. Don't get on the bus. It's a whole different world, and these kids have to know it. They have to appreciate it, they have to live it and they have to bring it."

Degon said everyone will be willing to sacrifice a lot more in the win-or-go-home format.

"There is no comparison," Degon said. "During the season, some guys might be looking for points and trying to make the highlight reel. In the playoffs, everybody is just trying to win, and everybody is putting their bodies on the line in order to win. It's do or die at this point, and you've just got to remember that."

FINAL HURRAH?

The importance of the current senior class cannot be overstated this year, but with the possibility of elimination this weekend, the group — Degon, Werner, Jamie Solon and Gabe Winer — has taken a different look on this week than it has in the past.

"You appreciate it a little bit more," Degon said after practice on Wednesday afternoon. "This could be our last practice on this rink. You're willing to give up more in order to win. You don't want it to end — and not in a loss."

Werner noticed just how much he has matured over the last three years.

"It's a lot different," Werner said. "I was telling Coach the other day that I could remember the way I felt when I was a freshman going up into Maine. You just kind of go with the flow. You want to win, obviously, but it's a lot different when you're a senior. I'm dying to make it to the Garden so this weekend is really important to us."

PIPE DREAMS

Cahoon's poker face isn't cracking a bit this week — not with good friend and BU coach Jack Parker sitting across the table.

Cahoon has two qualified contenders for the starting spot between the pipes this weekend: senior Gabe Winer, who started both quarterfinal wins at Maine in 2002-03 and made 59 saves in the 2003-04 Hockey East championship, and freshman Jon Quick, who has been on par with Winer for the last two months.

With at least two games to play this weekend and possibly three, there is a good possibility that the pair will split the starting duties over the course of the first two nights. But Cahoon won't release a scheduled rotation until the line charts come out on Friday night.

"The goaltending situation is we've got two good ones, and they are both going to help us," he said.

Goalies must step up

If you look at the three biggest wins the Maroon and White had this season against BU on Nov. 12, Colorado College on Nov. 25 and BC on Feb. 4, in each of those games they limited their opponent to two goals.

Not only that, but its no secret that the Minutemen have also had their troubles putting the puck in the opposing net. Their leading scorer this year is Stephen Werner with 13 goals. When your team's not scoring a lot, that puts even more pressure on the goalie to step up.

The lack of scoring brings me to my next key for UMass, and that is the power play. Watching this team from October to December, it was obvious the power play was its biggest downfall. It got to the point where they played better five-on-five than they did five-on-four. You could see it too when other teams in the country were putting up four and five goals a night and UMass could barely muster three because they couldn't score with the man advantage.

To the team and coach's credit however, they were able to improve in that area during the second half of the season. I don't know what Cahoon and his staff said over the Christmas break, but they'd better hope their guys remember it this weekend. With a team like BU, you have to take advantage of every opportunity they throw your way. I believe UMass will have to put up at least three power-play goals on the weekend to be successful. Anything less than that won't help them get to the TD Banknorth Garden next weekend for the conference semifinals.

Lastly the Minutemen have to keep their cool this weekend. This might be the toughest of the three to accomplish. Sure, it's easy for me to tell them to keep their cool because I'm in front of a computer screen and not 6,000 screaming red-and-white clad maniacs.

Of all the away games I've been to this season, the student section at BU was the toughest. All game long they were all over UMass for every little mistake they made (they even called out Winer, who was ineligible to play because of a fight he was involved in the previous weekend).

Personally, I thought it was great how crazy they were. It makes the game more exciting to watch. I'm sure the UMass team wholeheartedly disagrees with me, though.

Staying cool in Agganis isn't going to be easy for the Minutemen and their group of 17 freshman and sophomores. We've heard all season long about how young this team is. The experience those guys will have this weekend will be instrumental in how they develop here in Amherst.

If they are able to play poised hockey this weekend, then that will be great for both them and the team as a whole. You see it all the time in every sport, teams play fine when they are poised and play within themselves. It's when they get overwhelmed by the situation and they try to do too much. That's when the wheels generally start to fall off the bus.

What it comes down to is that as long as the Minutemen take care of their side of the ice this weekend, they should come out of the lion's den still breathing and looking forward to the Garden.

The closest the Colonials came to the Owls in the second half was nine points. Temple's much-up zone forced GW to take a lot of shots from 3-point land, and the Colonial shooters were off the mark, shooting a dismal 24 percent from behind the arc.

"I'm very proud of the way the players have played," Hobbs said. "I'm proud of the way they handled the distractions, adversity and scrutiny [during the season]. They handled it with great dignity and class."

Temple pulled away around the 5:00 mark of the second half. GW, trying to force some Owl turnovers, double-teamed the player with the ball — that left Marshall open at the free throw line. Collins found him and Marshall buried the 10-footer.

After a traveling violation on the GW end, Marshall was left open again at the same spot. He buried another jumper, pushing the Temple lead to 57-43, its largest of the game.

"A lot of people don't think I have range," Marshall joked after the game. "But my teammates found me tonight and I was able to knock them down."

SAINT JOSEPH'S COASTS BY BILLIKENS

The Saint Joseph's Hawks cruised through the second round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament yesterday, beating the Saint Louis Billikens 56-37 at U.S. Bank Arena.

"We followed the plan," Hawks coach Phil Martelli said. "On the offensive end we were crisp in the first half and lousy in the second half. But the game played out the way we thought."

Senior Chet Stachitas led the Hawks with 17 points and nine rebounds, and forward Rob Ferguson contributed 10 points. St. Joe's senior point guard Dwayne Lee finished with six points, seven assists and six rebounds.

The Billikens struggled offensively, scoring just 37 points for the game. Billiken big man Ian Vouyoukas turned in 15 points and 10 rebounds, but it wasn't enough against a tough Hawks defense.

Martelli thought experience was an essential part of shutting down the Billiken offense.

"To be honest, we're just older than them," Martelli said. "We wanted to use our physical experience and the physical nature of our older guys."

The Hawks, on the other hand, played inspired basketball. They handled the Dayton Flyers on Wednesday and jumped out to an early lead against St. Louis yesterday. St. Joe's led 11-2 after five minutes of action, 21-11 after 14 minutes and 33-14 by halftime.

"We're delighted," Martelli said. "We're going to rest and we'll get here tomorrow night at 5 p.m. to play a team that we know real well."

Martelli is referring to Temple, the team that dealt the Hawks their only loss in their last eight games. Since losing to the Owls, St. Joe's has won seven games in a row, something that Stachitas attributes to the team's "senior leaders" who "didn't want to go out with a .500 record."

Playoff time for Minutemen

Terriers pose tough first test of postseason

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Like always, there's some good news and there's some bad news.

The good news for the Massachusetts hockey team (13-19-2, 10-15-2 Hockey East) is that the Minutemen are in the playoffs this weekend.

The bad news is that No. 3 Boston University — the Hockey East regular season champion — is waiting for them.

More good news is that — at 4-4-2 since the beginning of February — UMass is the hottest of the four teams that have to hit the road for their best-of-three series this weekend.

More bad news is that — at 14-1-2 since Jan. 7 — BU (21-9-4, 17-7-3 HEA) is the hottest team in the nation right now. The Terriers also have a 2006 resume that reads "11-game winning streak and Beanpot Champion."

And though the UMass resume includes triumphs over three teams that were previously ranked in the nation's top five — Vermont, Colorado College and Boston College — the Minutemen will be forced to win two games at Agganis Arena, which would double their all-time win total against BU on the road.

But no one in the UMass locker room is talking about the past, or the Terriers' red hot play since the turn of the New Year or anything about Boston University in general. Instead, the Minutemen are worrying about themselves.

"We all know that if the right UMass team shows up that we can beat anybody," senior captain Stephen Werner said. "We're not so much worried about what they are going to do. They are certainly a hot team and a good hockey team, but we feel that if we play to the best of our abilities and play hard that we have a pretty good chance."

"We don't talk about an 0-0 [record

See HOCKEY on page 6

Senior defenseman Marvin Degon and the Minutemen will travel to Boston University this weekend to face the Terriers in the first round of the Hockey East playoffs. The first game of the best-of-three series is tonight at 7 p.m. at Agganis Arena.

Clean slate for Mass Attack against Terriers

Jon Pelland

It's here; the second season is finally upon us. Everything the Massachusetts hockey team has done over the past six months means nothing once the Minutemen step on the ice this weekend to face Boston University in the first round of the Hockey East playoffs.

At the Mullins Center practice rink this week you could almost feel the adrenaline in the air. You can feel the sense of excitement the players and coaches feel — you can feel that it's playoff time.

It would be an understatement to label the UMass season as a roller-coaster. All year long this team has hit incredible lows just to bounce back but then falter once more. We've seen them lose six in a row early in the season, then take down these Terriers. However, then they went on to a shaky December, a decent January and then right back up in February. Predicting is a lost cause with this team — I gave up on it back in December.

All that needs to stop right now if the Minutemen are going to go into beautiful Agganis Arena and take down mighty BU this weekend. Did I mention that the Terriers just so happen to be one of the hottest teams in the nation right now and the Maroon and White have yet to win at Agganis? Oh well, that all doesn't matter as long as the Minutemen take care of a few details.

As crazy as it may sound, the Mass Attack is capable of going into Beantown this weekend and coming out alive. It just depends on what team shows up. If the Gabe Winer and Jon Quick that took down Colorado College and Boston College earlier in the season show up, then they should be just fine. However, if the team that had a virtually non-existent power play in the first half of the season shows up, then it could be a safe bet that the Minutemen will be riding the bus back to Amherst on Saturday night with no need to play on Sunday.

First and foremost, the main thing that needs to be strong for UMass this weekend is their goaltending. Steady play between the pipes will almost always give a team more confidence and help them to relax.

UMass coach Don Cahoon has gone with a two-man rotation in net this season with the senior Winer and freshman Quick. During the past few years, Winer has held down the number one position with little competition, but you had to know coming in that the top three prospect, Quick, was going to get some time coupled with the fact that Winer's level of play dipped slightly a season ago.

The key number for both of them this weekend is two. They have to limit the Terriers to two goals a game in order for the Minutemen to even have a shot at winning.

UMass faces Albany

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Anyone that saw or heard what happened to the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (1-3) on Wednesday — a forgettable 16-7 trouncing by No. 3 Dartmouth — had to have been pleased by what went down late Thursday afternoon under the lights at Garber Field.

While Minutewomen head coach Carrie Bolduc declined to comment when asked to rate her team's level of intensity, there were signs of what kind of force they were exerting all over the field during a routine practice. On one end, freshman Meghan Reddy was seen with a trail of blood trickling down one of her sleeves, which Bolduc said was from practicing. At the other end, fellow frosh Kayt McCormick was busy running into a fence.

"We look over, and she hasn't stopped the play," Bolduc laughed yesterday evening in her office. "She went after a ball and threw her body into the fence. We all looked over, like 'What was that?' because you don't hear that kind of sound every day."

Keeping things light-hearted, Bolduc let loose a "yeah" after explaining the incident.

Any irony, though, that these are two freshmen who have quickly made their mark on the field (McCormick has six points, to Reddy's four, through four games), giving off the impression of an upperclassman?

"They work hard," senior captain Kerri Connerty said of them. "They're hard-working freshmen, and they bring a lot to our team personality-wise, and heart and hustle. Kayt acts like an upperclassman — like a senior — out there."

Based on the outcome of Wednesday's game, in which the Dartmouth Big Green scored eight goals in the first eight minutes to walk by UMass easily, the Minutewomen are going to need to come out and bring that type of intensity right away, to set the tone and maintain control of the game.

Considering who they're up against — the red-hot Albany Great Danes — that won't exactly be a small task.

When you look at the Danes' cumulative season stats sheet, some numbers pop out at you immediately. Through their first three games of the season, Albany is outscoring its opponents 46-14, for an average margin of victory of 10.3 points and an average of 15 goals per game. They are out-shooting their opponents 106-59, averaging 35 shots a game. They are converting shots at 43.4 percent success rate.

Albany is currently off to its best start in school history, starting 3-0 for the first time and winning its first game of the year for the first time, and continues to roll. In their last game, a March 4 home contest against the Siena Saints, the Danes cruised to an all-too-easy 18-2 rout.

Albany currently has four players in double figures for points — Krissy Rajczak leads with 13, Julie Bush and Sarah Spillett both have 12, Kate Fontana has 11 — while the Minutewomen have none (Connerty leads with eight).

Worth mentioning, too, is that both teams were predicted to finish sixth in their conference, both of which (Albany's America East, UMass' Atlantic 10) are amongst the best conferences in the nation.

When asked if she's surprised at all by the Danes' hot start, Bolduc pauses for a hot second.

"They're a good team," she said. "Every team we play this year is going to be a good team. There are no big games anymore — they're all big games."

If the big game is to work in their favor, the Minutewomen are going to have to take back control of one of their stronger aspects — draw controls. Dartmouth dominated the Minutewomen in that category on Wednesday, 16-9, and the Danes are averaging 11 per game, to UMass' eight.

Bolduc also noted that taking care of the basics will be vital, too.

"[We've got to] do the simple things right," she said. "Throwing, catching — they just need to work. They need to work, they need to compete, they need to want the ball and they just got to want to win it. It's pretty simple."

Sophomore attacker Kathleen Typadis will lead UMass into a clash at Albany tomorrow at 4 p.m. Typadis is second on the team in scoring.

UM heads south for tournament

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

After a two-week layoff, the Massachusetts Softball team (1-6) is starting its spring break early this weekend at the Southern Florida-Adidas Spring Break Invitational in Tampa, Fla.

The Minutewomen will be in a pool with opponents Purdue, Villanova, Northern Illinois, Tennessee Tech and Jacksonville. UMass plays each team once before moving on to bracket play.

The tournament began last night with back-to-back games against Purdue and Villanova. The Maroon and White are scheduled to play two more today against Northern Illinois and Tennessee Tech.

The Minutewomen are just 3-5 all time against these teams, and have never played Tennessee Tech.

Last week's tourney, the National Fast-pitch Coaches' Association Leadoff Classic was rained out after just two games, and the Minutewomen lost several potential chances to play nationally ranked opponents. That means this weekend's games have increased significance for UMass' chances for an at-large bid to the NCAA tournament.

The USF-Adidas Invitational is the first of two Florida tournaments UMass is taking part in before the start of Atlantic 10 conference play. Next week the Minutewomen head back to the Sunshine State for the Florida Atlantic Parent's Weekend Tournament.

If UMass is going to find success down South, the pitching staff must remain consistent. Freshman Brandice Balschmiter has started off her collegiate career with a bang. Last week she was named the A-10 Player of the Week for her performance in the Campbell Cartier tournament in California.

This week she was honored again, this time as the A-10 co-Rookie of the Week. Balschmiter was 0-1 at the NFCA Leadoff Classic, but had a 1.97 earned run average. On the season, Balschmiter has a 1-3 record and a 1.78 earned run average.

Balschmiter's teammate, senior Jenna Busa, has struggled as of late. Busa has racked up an 8.56 earned run average and has yet to record a win this season. Busa, last year's A-10 Tournament Most Valuable Player, has pitched just nine total innings to Balschmiter's 35.1.

UMass will need both athletes to play well this weekend in order to go deep into the tournament.

On offense, the Minutewomen have also struggled. Sophomore Lauren Proctor leads the team in batting with a .304 average, but is the only player with a batting average above .300. UMass is batting just .202 as a team and has left 47 runners on base, nine more than the 38 left on by its opponents.

With the way Balschmiter has been pitching, however, the Minutewomen shouldn't need too much more offense than that to gain better results this weekend.

UMass will begin the next leg of the regular season on March 24 against conference foe George Washington in the nation's capital.

Freshman pitcher Brandice Balschmiter and UMass will compete in the USF-Adidas Invitational this weekend in Tampa, Fla.

Colonials downed by Temple

CINCINNATI — The No. 6 George Washington Colonials were upset by John Chaney's Temple Owls yesterday, 68-53, in the second round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament at U.S. Bank Arena.

Temple advances to the quarterfinals and will play the Saint Joseph's Hawks tomorrow at 6:30 p.m.

The Owls spread out their offensive attack against the Colonials' Antwyane Robinson led Temple with 19 points, while big man Wayne Marshall and Mark Tyndale turned in 15 points each.

Temple captain Mardy Collins stole the ball with time running out in the first half and slammed it home before the buzzer sounded, giving the Owls a 31-23 going into the break. GW was never closer than that the rest of the way.

"You hope you put your players in position to score and make passes," Temple coach John Chaney said. "Today you had to pick an offense where you have two guys back for balance. We tried to make sure to keep balance."

"Temple played a fantastic game," GW coach Karl Hobbs said. "I give them a great deal of credit for maintain-

Police seek out victims of campus car thefts

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Police are looking for victims of car thefts after two students were arrested for a rash of car break-ins around the Orchard Hill Residential Area on Friday.

Alex D. Loyniak, 18, of 229 Jeffrey Lane in West Springfield, and Zivko Mihajlica, 20, of 122 Sandy Brook St. in Manchester, N.H., were both arrested on charges of larceny under $250 and breaking and entering at nighttime for a felony. Loyniak was additionally charged with possession of a Class D drug.

Police received a call from a student in Orchard Hill at 4:54 a.m., who reported that two students were entering unlocked cars and stealing various items. The student told police that the assailants appeared to be two males in Lot 49, which is outside Dickinson Hall. The caller stayed on the phone with police as a unit responded by setting up outside the perimeter of the lot, without using lights or a siren.

The officers observed the lot for a short amount of time. The two men then left the lot, and were observed by the reporting party to have entered at least one car.

Once the two men left the lot, they were stopped by police. The suspects were identified and searched, and in compliance with their Miranda rights admitted to entering four or five vehicles, according to police. The two were then identified and patted down for weapons and any other evidence, and the officers proceeded to take various items believed to be taken from the cars.

Items believed to be stolen include a small amount of cash under $50, two cell phones, a watch, a CVS card that didn't belong to either party, and a leatherman tool.

After another search of the lot, police did not believe that any of the cars were damaged. However, unauthorized entry into unlocked cars is considered a breaking and entering offense.

It is unknown which cars were broken into. None of the owners of the cars have come forward to police as of press time.

UMass student brutally attacked

A Sunderland man is being held without bail at Franklin County District Court for the malicious attack and robbery of two men, including one UMass student.

Keoprachea B. Bun, 21, was arrested Tuesday and charged with assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, armed robbery, and unlicensed operation of a motor vehicle.

Brendon S. Taylor, of Hadley, and Taylor S. Aldrich, of Amherst, were hanging posters around the Mill Hollow apartment complex last Monday when they encountered Bun hitchhiking and agreed to give him a ride. As the men arrived at Bun's home, four unidentified males, along with Bun, reportedly dragged Taylor and Aldrich from the vehicle and beat them brutally with a bat, a stick, and a heavy U-shaped bicycle lock, according to the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

After he received the harsher of the two beatings, Taylor, a UMass undergraduate, drove himself to the Candidates want more accountability

The campaign led by Student Government Association Senator Sean Robinson and Central Residential Area Governor John Williams calls for change — in a multitude of ways — regarding how the SGA is run and how it's perceived throughout the student body at the University of Massachusetts.

Robinson, the presidential candidate, and Williams, the trustee candidate, have called for a more transparent SGA that includes full disclosure of its spending of student activity fees.

"Every student pays $81 towards their student activity fees, but no one knows where that money is going or how it is spent," Williams said. "If we are elected, we will place monthly advertisements in the Daily Collegian that illustrate exactly where our money is going."

Williams also says that, if elected, both he and Robinson will hold themselves publicly accountable if any of their platform goals fail to be reached.

"If any of our goals is failed to be reached, we will buy another ad and list the motion and a detailed analysis why that motion failed," said Williams.

Both candidates agree that the SGA needs to be more student-oriented with motions that will affect students directly.

"John's and my campaign is about realistic goals. It's about washers and dryers that work, it's about complete wireless Internet coverage throughout campus, it's about adequately funding club sports and cultural RSOs, and it's about protecting students' rights to privacy," said Robinson. "We want an open and transparent SGA. We want to deal with the issues that [are] effective, realistic goals for students."

Robinson, an active member of the Senate and a chairman on the Ways and Means committee, believes he holds the necessary skills needed to be a successful president.

"I believe my experience representing students on the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education and as President of the Associated Students of

Newbies envision a better-looking UMass

By Megan Daley
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts Student Government Association presidential candidate Michael Makarski and student trustee candidate Matthew Fox hope to implement their "beer goggles initiative" if the student body elects them this week.

"In general, what we want to do is make UMass more attractive," said Makarski.

Makarski and Fox hope to implement several changes in the current SGA in order to make UMass student government and the University itself more appealing to current and prospective students.

One of the most important ways to do this, said the team, is by making the SGA itself more accessible.

"People don't know what's going on at the SGA," said Makarski. "We want to make it more public."

Fox and Makarski plan to open up the SGA meetings to the public and allow individual students to bring their problems before student government. They hope that debates will take place on the open floor so that it can be covered by the Daily Collegian and therefore made public to the entire student body.

"We want to show UMass that one student does have a voice on this campus," said Makarski.

The pair also plans to increase the school's public appeal by bringing in more guest speakers. Makarski remembered when comedian and UMass alumnus Bill Cosby spoke on campus and the hype and student excitement that came with it. He has already begun researching how to bring speakers such as Bill Clinton, Dick Vitale and cast members from "The Daily Show" to UMass.

Makarski and Fox also want to head an SGA that makes sure the Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) are more fairly funded and represented. They plan to make the SGA budget accessible to students, so everyone can see where his or her funds are going and why.

A more accessible student writing center with better funding and more staffers and a student mentoring program are also important to set up, said Makarski.

As president of the Phi Sigma Epsilon fraternity, Fox says he has come to the realization that networking is one of the biggest skills students can possess to take them further in the world. To that end, Makarski and Fox plan to open up a networking system for graduate stu-

Student Government Association Senator Elvis Mendez and Secretary of Public Policy and Relations Misha Liebham, two of the most visible and active members in the SGA at the University of Massachusetts, promise students a transparent and productive SGA if they are elected president and trustee, respectively.

Mendez, a Framingham native, is a sophomore majoring in Anthropology and a member of the Citizens Scholars Program. He is currently served as the chair of the SGA Administrative Affairs Committee and has worked for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA). Mendez has also served as a member of the African, Latin, Asian, Pacific Islander, and Native American Caucus (ALANA) and the Casa Dominicana since he was a freshman, and he is currently the president of AHORA, a campus organization that serves students and communities with a Hispanic background. Over the past year, Elvis has worked closely with President Daniel Payares and Trustee Valerie Lons in an effort to run the SGA from an advocacy body for students.

"Success is bred from community," said Mendez. "We will advocate for students. We're not looking for an extra line in our resume. We run a clean campaign that stresses students' concerns and student issues. Our track record has shown we're willing to speak up for the interests of students."

Liebham, an Amherst resident, is a senior majoring in Social Thought and Political Economy with a minor in Latin American and Caribbean studies. Leiblum is currently the student coordinator for SCERA, and serves on Payares' executive cabinet as the Secretary of Public Policy and Relations. She has been a member of the ALANA Caucus for the past several years, and she is a coordinator with the national Free Higher Education Campaign. Over the past year, Misha has worked closely with Student Trustee Valerie Lons to coordinate a "Fee-ic Mandatory Fees" and a Fair Representation campaign, and she hopes to build on this momentum in the coming year.

Leiblum and Mendez state six principles and promises of their campaign on their Web site, www.peopleforumass.edu/mendez.

Their campaign calls for accessibility and affordability for all people regardless of their race, sexuality or class at UMass.

"This means that services meant for marginalized and disadvantaged communities should not be dismantled or set up for failure. We want to fund

Rob Shepard and Ed Cutting are against the UMass alcohol policy and tuition increases.

Shepard against new UMass alcohol policy

By Matt Belliveau

University of Massachusetts Student Government Association candidates Ed Cutting and Rob Shepard are campaigning on a detailed five-point platform that is planned to "help the SGA get back on its feet."

Cutting, who is running for student trustee, and Shepard, who is running for president, also plan to prevent the constant rise in student fees and tuition.

"Unlike my opponents who simply seek to get more money from the legislature, I am prepared to insist that UMass stop using the students as a credit card, that they stop balancing the budget on the student's backs," said Shepard.

Cutting believes it's important for SGA leaders to understand the severity of an increase in fees and tuition at UMass.

"The simple fact remains that if UMass is not affordable, it rapidly will become irrelevant. My opponents make a big issue of minor changes to the federal student loan program while ignoring the fact that loans have to be repaid," said Cutting. "Borrowing to finance a fixed asset, such as a house, is fiscally wise; borrowing to finance a depreciating asset, such as a car, is acceptable as long as the loan is repaid over the life of the car. But to ask students to borrow vast sums of money to finance a UMass degree, which may have no cash value at all, is obscene — it isn't all that different from going to Lowenbrau with the credit cards."

Both men also plan to fight against the new alcohol policies created by Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano.

"I am opposed to the alcohol policy," said Shepard. "I am also the only person to have testified against Bill No. 1257, a proposal to ban all alcohol in all dormitories in Massachusetts. It is my position that drugs are a bigger problem on campus than beer."

Cutting also stated that he would address UMass employee productivity in his campaign.

"Why is it that there are hundreds of people with six-figure salaries at UMass? I am the only person who has printed these salaries and if elected, I will do it again. In addition to mismanagement and the bloated incompetence that passes for the administration, we also need to address employee productivity," said Cutting. "The unions fear me — but it is the union members who are complaining loudest about their malingering colleagues. It shouldn't take four hours to put in a light bulb."

Shepard also promises to improve the level of customer service throughout UMass.

"I believe that students deserve better customer service. In a thousand different ways, the students are treated as third-class citizens and this needs to end," said Shepard.

Both men agree that if elected, they would extend the data network to family housing, which, according to Cutting, was promised nearly a decade ago, but had never been done.

The candidates also plan, if elected, to propose a motion that would allow for a select number of Meal Plan swipes to be used at local restaurants like Bueno y Sano, the Hangar and Wings.

Cutting also proposed to add new parking lots and reform Parking Services.

The candidates also voiced their support of Gargano's now-public policy to eliminate the illegal racially exclusive dorm floors.

UMass group to help Kenyan villagers

By Ashish K Sahu
Collegian Staff

Four undergraduate students from the University of Massachusetts' chapter of Engineers Without Borders (EWB-UMass) will spend their spring break in western Kenya beginning Thursday to kick off an engineering project that will provide a reliable, healthy water supply for a village of 1,000 subsistence farmers.

EWB-UMass is a group of engineering and non-engineering students, both graduate and undergraduate, whose mission is to help disadvantaged communities improve their quality of life by developing environmentally friendly and economically sustainable engineering projects.

"It's powerful to think that our student chapter will help provide clean drinking water to a village in Kenya, a country currently experiencing its worst drought in 20 years," said senior mechanical engineering student Christopher Arsenault.

CNN.com published an article on "Kenyan family cry: God has cursed us" on Friday, which described Kenya as a land that has seen more than three droughts in the last six months.

The project will provide a reliable source of potable water for the community of Namawanga, which is in a western province of Kenya. This community presently relies on a water source that is more than two miles from the village. Villagers must fetch their water on foot, using buckets. The stream, which is often contaminated with animal and human waste, runs dry during part of the year.

The EWB-UMass project will attempt to reduce the villagers' chances of contracting waterborne diseases. The new sources will also allow the residents more time to look for food, participate in income-generating activities and attend school.

"Even though I am not an engineering student, over spring break I'll get to use the Swahili and I'm learning and actually get to apply my energy and knowledge to help real people," said Seth Mansur, a junior and active member of EWB. "Without EWB, I'd be just another face in the crowd."

The assessment trip in March will determine a plan for giving Namawanga a self-sufficient water supply that is both uncontaminated and sustainable. Presently, the EWB-UMass team is looking into a variety of solutions, including drilling a well, rainwater catchment systems, and conventional water treatment. In that context, the assessment trip will include extensive testing for major contaminants such as bacteria, arsenic, fluoride and nitrates. The implementation follow-up trip will take place in early 2007, staffed by as many as 10 members of EWB-UMass. The goals of this trip will be to put into effect a well-designed engineering plan created from the findings of the first trip. The EWB team will also be accompanied by one professional engineer from Thighe and Bond, an environmental firm from Massachusetts.

ASHISH SAHU/COLLEGIAN

The Engineers Without Boarders group from UMass is traveling to Kenya to help villagers who must travel miles to get clean water.

"Water is one of humanity's most basic needs," said Tameron Josbeck, a senior civil and environmental engineering student whose academic focus is water purification. "This project represents my belief that everyone in the world has an inherent right to clean water."

EWB-UMass will be doing fundraising to finance its Kenyan the project. Several project participants are also taking Swahili courses before leaving for Kenya.

"We have the ability to affect people on a scale that is much larger than ourselves," said sophomore EWB-UMass member Julie Gagen.

The parent organization, EWB-USA, sends engineering teams to communities in developing countries to improve their quality of life, while also encouraging internationally responsible engineers and engineering students. Local chapters such as EWB-UMass apply for, and are assigned, projects from the national office in Colorado, based on the soundness of their proposal and the qualifications of the personnel involved.

UMass infirmary, where an ambulance transported him to Cooley Dickinson Hospital. Taylor was allegedly dragged into the basement of Bun's home where he was further beaten in the back. Taylor received stitches and was treated for bruises. Police said $1,300 was taken from Taylor and Aldrich, including credit cards and Taylor's UMass identification card.

The four unidentified men remained at large as of press time.

According to the Daily Hampshire Gazette, area police were alerted to be on the lookout for a blue Ford Escort wagon and a brown sedan.

Sunderland police officer Michael Hebert spotted Bun arriving home when he called for backup and approached Bun. Herbert then observed a blood-smeared baseball bat in the backseat, along with blood throughout the car and on Bun, police said.

Upon a search of Bun's home, police not only found bloodstains, but drugs as well. Multiple blood smears, a pool of blood and a bloody footprint were discovered in the basement where Taylor's second beating allegedly took place. Police also found marijuana plants growing under grow lights.

The case remains an open investigation, according to police, as officers are looking for possible suspects in hopes of identifying the four additional attackers.

dents by working with the UMass Alumni Association.

"Networking can be a real advantage," said Fox. "We want to give students a way to get a leg up in the world."

Makarski said that he and Fox are different from others who are running for the SGA because, while they have been involved in student activities and politics, they "haven't been sucked into the void of the SGA."

Makarski has worked as an intern for the legislature in New Jersey and was also involved with John Kerry's presidential campaign office in Western Massachusetts. Fox is heavily involved with campus activities and calls himself "an avid follower of student government affairs."

Both students have sat in on several SGA meetings throughout the year. Makarski said that one of the biggest things he realized was that students involved in SGA cannot change it in just one year. The best a student can do is make the SGA more accessible to students, to lay the groundwork for a gradual change.

Makarski and Fox believe they are the candidates who can lay that groundwork.

Massachusetts has prepared me for the difficult task of reforming our Student Government into an organization which effectively and efficiently serves the interests of all UMass students," said Robinson.

"When I first transferred to UMass I came in excited about the SGA and student advocacy. But soon after, I realized that if you spoke out against the top leaders and their ineffective tactics, you were viewed as a sell-out — ineffective tactics like choosing not to work with Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano," said Robinson.

When asked if any blame could be put on Gargano for not being open to work with the SGA, Robinson answered, "He won't work with them because of the tactics they use, like calling him a racist when he's not."

"The power of student government is to persuade, primarily the administration, and currently our student leadership has failed to do this, thus we have no power," Robinson said.

The candidates have named themselves the "Election Crashers."

"Our campaign's posters are the 'Election Crashers' for a reason," said Robinson. "There are people who thought they had this election in the bag, they thought that students would forget about the promises they had made and didn't deliver on, they thought they could change the name of their candidate and continue with the same old ineffective politics. We're not going to let that happen. Students need to vote for change."

Track star reflects on impressive record at UMass

By Dan Tebr
Collegian Staff

It's a hard feeling to describe — it sits like a rock in the pit of your stomach just moments before the big event, making you feel anxious, miserable, and elated all at once.

Jon Korhonen knew this feeling all too well on Feb. 11, just minutes before what would soon become the most significant race of his career.

"Going into that race I had no idea I could do it," said Korhonen.

"To see him run a race is incredible, seeing him lay it out for a whole mile," said Walter Biner, one of Korhonen's teammates. "You don't get to see that very often and when you do it's something beautiful."

It was eight times around the red rubber track in the crowded Track and Tennis Center at Boston University. A large crowd was on hand to watch this race, considered to be the premier event of track.

Korhonen is a second-year senior at the University of Massachusetts Amherst and will be graduating this May. He ran a 4:04.25 in the Boston University Valentine Invitational, breaking the UMass record in the mile set 25 years ago. Even though it was an amazing time, it was not enough for Korhonen to qualify for Nationals. Since he no longer has any more spring track eligibility, Korhonen's time with UMass track has now ended.

Gaining accolades is nothing new to Korhonen. He was named an ESPN Academic All-American and Atlantic 10 Indoor Track & Field Student-Athlete of the Year in addition to winning the New England Indoor Championship last season.

Born on February 26, 1983, Korhonen has lived in Gardner all his life and has been running on some type of organized track team ever since the seventh grade. While at Gardner High School, he won the first cross country meet his sophomore year and broke his school's record in the mile his senior year, placing second in New England.

Oddly enough, Korhonen was not recruited by anyone, and was not even sure he wanted to run track in college. It was actually another of Korhonen's talents that encouraged him to enroll at UMass. In addition to having his heart set on UMass and it being the only place he applied, Korhonen wanted to continue participating in a marching band. Following the same path in both high school and college, he started playing the saxophone and then became a drum major.

Still, what could make this first-rate runner want to end his career at the high school level?

"Running sucks sometimes," said Korhonen, "as wonderful as all the rewards are, it's hard."

Now, after five years with the UMass track team, Korhonen admits that the work is worth it.

"I'm at a point now where I have finally fallen in love with running. Years ago I never really got out of it what I was putting into it," he said. "Yeah, being in the paper was great and breaking this record was wonderful, but the whole process of getting there was not that enjoyable, whereas now I almost enjoy the process as much as the result…I'm now finally hooked."

In the record-breaking race at B.U., Korhonen started off by hanging with the pack, keeping pace with the rest of the runners, and then he realized what was about to happen.

"More than halfway though the race I just knew," explained Korhonen. "I had this feeling, I felt great, everything was going and it was like 'I think this is the day'…three laps from the end of the race I had a feeling I could do it. It opened up. I went crazy. I remember finishing and looked up at the board and saw the time and that was unbelievable."

Like night and day, Korhonen considers the moment he finished the record-breaking race to be "the most enjoyable moment ever and the moment just before the race as the least enjoyable moment."

It was inconsequential that he actually got second overall in the race; Korhonen could not help but feel what he described as "pure bliss."

This, of course, is the greatest accomplishment of Korhonen's to date, yet he also recognizes that it has taken time for him to reach this point and that each accomplishment before this one still holds great meaning.

It is not just on the track where Korhonen stands out, either. UMass track and field coach Ken O'Brien says that Korhonen "tends to elevate the enthusiasm and ability of those around him. Any group or individual needs some energy to reach their potential."

Energy is one thing Korhonen never lacks. Whether in a social setting, on the track, or at his job as a tour guide, Korhonen's energy is contagious and caught by all of those around him.

His presence breaths life into any situation through his loud animated laugh and his great stories, like the one about the time he lost a race to a runner with only one shoe. Biner perhaps put it the best when he said "I have never met anyone who loves life more than Jon."

Not everything comes up roses for Korhonen, however. It was only two weeks after the memorable race when Korhonen had a poor showing at a race in New York City. After this race on Friday, he headed to Boston to meet up with his team, but his coach told him the morning of the race he would not be competing. A very emotional Korhonen knew that "running another hard mile on Saturday was just going to wear me out more," but he still did not want to let down his teammates and the many spectators waiting to see him run.

So after botching one race, and being told he was not competing in another, there was only one thing left for Korhonen to do— put his shoes on and go for a six-mile run around the Charles River.

For the average runner, goals like breaking a school record or running a mile in 4:04.25 may be just as hard as getting their shoes on and getting out there. Korhonen knows that his teammates and his coach have given him the drive to get outside and pound the pavement with all he has every day.

Coach O'Brien shows the athletes what it means to have a passion, Korhonen says.

According to Korhonen, Coach O'Brien has taught him, "if nothing else, why you should have a passion for what it is you do…that's the biggest thing I've learned, not just how to run better, but why you should enjoy what you are doing."

Without his team, Korhonen knows running would be much more difficult, if not altogether impossible.

"If I had to run by myself for the last six months of training, I probably would have gone somewhat crazy," Korhonen said.

When Korhonen is not running, he has been studying communication at the University and also has a job as a student admissions representative, which gives him the opportunity to show prospective students how great he thinks UMass is. Every year except this one, Korhonen was in the marching band as well.

John Korhonen credits his coach and teammates for his success in track.

With graduation looming, Korhonen is not sure where life will take him. He does plan to take some time off and travel to Australia to do volunteer work.

"I've always been a live in the moment type person," said Korhonen, also expressing that one day he would love to be a coach.

As great as this achievement has been, Korhonen does not want to be remembered solely as the kid who broke the record.

"Just because I ran a mile in four minutes and four seconds doesn't mean anything in the scheme of things," said Korhonen. "I'm just glad to have had all these amazing experiences here at UMass, and hope more than anything else that I've helped others to enjoy their experiences as well."

Iran rules out latest foreign nuclear deal

TEHRAN, Iran (AP) — Iran ruled out a Russian proposal aimed at easing tensions over its nuclear program Sunday, drawing criticism from a senior lawmaker in Moscow who said the decision destroyed the last chance for compromise before the U.N. Security Council takes on the issue this week.

Iranian Foreign Ministry spokesman Hamid-Reza Asefi also warned that Iran is considering large-scale uranium enrichment at home as a response to the International Atomic Energy Agency's decision to refer Tehran to the Security Council.

However, Tehran did back away from a threat to use oil as an economic weapon if the council should impose sanctions.

Russia had sought to persuade Iran to move its enrichment program to Russian territory, which would allow closer international monitoring. Iran reached basic agreement with Moscow on the plan, but the details were never worked out.

"The Russian proposal is not on our agenda any more," Asefi told reporters. "Circumstances have changed. We have to wait and see how things go with the five veto-holding countries [on the council]."

The comments effectively meant the Russian proposal was dead after the nuclear watchdog agency referred Iran to the Security Council, which can impose political and economic sanctions, last week.

"We are not afraid of the Security Council. What is important for us is defending our legitimate rights," Asefi said. "Iran is a powerful country and is able to defend its interests."

In Moscow, Konstantin Kosachev, the head of the international affairs committee of the lower house of parliament, harshly criticized Iran, saying the decision meant the end of chances for a compromise on the issue, according to Russian news reports.

Kosachev also warned Tehran that its refusal to continue talks on the Russian offer could "radicalize" the Security Council debate on the issue.

The United States and its Western allies accuse Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons. Iran denies any intention to build weapons, saying it only aims to produce energy.

A Western diplomat, who insisted on anonymity in detailing the confidential discussions, said a new meeting among the permanent council members — the United States, Russia, Britain, France and China — was planned Monday to look at a revised draft statement. The text was aimed at pressuring Tehran to resolve questions about its nuclear program, including demands that it abandon uranium enrichment.

Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said Tehran had no intention to use oil as a weapon in the confrontation, contradicting a statement a day earlier by Interior Minister Mostafa Pourmohammadi.

"The Islamic Republic of Iran is determined to continue to provide Asia with the oil it needs as a reliable and effective source of energy and will not use oil as a foreign policy instrument," he said at a conference on energy and security issues in Tehran.

4 troops killed in Afghanistan bomb attack

KABUL, Afghanistan (AP) — A roadside bomb killed four U.S. troops passing by in an armored vehicle in eastern Afghanistan on Sunday, the deadliest attack on coalition forces in a month.

In Kabul, a suicide bombing Sunday killed two people and narrowly missed the chief of Afghanistan's upper house of parliament, and he accused Pakistani intelligence of trying to assassinate him.

The two bombings were the latest in a series of militant attacks that appear to be gathering intensity four years after the ouster of the hard-line Taliban regime by a U.S.-led invasion.

The four American troops died while patrolling in the Pech Valley in Kunar province, military spokesman Col. Jim Yonts said. Kunar Gov. Asadullah Wafa said the roadside blast went off as a convoy of six American vehicles passed.

Yonts said attacks would not deter the U.S.-led coalition from their mission of defeating Taliban and al-Qaida militants and establishing lasting security.

Sunday's bombing raised the death toll of U.S military personnel in the region to 220 since a U.S.-led offensive toppled the Taliban regime in Afghanistan in late 2001. It was the deadliest attack since Feb. 13, when a roadside bomb killed four American troops in central Ruzgan province.

Also Sunday, a car bombing in the capital targeted Sibghatullah Mujaddedi, a Muslim cleric who briefly served as president in 1992. He now heads the upper house of parliament and leads a commission encouraging Taliban fighters to reconcile with the government.

Mujaddedi escaped with burns to his hands and face but two bystanders, a girl on her way to school and a man on a motorbike, were killed. Two attackers who drove the explosives-laden station wagon into the convoy also died.

"The explosion was very strong. For a while I couldn't see anything. I was in the front seat of my car. I saw a big fire came toward me," the white-bearded Mujaddedi told a news conference a few hours later.

His hands were wrapped in bandages — burned when he raised them to protect his face from the blast.

The bloodstained road was littered with parts of the attackers' car.

SGA elections: Time for a change?

Jeff Napolitano

This year will be my third year of witnessing (and participating in) the Student Government Association (SGA) elections. I have some experience in this — I campaigned for and was a part of Eduardo Bustamante's presidency, and I did the same last year for Pavel Pilyano and Valerie Louis. This year I'm pushing for Elvis Mendez and Mishy Leiblum, as a continuation of student government that isn't simply about putting a notch in one's resume. But every year I wonder if assuming the reigns of power in a college student government is really very important in the grand scheme of things. Henry Kissinger's observation that "University politics are vicious precisely because the stakes are so small" has begun to resonate, particularly in the past couple of years.

It isn't that the initiative of students is lacking. It was the initiative of students that got us pretty much every office under the umbrella of Student Affairs and Campus Life — these things were not handed to us. A lot has been written in this paper in the last week about SCERA, the Student Center for Research and Advocacy. SCERA is a student-created, student-funded, and student-run agency which is dedicated to facilitating the work of student activists on campus, whether it's those "Know Your Rights" flyers that students living in the dorms have likely seen recently, or the push to freeze tuition and fees at the Board of Trustees (BOT) last month. SCERA is a lot of things, but calling it a "pet project" trivializes years of student progress and independence.

It was the SGA that suggested and pushed for a textbook rental system, to keep the outrageous cost of books down at school. It was the SGA that brought up the issue of diversity last year, after the embarrassing stunts of the "KKK-9" and embarrassing behavior of Vice Chancellor "More Abercrombie and Fitch, Less Old Navy" Gargano. It was the support of dozens of progressive students, who ran as Take Back UMass senators, who instituted "Back to the People" meetings to try to make the SGA more accountable to the student body. It was the SGA, under the leadership of those I've mentioned, which has pushed for a more relevant, progressive student government at UMass Amherst.

But we're clearly not there yet. Not everyone who is a student here is aware of what the SGA is doing for them. The problem, as someone who has looked at the situation for a couple of years, is that the SGA is simply not allowed to do all the useful things it wants.

This is not, when all is said and done, the fault of the senators, the speaker, or the president. Most of these people don't even get paid to devote 10, 20, or 40 hours a week to the SGA. The ones that do get paid receive minimum wage — they'd literally be making more working at McDonald's. And the leadership of the past couple of years, given their insistence that students have a voice separate from the corporate leadership of the University, sure as hell won't be getting any letters of recommendation from the Chancellor.

But we're clearly not there yet. Not everyone who is a student here is aware of what the SGA is doing for them. The problem, as someone who has looked at the situation for a couple of years, is that the SGA is simply not allowed to do all the useful things it wants.

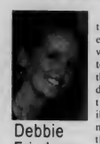
The problem, after observing the passage of motions, programs, and budgets that would only serve to make this school a better place, is that ultimately everything has to be approved of by the Vice Chancellor, the Chancellor, or by the Board of Trustees. And that's where the hours of work by well-meaning students end.

So every year, senators who have busted ass to raise the issue of the diversity of this school, or of the affordability of tuition and fees, see motion after motion go to the Vice Chancellor's office and either get rejected or sit there forever in limbo. And consequently, those senators decide that they're not going to bother to waste their time, and they move on to bigger and better things.



At the same time, the well-meaning and hard-working students in the SGA have to constantly fend off the "resume-builders." The "resume builders" are the ones who meet regularly with the Vice Chancellor, who don't really understand the difference between play-acting government in high school and the potential of college government with a $1.8 million budget and a foot in the door of the legislature. They're the ones who heckle and demean the work of others, but never have the initiative to try to create change.

Look, I'm not sure how much to care about student government here. But I know this: I went to the Board of Trustees meeting last month, to fight (yet another) increase in the cost of this school. I saw there all the students listed at the beginning of this column. I saw them truly advocate on behalf of the students of this school. Remarkably, for the first time in years, they even persuaded some Trustees to vote with us. That hasn't been done in a long, long time. And although that vote was ultimately a (temporary) defeat, I saw those students the next day, not giving up, busting ass again to try to make this school a better place. Most notably, aside from Elvis and Mishy, I saw no other candidate from the upcoming SGA elections there.

Change — real, permanent change — is slow. But we've gone from zero victories a couple years ago to a few today. I don't know if the SGA will ever be as powerful as it should be. But I do know who should be in its leadership, if it ever reaches that point.

What else is there?

Debbie Friedman

Imagine a country whose government starts a war on false pretenses. A couple thousand soldiers die, and despite the incredible amounts of money put into the war and the confidence spewed out from the people in charge, everything still falls apart.

Imagine that this same administration somehow gets re-elected and in the first year and a half of its second term manages to fail millions of people after a devastating hurricane, gets caught illegally wiretapping into citizens' phone conversations and attempts to sell some of its major ports to a Middle Eastern company which has ties to a terrorist organization that had attacked this imaginary country years before.

Now stop imagining, pull yourself out of your sleepy and/or drug-induced haze, turn off American Idol and pay attention… Because this is reality.

Since these politically incorrect and absurd violations of our trust have been occurring and continue to go on, I find it interesting to wager about where exactly our (the American citizens') breaking point is. What would President Bush and his administration have to do for there to be a Watergate-esque scandal? He or someone in his cabinet would probably have to shoot an old man in the face. Oh wait, that's been done. But really, where is your breaking point.

What would President Bush and his administration have to do for there to be a Watergate-esque scandal? He or someone in his cabinet would probably have to shoot an old man in the face Oh wait, that's been done

America? I'm not talking about outrage shown in decreasing approval rating numbers, I'm talking about real honest-to-God fury.

While I could give it a good shot, we cannot blame the media for everything. By this, I mean that they have been reporting on many of the latest Bush administration screw-ups. We all saw the pictures from New Orleans of people in desperate situations. We saw the tragedy unfold as thousands of people were inhumanely stuffed into the Superdome. And we heard about the e-mails of Michael Brown, the head of FEMA, whose dinner was a much more pressing issue than saving lives. Sure, disasters happen, and they are unpredictable and ruthless. However, the government got fair warning — documented evidence about the high possibility of the levees breaking, and somehow Bush still got away with playing dumb. I'm sure the people in New Orleans have passed their breaking point. But those of us who stayed dry and cozy watching all of this in our living rooms during the commercial breaks of some stupid show clearly have not.

Ironically, a lot of people who stand by Bush through all of his muck do so because he makes them feel secure. So what do these people think when he is blissfully ignorant of a deal that gives operative control of major ports in the tri-state area and New Orleans to a company like Dubai? And once informed, he gives full support to this insane deal. I can't speak for those Bush supporters, but his latest actions makes me feel about as safe as watching a toddler in the deep end without swimmies.

There is an incredibly high amount of scandal going on in Washington right now — like Scooter Libby's indictment for leaking the name of a CIA official, or Tom Delay's ties to corrupt lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Between it all, I really empathize with Mugatu in Zoolander when he says, "I feel like I'm taking crazy pills!"

It seems like Bush would have to get caught murdering a pound full of puppies and Cheney would have to mistakenly shoot a child in the same day before anyone got really mad. Or maybe all it really would take is for an intern to be caught under one of their desks, because sex scandals get people up in arms much faster than issues that have real political significance.

Since the media is the lapdog of this administration and we the people are too busy [illegible] to realize the extent of what is happening around us, the Bush administration is able to run wild and free, completely careless to its approval rating because its members do not have to worry about re-election. So Bush and cronies sell our ports and national security to the highest bidder, evoke warrantless invasion of privacy, take us to war, bribe, lie, cheat and steal, because unfortunately we will let them.

I know a lot of people are fed up, well past their breaking point, and I can also see the public slowly listening, learning and turning their backs on the Bush administration. But even if we all hit our breaking points tomorrow, what the hell do we do next?

Slogans are important, like headlines

Dan Nicastro

While struggling to find a topic for this very column, I came across a disturbing piece of news. As the page loaded, I saw a picture of Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman behind three or four microphones, the American flag strategically placed behind him, and a headline which read "Dems Indicted, Clinton, Kerry Targeted."

Obviously, this was a scary sight to behold. I wondered if Jack Abramoff was tired of only giving money and services to powerful Republicans and wanted to reach out to the Democrats in order to mix things up a bit. However, I quickly disregarded this thought, since lobbying only works if the person being lobbied has some sort of power, meaning they need to be in some sort of position to effect legislation. I then considered the possibility that President Clinton's request for 25 new interns was raising suspicions and that the Republican party was looking to draw attention away from itself. I quickly dismissed this idea, as a scandal involving former President Clinton with interns would be old news and would not be very effective in luring attention away from the Republican scandals.

I opened the page and found that this indictment was something the Democrats could not shy away from. There was no escaping this heinous charge: "The head of the Republican Party, launching a broad indictment of the Democratic Party six months before midterm elections, is expected to charge Friday that the opposition can't find an election-year slogan, let alone agree on a broad agenda."

I stood at my screen, my mouth agape in horror. If the Republicans let the American people know that the Democrats can't agree on something as simple as a slogan, we're screwed. Forget the 2006 midterms. Hell, forget the 2008 Presidential race, or the 2010 midterms. In fact, we may never win again. That is, unless the Democrats realize what you need to do to win, and that the best way to do that is to look at the Republicans.

Republicans know how to get the message across so that people care. The American people recognize a strong advertising campaign when they see it, so the Republicans continue to embrace this and create advertising slogans that are so strong they don't even need to be backed up by fact.

The 1994 Republicans understood what the American people wanted when they introduced the Contract with America, the very first provision of which was to "require all laws that apply to the rest of the country also apply equally to the Congress." Besides a few relatively minor things (Tom DeLay indicted for campaign improprieties, Bill Frist involved in insider trading, Scooter Libby and possibly the Bush administration's complicity in outing CIA agent Valerie Plame, Dick Cheney's ties to Halliburton, Bob Taft, Bob Ney, John Doolittle and Duke Cunningham all accused of accepting bribes from lobbyist Jack Abramoff, President George W. Bush illegally spying on American citizens…) the Republican party has closely followed this mantra, winning the hearts and minds of the American people.

Obviously there is work to be done by the Democrats. I mean, their midterm slogan is "Together, we can do better." Who would vote for that?

The Democrats need to understand that they are in serious trouble. Without a strong slogan, people will show up at the voting booth and not remember the fact that most of the administration and top Republicans are embroiled in scandal. In order to win, they need to understand: no one cares that being a Democrat means we believe that health care is a basic, fundamental right of citizenship, or that we are destroying the environment, or that government is supposed to help out not only its rich citizens, but its poor and middle class ones as well, or that women have a fundamental right to protect their own privacy, or that everyone really does deserve equal rights, or that education is one of the single most important institutions in this country and must be funded as such. They need to understand that the American people want a condensed four or five word phrase which means nothing.

Dan Nicastro is a Collegian columnist.

I have a few suggestions: to show the American people know where the Democrats stand. How about: "Say no to war — well, say yes and then fervently say no." Or, how about "Vote Democrat: It's like voting Republican, but without the guilt." That one really only works for Joe Lieberman, so maybe he should use it in his upcoming Senate campaign. Or how about "At least we don't profit from our scandals." Howard Dean has suggested that the Democratic slogan just be a primal scream, but has met some resistance. There's also the requisite "Whatever you want us to stand for, we will." That really pulls at the hearts and minds of the American people.

DUFFY IS MUFFY

On Friday's editorial page, Ben Duffy compares women who have had abortions to Nazis. Not only does he compare them, but he insists that these women are "undeniably worse" than Nazis. How does he reach such a ridiculous conclusion?

Duffy is oblivious to the fundamental differences between having an abortion and being a Nazi. I could be wrong, but I'm pretty sure Hitler and his followers set out with the intent to massacre millions of people, including whole families, because these people were believed to be "inferior."

Women have abortions because they do not have the many, many resources needed to raise a child or carry a pregnancy to term (emotional, financial, physical, medical, family support, etc). They are not cleansing themselves of inferior offspring, or trying to better society by way of abortion, as Duffy seems to believe. Has he ever seen a women walking out of a clinic, smiling and holding a baby-skin lamp shade? I don't think so.

Naturally, Duffy is entitled to his opinions, but I find his stance is offensive in many ways. It is deeply insulting to both women and Holocaust victims. Anyone who has had, has performed, or supports abortion is "undeniably" a worse person than a Nazi. Nazis are bad, sure, but they are far from the pure evil that woman's health doctors, their patients, and their supporters are. And to all the Holocaust victims out there, hey, your life could have been worse — you could have been an aborted fetus!

There's no doubt this article was written to get under these skin. In ways it reminds me of the infamous "Pat Tillman" editorial. However, Duffy is conveniently spending the semester in Germany, tucked safely away from any backlash he may stir up here on campus. For someone who doesn't have a uterus of his own, Duffy is really acting like a pussy.

LEIBLUM FOR LIFE

I am writing to share my reasons for supporting Mishy Leiblum as a candidate for Student Trustee. While there are other candidates in the race, none have the combination of experience, commitment, and compassion that Mishy has, and these qualities make her uniquely qualified to represent UMass Amherst on the UMass Board of Trustees.

Experience — Mishy has been at the forefront of many fights for equity, affordability, and accessibility here at UMass. She has helped to raise consciousness about the important issues of race and class on our campus. As Secretary of Public Policy and Relations for the SGA, Mishy has gained an in-depth understanding of the way in which student government operates; this will help her to navigate the bureaucracy of the UMass system. As a life-long activist and organizer, Mishy also has the skills necessary to mobilize the UMass campus and to help us work together toward our common goal — an affordable, accessible, high-quality education for every student in the Commonwealth.

Commitment — There is no one on this campus who works harder than Mishy Leiblum. Week after week, month after month, semester after semester, Mishy plugs away at these issues. The opposition is daunting; many people make a healthy living by keeping UMass expensive and inaccessible. The work is frustrating; you have to take many losses before you get a win. Despite all of this, Mishy is there day in and day out fighting to make UMass a better place for all of us. We need people like that representing us on the Board of Trustees.

Compassion — Mishy's hard work and long experience are not the result of a drive to build a resume or to get into a top graduate school. She works this hard, and this effectively, because she truly wants to help people. This is important, because it means that she will not compromise her principles in order to gain short-term victories. Mishy will not sell out the future of this University; instead, she will fight tirelessly, as she has in the past, to make real, substantive changes to the fee and admissions structures of UMass. These changes may not come quickly, but when they do come, they will mean something real.

So please join me in voting for Mishy Leiblum for Student Trustee on Tuesday and Wednesday (March 14 and 15). I would also like to make a special plea to all grad students to turn out at the election. Both the Graduate Student Senate and the Graduate Employee Organization have endorsed Mishy Leiblum for Student Trustee. Together we can make a real difference.

Thank you.

Marley Remembered

New documentary celebrates life of controversial reggae legend

By Jacqueline Charles
Knight Ridder Newspapers

NINE MILE, Jamaica — In the unspoiled countryside where the remains of Jamaica's most famous son lie inside a marble crypt, children's voices wail the words of Bob Marley's legendary lyrics as curious visitors search for the secret to his prophetic wisdom.

Marley, the legendary reggae maestro who died of cancer in Miami 25 years ago, continues to be bigger in death than in life. That is true both in Jamaica, where his birthplace has become a shrine, and in his adopted home of Miami, where his mother and most of his 11 children still live. He is the subject of lectures and books, festivals and films; there is even a Marley-themed store on Miami's South Beach.

And now comes "Bob Marley & Friends," a film that will make its world premiere Thursday during the Miami International Film Festival.

But to gain a true understanding of Marley and his lasting cultural influence, one has to journey to his roots in this remote mountain village in St. Ann's Parish, 32 miles from Ocho Rios. He was born here 61 years ago last month. His mother Cedella was a young black Jamaican, and his father, Capt. Norval St. Clair Marley, was an older white Jamaican.

The town's tin roof shacks dot a winding road and stand in sharp contrast to the gated complex where Marley's childhood home and final resting place have been transformed into a tourist attraction honoring his legacy.

The attraction, outfitted in the symbolic red, green and gold colors of the Rastafarian movement, has become intrinsic to the identity of the otherwise mellow town — so much so that last year when Marley's widow, Rita, reportedly said she wanted to transfer Bob's remains to Ethiopia, the spiritual home of Rastafarianism, the people of Nine Mile declared, "Over our dead bodies."

Cedella Marley Booker, who has lived in South Florida since her famous son bought her a five-bedroom house some 30 years ago, was equally appalled, telling The Miami Herald last year that "Nine Mile is home, that is where we born and grow up, where we know life."

The Ethiopia-Jamaica controversy has since subsided, with Rita Marley and Booker as chairwoman and director, respectively. Although some here feel the foundation should be doing more, it has been credited with revitalizing the community.

> "Life is one big road with lots of signs. So when you riding through the ruts, don't complicate your mind. Flee from hate, mischief and jealousy. Don't bury your thoughts, put your vision to reality. Wake up and live!"

On any given day the place is swarming with tourists who come by the busloads to learn more about Marley.

The first and last stops are the gift shop, offering every item of Marley memorabilia there is; ta Jamaican company next year will begin offering a Bob Marley-brand water), followed by the restaurant, which treats visitors to both authentic Jamaican cuisine and Marley performances on a big screen television.

"Welcome to the foundation of Bob Marley," Jonathan "Fuzzy" Braham, the estate's caretaker and a Marley childhood friend, beams as he leads visitors through life-sized double oak doors bearing Marley's carved image. He remembers a young Bob playing soccer, and running between his mother's two-room house and his grandparents' home at the base of Sugar Hill.

"Bob Marley lived through the music," said Braham, before taking visitors inside the Ethiopian-style stained glass chapel housing his tomb.

Remnants of Marley's life are everywhere, from portraits of his mother and brother to Rita and their children to a soccer ball and guitar.

Six feet above the ground, the marble crypt holds two bodies.

Marley lies on top, while younger brother Anthony, who was killed in 1990, rests below.

"My first and my last," said Booker, who had reserved the space for herself when she brought her first-born son's body back to Jamaica to a hero's welcome.

Booker, or Mother Booker as she is called, chose to memorialize her son by building the mausoleum next door to the two-room house where she lived with Marley before he moved to Kingston.

"It's a very spiritual place because people from all walks of life come there," said Booker, who still lives on the estate when she visits.

"Here is where we were living," she said of the Florida house she shared with her son, "but Nine Mile is home."

Marley complaining her words had been "twisted."

Whatever the truth, for the people of Nine Mile, Marley is more than just a musical icon whose image has become a mass marketing tool. He is a hero, whose talent and message of love and peace allowed him to break out of Kingston's ghetto and transplant reggae music onto the international world stage.

He is a modern-day messenger whose cries for unity and peace resonate as loudly today as they did in 1981 when he died of cancer at Miami's Cedar's Medical Center.

"So much things Bob say must be done, but they don't do it," said Curtis Peart, a local resident, reflecting on Marley's legacy. "Bob Marley put the whole of Jamaica on the map. I am proud to know yes, he was born here."

Wayne Cunningham, a Rastafarian like Marley, said, "Bob Marley is our heritage. He's like a part of us."

The Bob Marley memorial is small and employs only a handful of workers, mostly guides who escort guests on a 30-minute tour of Marley's life. It is run by the Bob Marley Foundation, which lists

Introducing the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame: Class of 2006

By Malcolm X Abram
Knight Ridder Newspapers

The Rock and Roll Hall of Fame Foundation must see the trouble ahead.

They've had it relatively easy for the past 20 years, filling the Cleveland museum with classic rockers, influential blues and R&B performers and a dash of punk.

But as the years of eligibility reach the '80s (artist are eligible 25 years after their first recording), the pickings are going to get slim. They will be forced to consider bands such as Duran Duran and Motley Crue, both eligible since 1996, and more hip-hop and heavy metal for their future VH1 telecasts.

For years, music fans who care have been complaining that the foundation is a music industry good-old-boys club, and as the pool of obvious inductees becomes shallow, some omissions have become more glaring. The class of 2006 rectifies several of these slights, but also lends the proceedings an air of desperation.

The inductees will be welcomed on Monday in New York, in a ceremony to be simulcast live at the hall. Tickets are $10 through Ticketmaster. A heavily edited version of the ceremony will air on VH1 March 21.

BLACK SABBATH

Nearly every strain of metal, and there are many, has this quartet at the root of its genealogical tree. Sabbath's worthiness has been a no-brainer since they became eligible in 1995, and their exclusion has only made the voters look petty and vindictive over singer Ozzy Osbourne's disparaging comments about the hall.

There were heavy bands before Sabbath, such as Blue Cheer, but Sabbath took the term "power chords" to a new level. Guitarist Tony Iommi's slowed-down mutant blues riffs, drummer Bill Ward's big grooves, Geezer Butler's throbbing bass and dark lyrics (which occasionally espoused the virtues of love and God) and of course Osbourne's signature high-pitched whine, all crystallized by a macabre image and subject matter, sparked controversy and became the de facto image for much of the genre.

Bred in the English industrial wasteland of Birmingham in 1969, the four members started as a jammin' electric blues band called Earth, playing songs by Lightnin' Hopkins, Muddy Waters and others (for a taste of the band doing relatively straight blues, check out the 10-minute "Warning" from their debut). After realizing there was already a more popular band with the same name, they redubbed themselves Black Sabbath after one of Iommi's songs.

Their debut, released in 1970, charted in both the UK and the States, beginning a four-album genre-defining streak: "Paranoid," "Master of Reality," "Volume IV" and the keyboard-augmented "Sabbath Bloody Sabbath" contain the bulk of the hits still heard on radio. Intra-band problems fueled by the usual drug and alcohol excess, plus two lame records in a row ("Technical Ecstasy" and "Never Say Die"), drove Osbourne from the band in 1979 to start a very successful solo career.

He was replaced by Ronnie James Dio, who co-wrote and recorded two successful albums ("Heaven and Hell" and "Mob Rules") before being replaced in 1983 by Deep Purple vocalist Ian Gilliam. Both Butler and Ward would also leave the band and return, which soldiered on with Iommi and various replacements until 1997, when the original quartet reformed for a live recording. Since then the group has headlined Osbourne's wildly successful Ozzfest four times.

LYNYRD SKYNYRD

They're the quintessential Southern rock band, one whose influence can still be felt in hip bands like Kings of Leon and mainstream ones such as 3 Doors Down. While many folks (including, obviously, some rock hall voters) find their Stars and Bars-waving pride provincial and offensive, their music is embedded in contemporary Southern culture and classic rock radio, and thousands of people, Southern and otherwise, were raised on their songs and attitude.

Whereas the Allman Brothers were essentially a blues-rock band that frequently dipped into jazz and country, Skynyrd took blues, country, rock and a hard-drinkin', hard-livin', proud redneck attitude and turned it into a marketable lifestyle and a string of hit singles and albums. Their initial run ended in a tragic 1977 plane crash that took the life of charismatic singer Ronnie Van Zant, guitarist Steve Gaines and his sister, backup vocalist Cassie Gaines.

After the crash the band dissolved, and the surviving members embarked on various projects but never found the success they had as Skynyrd. In 1987 the band reformed with Ronnie's little brother Johnny on vocals to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the crash, and they've been active ever since.

THE SEX PISTOLS

In their roughly three-year existence, the Sex Pistols became the gob spat around the world, inspiring a generation of aimless, angry Brits. Americans and others to pick up instruments and raise a ruckus; actual musical talent was not required. The rock hall voters first chose the more eclectic and political Clash and the more tuneful Ramones before acknowledging the Pistols' undeniable influence.

In retrospect, the band's lone album and punk manifesto, "Never Mind the Bollocks," doesn't adhere to the stereotypical "louder and faster" ethos of much of the punk that followed. Musically, it sounds more like angrier, elemental takes on glam rockers Slade and the New York Dolls, but singer Johnny Rotten's bitter, nihilistic lyrics, sung with his patented sneer, are what turned them into the scourge of Britain.

The band began in the early '70s when guitarist (then vocalist) Steve Jones and drummer Paul Cook started a band called the Strand. Both Jones and Cook hung out at a hip boutique called SEX, run by bon vivant and budding manager Malcolm McLaren, where bassist Glen Matlock was an employee. The young band needed a singer and when John Lydon appeared, wearing a homemade "I Hate Pink Floyd" T-shirt, he was asked to audition. He sang Alice Cooper's "Eighteen" and became the band's front man.

With McLaren pulling strings and inventing a mythos (he famously once said he wanted them to be the Bay City Rollers), the band's first single, "Anarchy in the U.K.," featuring lines such as "I am an antichrist" and "Your future dream is a shopping scheme," caused a big stir and got them dropped from their label, EMI. Virgin released their next single, "God Save the Queen," in time for the Queen's Jubilee celebration. Its "God save the Queen, she ain't no human being" lyrics and "No future!" chant cemented the band's status as Public Enemy No. 1 even before the album was released.

In typical Sex Pistols style, Lydon has already told the rock hall that the band won't be attending the ceremony, adding a few cutting opinions of the whole concept in a note posted on his Web site.

MILES DAVIS

Just about any museum dedicated to honoring musicians should have a spot open for Miles Davis. One of the jazz icons who only needs one name, along with other innovators such as Bird, Dizzy and Pops, the music icon's 50-plus years in music included most of the major movements in jazz, and his sprawling 1970 double album "Bitches Brew" is widely credited (for better or for worse) as the birth of fusion.

Presumably, it's that controversial magnum opus and his subsequent melding of rock, funk, R&B, pop and improvisation that has him included as an inductee. The 1970s albums such as "In a Silent Way," "A Tribute to Jack Johnson" and "On the Corner" got him branded a sellout by jazz purists, but also made him a mainstream star and a hip cat to have in your record collection.

Holy %&! Howard Stern invades FM space of drivers everywhere

By Tim Brangger
The Morning Call (Allentown, Pa.)

You're driving down the road, calmed by the soothing sounds from your favorite Christian radio station, when all of a sudden Howard Stern hijacks your radio.

This is just the most outrageous example of a phenomenon radio station managers in the lower end of the FM spectrum have been hearing from listeners in recent months, a situation they attribute to improperly installed satellite radios.

The improperly installed radios turn automobiles into powerful mobile transmitters. When this occurs, specific radio frequencies in nearby automobiles and homes can be temporarily blotted out and replaced with the passing automobile's satellite radio broadcast, which can include Stern's uncensored Sirius Satellite Radio program.

"We've received numerous complaints about this sort of interference," says Charles Daughtery, president and engineering director for several Word FM stations that play contemporary Christian music, including WHYO 88.9 in Sellersville, Pa. "We're concerned about this. As (satellite radio) proliferates, you're going to get more and more of this."

Howard Stern, a Boston University alum, is sparking more controversy with his uncensored satellite radio program.

Neil Hever, program director for WDIY-FM 88.1 in Bethlehem, Pa., the Lehigh Valley's National Public Radio affiliate, has also received complaints.

"The problem seems worse at our end of the frequency spectrum," says Hever. "A lot of the satellite radios are set by default to broadcast on 88.1"

Mike Starling, a technology specialist with National Public Radio, said he's been hearing complaints about interference from member stations in recent months. "Howard Stern's Sirius broadcast has been mentioned a lot," he says.

The topic has also been discussed on radio-specific technical forums on the Internet.

Starling says the most serious interference is related to improperly installed satellite radios that are added to a vehicle, supplementing the existing AM/FM radio.

Satellite radios connected wirelessly to a car radio don't pose as much of an interference problem. These wireless systems, some of which plug into a vehicle's cigarette lighter, use an encapsulated, or self-contained, antenna that has a very limited range, Starling says. Built-in satellite radios, which come with newer cars, also don't produce interference problems.

The after-market satellite radios, radios car owners add on after they've bought the car, come with a switch, which is required by Federal Communications Commission rules designed to limit interference. Once properly installed and engaged when the satellite radio is in use, the switch prevents the satellite radio signal from transmitting over a car's existing FM antenna.

Without the switch, the satellite signal is inadvertently transmitted, and reports have indicated the signal can travel a quarter mile or more.

An FCC spokesman, who requested his name not be used, said the commission has not received specific complaints about the problem, but added the agency receives thousands of complaints a month and it's possible some have been filed.

Starling says the problem increases in densely populated areas. When he commutes to work along the Beltway outside of Washington, D.C., during morning rush hour, he says he routinely experiences interference. The interference is intermittent as his car moves through traffic.

Starling has already been in contact with Sirius Satellite Radio, which features some NPR programming.

He is also trying to convince satellite-radio manufacturers to use a relatively inactive FM frequency, 87.9, as the satellite radio's default frequency.

Use of that frequency, which is mostly used by low-power radio stations, mainly ones connected with small colleges and high schools, would not interfere with broadcasters, Starling says.

An XM Radio spokeswoman, Anne-Taylor Griffith, says the company has not received calls about the interference, but noted the add-on radios represent an older technology. "We haven't used that type of technology for in-dash radios for a couple of years now."

Users of these add-on radios also represent a fraction of XM's 6 million subscribers, she said.

Newer add-ons plug directly into input jacks in the car's radio, or connect to the radio wirelessly, she said.

Calls seeking comment from Sirius Satellite Radio, which has about 3 million subscribers, were not returned.

Other technology improvements may also help reduce interference, says Starling. Newer satellite radios designed for permanent installation in cars are "frequency agile," meaning users can select any frequency on their FM radio to transmit the satellite signal to their car radio. Many of the first satellite radios designed for permanent installation in cars had a limited number of frequencies the installer could choose, and almost all of them were in the lower end of the FM dial, says Starling.

Starling also is pushing to have the Consumer Electronic Association, the major industry watchdog group, include specifics of proper satellite installation in the association's certification course for radio installers. However, not all radio installers are certified by the association, Starling says.

Wright Penn says she wouldn't mind a little comic relief in her life

By Joe Neumaier
New York Daily News

NEW YORK — Why is Robin Wright Penn laughing?

The actress is known for playing serious women in serious movies, like the new drama "Sorry, Haters." She's married to serious-as-hell Sean Penn. And she knows that in her business, "seriousness" is marketable only about one month out of the year.

But Wright Penn, 39 years old and best known to audiences for her sweet portrayal of Buttercup in "The Princess Bride" (1987) and her bittersweet Jenny in "Forrest Gump" (1994), waves away any hint of heaviness with a wry smile and a self-mocking sense of humor.

"Choosing these kinds of intense roles is becoming sort of a bad habit," she says of a recent run that includes the HBO film "Empire Falls", a stunning segment of the short-film collection "Nine Lives", "White Oleander," and "Unbreakable."

"Playing the average manic-depressive woman who's hitting 40, yep, that'd be me," she snickers. "Bring it on!

"But I think what it is, really, is that (Hollywood) sees you do certain roles and says, 'Okay, that's her, let's cast her again and again as the same thing.' Then you wind up saying, 'I'd like to do something else,' and they whine, 'But whyyy?'"

Yet fans of her serious side will be happy to know her latest turn in this arena is a tour de force. In "Sorry, Haters," Wright Penn plays an edgy New York career woman with "personality issues" whose chance encounter with a Muslim cab driver (Abdellatif Kechiche) brings out the worst in both of them. Mainly a two-character drama, "Sorry, Haters" is not what it seems at first glance; it deals with many issues, including how 9-11 made people feel powerless, the disturbing attachment some people have to grieving, and the way New York can trample dreams both large and small.

"I read the script and thought, 'this is really good, but it scares the sh out of me,'" she says. "But it was so invigorating. And to film it all in 15 days in New York, hanging out on the curb between takes ... There was no downtime to doubt yourself."

Wright Penn was born in Dallas and raised in San Diego, the daughter of a single mother who sold cosmetics. She began modeling at 15, and joined the soap opera "Santa Barbara" in 1984 before "The Princess Bride" showcased her long locks and storybook looks. With her next major film, 1990's "State of Grace," about the Irish Mob in Hell's Kitchen, Wright Penn turned her attention to more dramatic projects.

But 1994's blockbuster "Forrest Gump" (in which she played Tom Hanks' doomed love) brought more opportunities for high-profile work, which she promptly turned down.

"I could have done (blockbusters) ... I was offered 'Robin Hood: Prince of Thieves' (she backed out because she was pregnant) and the third 'Batman' movie (a role that eventually went to Nicole Kidman). But I believe that you burn out with those things. And I didn't want to be bored."

Actress Robin Wright Penn starred as Jenny in the 1994 blockbuster "Forrest Gump," and is known for playing serious roles in intense films.

Aja's remake of "The Hills Have Eyes" is short sighted

By Peter Frisman
Collegian Staff

Of the many horror films of its ilk that have been, are in the process of being, or are in consideration of being remade, Wes Craven's 1977 rough-edged terror flick "The Hills Have Eyes" is one film that actually deserved such treatment. It met the criteria of a remake-worthy film: It was a clever concept with intriguing characters (particularly the villains), yet was hampered by such necessary elements as cohesion and production values. With a remake, all the necessary resources could theoretically be attained and the original could be considerably improved upon. While Alexandre Aja's attempt at doing just that never fails to entertain, however, it fails to take advantage of such opportunities.

An all-American family drives through desolate badlands in a renovated old trailer, their destination and reason for the journey revealed by laughably clumsy expository dialogue. A quirky gas station manager suggests a happily received shortcut, but his advice leads to their running amok of a group of people native to the region, which was used by the military as a testing ground for nuclear weapons. Resembling the fellow from "Robocop" who had a run-in with toxic waste, the mutated citizens gang up on the family and subject them to a veritable smorgasbord of unspoken horrors. There's still a chance the family can survive, but they'll need to stoop to the mutants' level to do so.

"The Hills Have Eyes"
Directed by Alexandra Aja
Starring Aaron Stanford
Craven-Maddalena Films
Rated R
107 mins.
Grade C

The production values are indeed plentiful in the remake. Aja proves himself to be the undisputed master of gore and grime. The makeup is startling. The cast brims with the likes of Ted Levine and Kathleen Quinlan. Most recognizable among the new generation is Emilie de Ravin, best known for her role as another person stranded in a foreboding place and threatened by bizarre and hostile natives in ABC's "Lost."

Relatively little of Craven's original has been changed, but the remake is missing one of the elements that made the original so sickeningly compelling: the interactions between the inbred/mutated (depending on the version) family. We can no longer shudder at the morals and way of life of the film's villains. Particularly missed is the character of the family's matriarch, who starred in the original's most memorable scene — her reaction to seeing the newly kidnapped baby. In place of such twisted character development is old-fashioned shock fuel footage that lends credence to a theory that a silo of fake blood was on the set. Aja clearly makes an effort to show audiences what other filmmakers were too restrained by common decency to show. One can imagine the film's focus group meetings: "Does a man taking a shotgun to the roof of his mouth make you queasy anymore? No? Okay, how about a close-up of the fellow's head after the fact?

Aja has previously directed the botched high-concept horror movie "High Tension," wherein he alienated progressive-minded viewers from his otherwise adequate slasher film due to a questionable presentation of a prosecuted minority. Apparently he hasn't learned his lesson: Under the opening credits of "Hills," footage plays of real people mutated by weapons testing. While freedom of expression is fine and good, I doubt the people in the photos wished for a legacy as cameos in a horror film remake.

COURTESY CRAVEN-MAGUIRE FILMS

Kathleen Quinlan, Ted Levine and Emilie de Ravin star in the remake of Wes Craven's 1977 horror film "The Hills Have Eyes."

While Aja's "The Hills Have Eyes" does an admirable job of maintaining suspense, its lacking of other qualities brings up the question of whether a remake was necessary. While it is a comparably decent remake that horror aficionados can enjoy, and hardcore fans of "Mystery Science Theater 3000" are in for a surprise of sorts, devout followers of Craven's original film might do better to sit this remake out.

An evening of Biss

By Risuen Fukagawa
Collegian Staff

The crowd gathered with excitement in Bowker Auditorium on Thursday night for an evening of classical piano with Jonathan Biss, an internationally acclaimed American pianist.

He opened the show with Beethoven's infamous Sonata No.8 in C minor "Pathetique," and immediately grabbed the attention of the audience through the way he hunched his back into the piano as if he was desperate to be "one" with the music. The first movement, "Grave — Allegro di molto e con brio," showed off his individual style through techniques such as tempo improvisation, bringing an original sensation to a tune that could have otherwise been routinely cliche.

COURTESY OF BISS

Internationally acclaimed pianist Jonathan Biss.

For some audience members, this personalization of Beethoven came off as an exaggeration. "I would have enjoyed it better if I didn't see him," criticized an anonymous UMass student.

Nevertheless, this introductory piece was well chosen in that it functioned as a perfect introduction to his physical techniques as well as his capabilities of making the music his own.

The piece that followed, "Wonderer," was composed by Lewis Spratlan through the pianist's personal request. Spratlan, a performer-composer who teaches music at Amherst College, answered with a fantasy-like arrangement with inspirations from Beethoven's fourth concerto. The mysterious piece contained heavy dissonances with sudden abrupt passages that seemed to put some people to sleep, though the jazzy arrangement and experimental nature kept others close. The piece was crafted with intricate modal changes that paralleled the larger key-change framework of the evening's program, though such theoretical techniques were hard to recognize even for those with experience in music.

Beethoven's Sonata No.30 in E Major, Op. 109 came as a pleasant return for those who had dozed off during the contemporary tunes. The contrast between the first movement, a soft free-flowing melody, lately for the arrival of spring, and the second, a series of "Beethovenesk" passages that contain a firm core in the chords, showed off Biss's talent in the multi-dimensional maneuvering with his keys. The audience was astonished by his presentational skills as well; the pianist seemed as if he never had to look down at his hands during the slow, smooth sections, mimicking Beethoven's blind talent.

Similar to most contemporary piano music whose characteristics are focused on individual expression and impressionism, the subsequent piece, "Six Little Pieces" by Arnold Schoenberg, was also a surprise-filled work. The pianist dissonant pauses and long-held notes with silence in this piece were likely to have had raised two kinds of thoughts: intrigue by the unconditional abruptness, or a total unacceptance of the nature of it all. The closing piece, Schumann's "Fantasy" in C Major, was the crowd's favorite. To some it may have been the emotion-provoking feature of Romantic music; to others the appeal may perhaps have been Biss's mesmerizing precision in carrying rapid phrases, especially with the left hand. In any case, it produced still silence, until one woman in the audience could not contain herself and gasped "Wow..."

There was no doubt that the energy level elevated as the majority of the house gave a standing ovation. Disappointingly, he did not answer the request for an encore, but the audience did not seem to push it either. Classical piano performances often contain a vague imperturbability with a difficulty in keeping clients in for a long period of time. Unless the performer changes or a jig is applied to alleviate the unfamiliarity, in the end, most audiences end up with the notion of "I don't know what he did, but whatever it was, it was impressive."

Jonathan Biss certainly satisfied his audience, and perhaps even outplayed them in retreat.

Five College choreography show a success

By Alex Butler
Collegian Staff

The act of transcension can be a long, momentous process for some people. It is a process that requires much time to look inward and fit the pieces in order of a balance. One unifying aspect of the process is guaranteed, however, in all cases of transcending. This aspect is beauty. No matter where you are, or what the case may be, beauty is usually on the forefront of most minds when someone describes the progression.

Anyone who attended the Five College Dance Department Faculty Dance Concert at Amherst College's Kirby Memorial Theatre this past weekend can vouch for this. The annual performance, which showcases choreography by faculty members at each of the five colleges, was an evening of exquisite dancing.

Seven acts were performed Thursday through Saturday night, each one with such harmony and fluidity that you could almost touch it as it reflected off the audience. Right from the get-go, the crowd could tell it was going to be a strange and modern ride through what has become known as dance. No frills, no classical music, no color pink. But the performance still had the tell-tale signs of tradition that just weren't shaken: ballerinas, inspirational music, and a concrete devotion to art.

Students from all five colleges were featured in "Set and Reset/Reset," including UMass dancers Becky Anderson, Jenny Bennett-Mansur, and Katie Pousont. Created by renowned choreographer Trisha Brown in 1983, the work was set on the Valley dancers by Five College alum and former Trisha Brown company member Abigail Yager. In the dreamlike piece, the progression lay in the interaction between dancers. It was almost as though if one girl didn't act her part, the flow of the dance would cease. Limbs and motions worked all together in a flowing, elaborate machine — a machine of greatness.

Next was a complete flip of the coin — Smith College's Robin Prichard's "Movement Study For One, With An Absent Lover." On Thursday and Saturday, the very tall, very muscular, very intense Ariel Blackburn Cohen of Smith College stood alone and took the audience through an immense emotional experience. Although the dance was meant for the forceful and primal Cohen, Prichard managed to match her intensity in Friday's showing, hypnotic and raw.

Following this was a gem, a quirky mirrored act that hooked with a youthful resilience and evolved into a struggle between the real and imaginary, the up and down, the motion and the music. Deep trance music followed UMass freshmen Bethany Loulsos and Rowan Salem around the stage in UMass professor Sam Kenney's "All Kinds of Wrong...or...Closer to the Person You're Not" as they showed the audience a near-perfect mime act of each other.

The first act closed with visiting Mount Holyoke professor Matisse Madden's contemporary ballet "Desert Capriccio." Ballet is one aspect of dance that everyone expects when they head to a concert such as this. Indeed, six dancers in pointe shoes performed a graceful and glorious routine. However, tradition was given a refreshing edge with their bare legs and contemporary, asymmetrical short tutus.

The duet after intermission was clearly one of the most engaging pieces of the night. Choreographed by Amherst College's Wendy Woodson and set to Leonard Cohen's "Dance Me to the End of Love," Tom Vacanti and UMass senior Nicole Dagesse glided with one another through a ride of what love is — the ups and downs, the blues and brightness.

Next, Hampshire College's Cathy Nicoli's "In Our Walls Grow Little Gardens," allegedly inspired by a small weed growing through a sidewalk crack, involved the most dynamic and meaningful moves of the night. Pulls and pushes peppered the routine all the way through. The dance was so elaborate, it seemed like a play all in its own. The plot was very open to interpretation, and it seemed so powerful that the emotions of the dancers were almost audible.

To finish the night, husband-and-wife team Jim Coleman and Terese Freedman took the stage with the most unique setup and idea. While Freedman moved to a bizarre sound collage, Coleman drew with a black marker on a sketchboard, which was projected onto the back wall. As he drew, the audience was thrown into the thought process of the artist, and witnessed the complicated relationship between himself and his medium, the dancer. Stages were met and mixed, some with frustration, some with ecstasy, as the concert reached a close.

From walking into the concert, the audience went through several stages, much like Coleman did in the last act. Pushed and pulled all through the night, the crowd was exposed to raw emotions of the vibrant dancers in every piece. These dancers are making innocence what it is, this is what we should all be doing every second of every day.

said. "He gives us that effort every day and it's no surprise that effort is out there on the field. That's really been a big part of our success."

With Deane controlling the faceoffs, it was only a matter of time until Morris took advantage. Morris' first goal came as the result of a tremendous individual effort, as he spun through three defenders before depositing the ball into the net.

After his highlight reel goal, Morris turned his focus to getting others involved, as he battled through double-teams and set up scoring opportunities for his teammates.

"Everybody expects Sean to get 10 goals and 10 assists every game, and it's unrealistic for any player," Cannella said. "Defenses are going to set up to stop Sean. That's what they know — in order to stop UMass you have to stop Sean Morris. He's done such a great job letting it come to him."

Following the win, Cannella downplayed the significance of his 100th career win.

"This is a player's game and we try to let the players play here, and fortunately we've had some good ones and guys have bought into what we believe in as coaches," Cannella said in his typically understated fashion. "You have to thank all the players and all the coaches over the last 12 years — it's not a one-man thing. All of the credit goes to those guys.

"Maybe you look back on it at some point at the end of the year and say 'Wow, that was great.' But it's more important that the team is playing well."

While Cannella may wait until the end of the season to appreciate reaching such a milestone, Stabert was able to put the win in perspective on Saturday, as he believes that Cannella's former coach and mentor, legendary UMass coach Dick Garber, would be proud of his protégé.

"Coach Garber means the world to Coach Cannella, and on a beautiful day like today you can't help but think he's looking down on Coach Cannella and the program," Stabert said.

All-American Sean Morris scored two goals and added five assists on Saturday for a game-high seven points.

off UMass defenseman Topher Bevis' skate, which redirected past Winer to give BU a 1-0 lead at the 6:15 mark.

UMass forward Cory Quirk nearly tied the game early in the second period when his wrist shot from the high slot pinged loudly off the cross bar. Thirty seconds later, Van Der Gulik took a slap shot from the left circle that found a seam under Winer's left arm at 4:00.

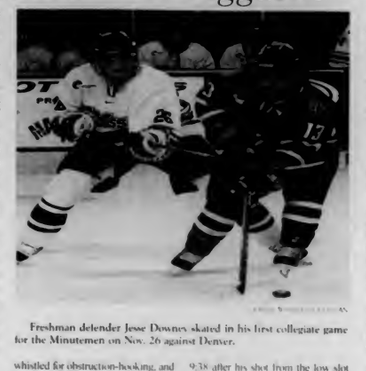
"I think that goal by Van Der Gulik was the turning point," Terrier coach Jack Parker said. "He gives a pretty good rush and throws it by him on the far side, and that put us at case coming out of the second period up 2-0."

With seven seconds left on a UMass five-on-three in the third period, Chris Capraro fired a hard slap shot that beat John Curry and trimmed the margin in half with just over 14 minutes to play.

Eight minutes later, however, BU defenseman Dan Spang took a high shot that Winer saved, but he proceeded to drop the puck directly on the stick of John Laliberte, who poked it through Winer's legs to put BU ahead 3-1. It turned out to be the final goal Winer allowed on the senior's frustrating night between the pipes, as Van Der Gulik's empty-netter closed the score sheets with 45 seconds left.

"I'm sure that their goalie would have liked to have one of them back or maybe two of them back, certainly the one he dropped," Parker said.

"Gabe Winer has been a fabulous player for this program for four years, has won more big games than any other goaltender ever has at UMass and has been brilliant in tournaments," Cahoon said. "The performance he put on two years ago [against Maine in the Hockey East championship game] at the Garden measured up to some of the best performances ever seen here at the college level. This is not throwing Gabe Winer under the bus, but I'm sure Gabe Winer would like to have this game back."



BU jumped out to another quick lead again on Saturday after capitalizing on a perfectly executed three-on-two. Kenny Roche carried the puck into the zone along the left boards and hit Pete MacArthur with a crisp pass in the low slot in front of UMass goalie Jon Quick. MacArthur shuffled an extra pass to his right where Bryan Ewing banged home an easy goal just 1:16 into Game 2.

"Giving up even that one goal was a little bit more than we were ready to overcome early in the game," Cahoon said. "We fought back hard, but we couldn't really recover from that."

That score held up until 5:32 into the third period. Mike Kostka was whistled for obstruction-hooking, and it only took the Terriers 18 seconds to capitalize. Van Der Gulik worked a pass down below the right circle where Laliberte took a tough-angle shot that beat Quick high on the near side.

Roche extended the lead to 3-0 at 9:38 after his shot from the low slot beat Quick's right leg.

Captain-banked home the rebound of a Matt Anderson shot on the power play with 1:24 to play to bring the score closer at 3-1, but MacArthur's empty-net goal 57 seconds later sealed the deal.

Rappe and Upperco represent divers

By Jory Wirth
Collegian Staff

Reuben Rappe and Karen Upperco represented the University of Massachusetts at the NCAA Zone A Diving Regionals this past weekend, held at the U.S. Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md.

Rappe, a sophomore, placed seventh in the one-meter event with an overall score of 539.00 and 14th in the three-meter with a combined score of 548.80. This was a huge improvement from last year's performance, when he finished 15th in the three-meter and 27th in the one-meter.

"He's getting better, but I think his goal is to make it to the NCAAs," UMass diving coach Marsh Hixon said. "We've got a lot of work to do. It's nice for him to end like he did."

In her freshman year for the Maroon and White, Upperco won 15 total diving events between the low boards and high boards and qualified for the NCAA Regionals. She finished 22nd in the one-meter and 29th in the three-meter.

"My whole thought about Karen was that it was her longest season she's been through," Hixon said. "She might've been a little bit intimidated and a little bit tired. As a freshman I think that's hard because you don't exactly know what to expect."

The northeast sectionals send four divers to the NCAA Championships in Athens, Ga., from March 16-18. The winners from the one-meter, three-meter and 10-meter events advance, and this year the second-place finisher in the three-meter diving event advances. Bigger sectionals, like the Big 10 zone, send more divers to the championships.

In her fourth year coaching at UMass, Hixon has credited both Rappe and Upperco for the Maroon and White's success this past season on the boards.

Zwick's dramatics may have given UMass the win, it also saw great games from Typadis and Connerty. Typadis tallied three goals on six shots, and also gathered one groundball. Connerty also had three points of her own, acting as the team's number one playmaker in the contest with three assists on the afternoon; but none bigger than her helper on the final goal.

Also having a big day was Villapiano, tallying three points and causing four turnovers.

The sophomore had two goals on the day, and also gathered four ground goals balls. Junior Erica Shapiro led UMass in groundballs gathered with five on the afternoon.

The Minutewomen outshot the Great Danes 29-23, and finished the game with a 15-9 advantage in draw controls.

Sophomore goaltender Krissy Anderson posted her first career win when she replaced junior Lauren McCarthy late in the first half. Anderson played a solid game in 33:17 of work in the crease, allowing only three goals on nine shots to get the win.

UM drops rubber match against USF

a score of 9-6, UMass's bats came alive in the top of the seventh inning, and with the help of some clutch hitting by freshmen Adam Tempesta, Joe Cotone and Jim MacDonald, the Minutemen scored five unanswered runs to turn a 4-2 deficit into a 7-4 lead.

South Florida came right back in the bottom half of the seventh with two runs to make it a 7-6 ballgame, but that would be as close as it would come. UMass closed out the game with two runs in the top of the eighth, and got a strong performance out of the bullpen from junior first baseman Bryan Adamski, who made his first pitching appearance as a Minuteman to record the save.

The win was picked up by sophomore Aaron Smith, who allowed just one earned run on three hits in three innings pitched.

UMass looked like it was going to use its momentum in the rubber match yesterday afternoon against South Florida, but after a four-run second inning, the Minutemen offense was shut down and was overpowered by a score of 11-4.

The Bulls' starting pitcher Davis Bilardello gave up four runs in the top of the second inning to make it a 4-1 Minuteman lead. Bilardello was a different pitcher from there on out, as he did not allow a hit after the second inning, retiring 13 straight batters until he exited the game after the sixth inning.

The Minutemen lost the lead after the Bulls scored five runs in the bottom of the third to take a 6-4 lead. South Florida held the lead for the remainder of the game, and eventually added five more runs to give UMass its second loss of the season.

This year's Atlantic 10 Tournament is as good a testament as any to the extreme advantage of a home court crowd.

Xavier won an NCAA Tournament bid by winning the A-10 Championship game on Saturday against Saint Joseph's. It won a 62-61 thriller at the U.S. Bank Arena in the fourth day of a grueling schedule that began last Wednesday.

The games began in the middle of the week and the winners played until they lost. For Xavier, it was four straight days of post-season competition. At the end of the fourth day, legs feel like lead, patience wears thin and minds are wasted.

It takes much strength and stamina (with a little bit of luck) to win a conference tournament. And luck contributed heavily to Xavier's win in Cincinnati this weekend.

It was a far reach from a March Madness, prime-time college basketball environment, but nobody thought that the A-10 Tournament would be. The conference is weak compared to past years. Other than George Washington, no team was distinguished.

So it was a quiet arena for the majority of the games except when Xavier played.

When the Musketeers took the court, they were greeted by a vociferous fan base that was hell-bent on its team winning the whole thing. Middle-aged men and women put aside their civility for a couple of nights and came to U.S. Bank Arena to cheer on their Musketeers. They berated the officials, berated opposing players and provided a potent sixth man for the Musketeers.

Why was this so? Xavier University is less than 20 miles away from U.S. Bank Arena. It was, at most, a 45-minute drive to the arena for the fans to see their team play in the postseason.

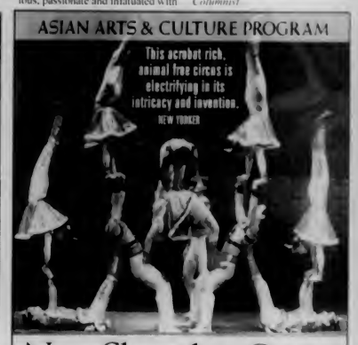
Other fans weren't so fortunate. Cincinnati is over 630 miles from UMass and about the same to St. Louis, so forget the stands being peppered with Maroon and White.

Xavier received a hero's welcome. Its fans were raucous, obnoxious, passionate and infatuated with the Musketeers. They wouldn't be the best people for dinner conversation, but they gave Xavier a lot of support and they rode the refs into the ground.

In their eyes, their team could do no wrong. Shots were missed because the rims were off. Fouls called on Xavier were injustices because the refs were terrible. The Musketeers turned the ball over because their players were getting hacked. They would use any excuse in the book to save their team from ridicule and blame.

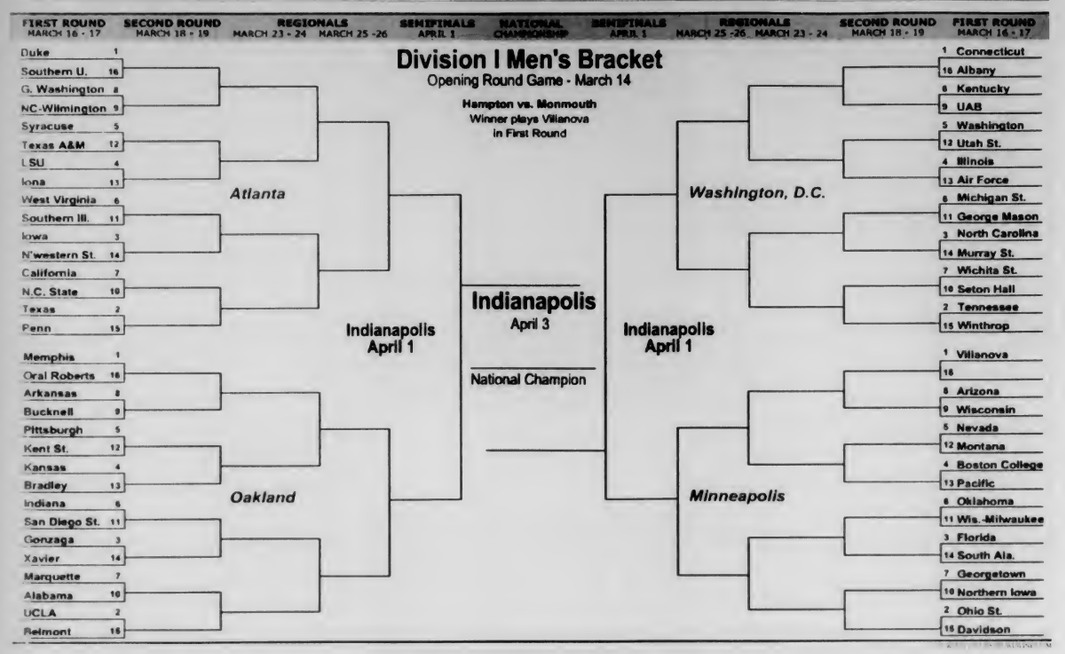
In other words, they were what fans soaked in bias are supposed to be. It made for a great atmosphere when the Musketeers took the court.

But the A-10 Tournament is supposed to be held at a neutral site?



Obviously, not everyone can get a fair shake. Some teams will have a farther distance to travel than others — but 20 miles? That's like the DCU Center in Worcester hosting the ACC Tournament. It would have a 30-minute drive on the Mass Pike West, while Duke, North Carolina and NC State would have to travel a good ways up the eastern seaboard.

Xavier is a good basketball team with a good coach and a program determined to win. They lost Brian Thornton — their leading scorer and rebounder — to injury at the end of the season, and with him on board they might have actually been picked to the win the tournament. Xavier winning the whole thing wasn't a fluke, but it was helped tremendously by its fans.



Next year, the A-10 Tournament will be held in Atlantic City, New Jersey. Aside from its own excitement (Atlantic City is a major step up from Cincinnati entertainment-wise) it will be a more neutral site for the conference. Three teams will have more fans than the others (Temple, La Salle, and St. Joe's are all in Philadelphia), but there won't the obvious discrepancy of fans that Xavier enjoyed this year.

And I'm grateful because I've had about all I can take of the Xavier faithful.

Donald wins second tour event, first since 2002 season

By Tim Reynolds
Associated Press

PALM BEACH GARDENS, Fla. — Luke Donald was the last player on the driving range Sunday afternoon, grinning after a series of perfect shots.

He flashed a bigger smile walking up the 18th fairway five hours later, knowing he was about to win the Honda Classic.

Donald used back-to-back birdies midway through his back nine to take the outright lead at 11 under, made a great scrambling par on the difficult 16th to preserve the margin and held off Geoff Ogilvy by two shots for his second career PGA Tour victory.

A 3-under final round of 69 was good enough for the Englishman, who hadn't won on tour since the 2002 Southern Farm Bureau Classic and pocketed a winner's check of $990,000. He made a 10-foot birdie putt at the 13th and a 25-footer on the 14th for the lead, then holed a slippery 18-footer to save par on the 16th.

All that, followed by an approach to about 4 feet for a final birdie on 18, was good enough to hold off a field that remained tightly bunched all day.

"I knew if I just played Luke Donald golf, it'd be good enough," Donald said. "It's nice to finish with a great shot like that."

Ogilvy shot a 69 to cap his wild week, one that featured one double eagle, three eagles and three double bogeys. It was nearly enough for him to win his second straight start, after taking only one victory in his first 133 PGA Tour events, he won two weeks ago at the Match Play Championship.

"I made some good putts and for the most part I played really well," Ogilvy said. "I got lucky a couple times. But how do you forget the week you had your first double eagle? It was good."

David Toms shot a 69 to finish at 9 under, three shots off the pace and tied with Billy Mayfair (72), who entered the day tied with Donald for the 54-hole lead.

Tom Pernice (68) wound up alone in fifth at 8 under, former Honda champion Dudley Hart (69) was 7 under, and three players — Stephen Ames (68), Frank Lickliter (71) and Jeff Gove (74) — shared seventh place at 6 under.

Donald — who had been 0-for-2 when holding 54-hole leads in tour events — birdied two of his first four holes to get to 11 under, but bogeys at Nos. 7 and 10 knocked him from the outright lead.

Short putts were dooming him, he missed a 4-footer for birdie at the par-5 sixth and three-putted there, then slid a 2 1/2-foot par try past the right side of the hole at the 10th — a miscue that allowed Gove to briefly take sole possession of the lead.

Gove made a bogey and a double bogey in a three-hole span between 13 and 15. Ogilvy birdied 13, 14 and 16 — but a bogey on 15 kept him from staying with Donald's pace. And Toms made an eagle on 17 to get to 9 under, but knew that wasn't going to be good enough.

"Not disappointing at all," said Toms, who's has never won a tour stop in Florida. "I played a good, solid round of golf today under tough conditions and I came back from a disappointing day yesterday. I feel good about leaving here."

Mayfair saw his chance of getting his first victory in 228 starts roll away following two misadventures at a couple par-5s.

At the sixth, his third-shot chip ran across the green, eventually resting against an extremely thick tuft of grass off the back. He tried popping it free with a fairway wood — but that shot rolled a few feet up an incline, then back toward his feet and ultimately led to a bogey.

And at 12, another chip rolled up the green a bit before U-turning back his way, and Mayfair then sent his fourth shot off the opposite side. He made another bogey, dropping his third shot in seven holes.

Padraig Harrington, who earned his first PGA Tour victory at the Honda last year, shot a 74 for the second straight day and wound up tied for 16th at 2 under, 10 shots back. He was aiming to join only Jack Nicklaus as back-to-back Honda winners.

UMass tops Crimson

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

They say it's not how you start but how you finish. That was certainly the case for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team on Saturday against Harvard (1-1). The No. 7 Minutemen (3-0) started slow, but rallied to a 12-7 win over the Crimson, earning UMass coach Greg Cannella his 100th career win in the process.

Harvard jumped out to an early lead, scoring three goals in the first six minutes of the game, but the Minutemen responded by outscoring the Crimson 12-4 the rest of the way.

Harvard	7

"We knew Harvard was explosive," Cannella said. "They came out with a lot of intensity and their shots went [in]. We were able to stay composed and chip away and get back in it."

It was the second game in a row that the Minutemen trailed early, as they overcame a two-goal third-quarter deficit last week at Yale before pulling out a 14-11 win. The Minutemen will look to get off to a quicker start in their next game, a matchup with Albany tomorrow at 3 p.m. at Garber Field.

On Saturday, UMass was led by a balanced scoring attack, with seven players registering goals. All-American Sean Morris continued his torrid scoring streak, notching seven points on two goals and five assists. The senior attacker leads the nation in scoring, averaging 6.7 points per game.

Senior Clay Stabert recorded his first career hat trick and added an assist, while junior Pat Larmon scored two goals and tallied an assist, and sophomore Rory Pedrick posted two goals.

Entering the fourth quarter clinging to a 7-5 lead, UMass put the game away with a flurry of goals in the first six minutes of the period. Stabert got the offense going with his first goal of the game less than a minute into the quarter. Larmon followed with his second goal 40 seconds later, but Harvard answered with two goals in the next 29 seconds to make the score 9-7 UMass with 12:58 remaining.

It was all UMass from that point, as Pedrick scored his second goal of the game with 12:40 to play, and Stabert completed the hat trick with two goals in a one-minute span to give the Minutemen a 12-7 cushion with just over nine minutes left in the game.

UMass then tightened up its defense, led by freshman goalie Doc Schneider, who recorded 17 saves after a shaky start.

"We have leaders all over the field, and everyone was just telling me to keep my head up," Schneider said. "You can't dwell on what happened, you just have to play."

One of those leaders, senior captain Jake Deane, dominated on faceoffs throughout the game, setting career-bests in faceoffs won (17-of-21) and groundballs (12).

"He was excellent," Cannella

UMass coach Greg Cannella said that senior midfielder Jamie Yaman would "guide some of the younger guys" in the midfield.

UM baseball suffers blowout in Florida

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team suffered an 11-4 loss to South Florida (7-10) in the rubber game of a three-game series yesterday in Tampa.

The Minutemen (1-2) opened up their 2006 regular season on Friday evening in the Sunshine State, getting blown out 17-2 by the Bulls. UMass recovered quickly the next day, however, as its bats came alive to defeat South Florida by a score of 9-6.

UMass will be back in action when it travels to Boston to take on the Northeastern Huskies at 3 p.m. on Wednesday in Boston.

The Minutemen opened their 2006 campaign with a loss, as the Bulls scored 17 runs on 17 hits to gather their sixth win of the season. UMass's offense was flat, and the bullpen could not keep the game close, allowing 14 runs on 14 hits and five walks. South Florida scored 10 runs in the seventh inning to take a commanding 15-0 lead, and held on to give UMass its first loss of the season in its opening game of 2006.

Junior Chris Lloyd got the loss after throwing 4 1-3 innings and allowing three runs on three hits, while walking six batters and striking out three.

The Minutemen offense was held scoreless up until the eighth inning, when junior outfielder Bill Rankin tripled to right-center field, scoring freshman Joe Cotone for their first run of the game. Rankin was then driven in on a ground-out to second by sophomore Ryan Franczek to make it a 15-2 game.

It was too little too late for UMass, as the bullpen let up two more runs in the bottom half of the eighth inning, sealing the deal on a disappointing opening day for the Maroon and White.

Terriers end seniors' season

BOSTON — For the second year in a row, the Massachusetts hockey team (13-21-2, 10-15-2 Hockey East) ended its season after being swept by the top seed in the quarterfinals of the Hockey East tournament.

The Minutemen fell victim to No. 3 Boston University by identical 4-1 scores on Friday and Saturday night at Agganis Arena. The Terriers will move on to face New Hampshire in the HEA semifinals on Friday night at 7 p.m. at the TD Banknorth Garden, and the winner will play for the conference championship against either Maine or Boston College on Saturday at 7 p.m.

UMass coach Don Cahoon spoke of his senior class — Marvin Degon, Stephen Werner, Jamie Solon and Gabe Winer — who played in their final game, what they meant to their teammates and how they'll affect the future of the program.

"There are a lot of swelled up eyes in [the locker room] and a lot of tears," Cahoon said. "One of the great things is we're really young, and they had a chance to be exposed to that type of [senior] competitor all year long. I know that will work as a great deal of value for those young players, and hopefully that will help us in the future."

BU senior forward David Van Der Gulik, playing with a torn PCL, proved to be the Achilles heel for the Minutemen, as he picked up a hat trick on Friday night and then assisted on the game-winning goal in Game 2 on Saturday. BU is now 17-2-2 since Van Der Gulik returned from an abdominal injury on Dec. 30.

The Minutemen hung with the Terriers deep into the third period on each night, but the difference lay within Boston University's ability to convert on its scoring chances while UMass couldn't muster up enough necessary offense to take control.

"I think that has been our trouble against BU," Cahoon said. "We've played here three times now, and we've lost three games by two or three goals, where for most of the game we played pretty well but didn't generate a lot of scoring opportunities. I think that is a credit to BU, and it's one of the reasons they won the league."

Van Der Gulik was working with the puck behind the net in the first period of Game 1, wrapped around to Gabe Winer's left side and sent a pass into the low slot that deflected

Capraro carries torch for Cahoon's offense

BOSTON — Looking at the box scores from the Massachusetts hockey team's best-of-three playoff series with Boston University this weekend, it's evident that scoring was a major problem.

While getting swept by the Terriers, the Minutemen only managed to muster two goals during their abbreviated trip to Boston. Each of those scores was notched by junior Chris Capraro. Both nights it seemed as though BU goalie John Curry was in the right place at the right time.

"We weren't able to crack their safe and put pucks away when given good opportunities," UMass coach Don Cahoon said.

Not usually a front-line scoring threat, it was Capraro who took it upon himself to try and keep the Minutemen in the series for as long as possible. At first glance one could assume that his goals were futile, as his team was defeated both nights by a score of 4-1 — but that was not the case.

Each of Capraro's goals came at key moments when it looked as if the Minutemen could use the momentum to try and change the tide of the game.

On Friday night, his goal brought the score to 2-1 in the third period, but UMass couldn't get the tying goal before BU notched two more scores.

During a game in which the visiting team got virtually no scoring chances, Capraro's goal on Saturday brought the score to 3-1 and gave the Mass Attack a sliver of hope to stay alive in the series.

Friday night's game was closer than the score may tell, as the Minutemen skated right with the Terriers throughout the night. In the third Capraro finally put UMass up on the board in hopes of a comeback.

With both Tom Morrow and David Van der Gulik in the box for interference, Capraro cut the lead in half with a power play goal at the 5:52 mark. The goal came on a one-timer from sophomore P.J. Fenton just before the Morrow penalty was set to expire.

His goal Saturday night also came on a power play, this time with goaltender Jon Quick pulled in favor of an extra attacker. Junior captain Matt Anderson fired a shot on Curry, but he couldn't control the rebound and Capraro finished the play with his second of the weekend.

"I think Chris has had a great resurgence with us coming back into the program and scoring fairly consistently throughout the year," Cahoon said of Capraro, who missed all of the 2004-05 season.

"He has great presence on the power play and we're real pleased with Chris and his progress. He's certainly going to be a player to look to next year to help us do a little bit better."

With UMass graduating its top two scorers in Marvin Degon and Stephen Werner, the scoring duties will be handed down to Anderson as well as Capraro.

Since returning to the Minutemen, Capraro has been a factor on the ice. For much of this season he has skated on the top line with Werner and promising freshman Chris Davis. In his 34 games this season, Capraro has tallied 19 points on eight goals and 11 assists. For now, all he and the rest of the Minutemen can do is sit and wait for next season to roll around.

Over a stretch of four games, the Massachusetts softball team (7-8) was able to tally a record of 6-2, with freshman pitcher Brandice Balschmiter proving her worth as one of the newest Minutewomen in 2006.

Although UMass was wiped out 20-0 by No. 2/3 Tennessee (21-0) yesterday at the conclusion of the USI-Adidas Spring Break Invitational, the Minutewomen were able to make it all the way to the championship game, and numerous members of the Maroon and White shined in the process.

UMass steps up to the plate again on Friday, when it will take part in the Florida Atlantic University Parent's Weekend Tournament in Boca Raton, Fla. The Minutewomen's first opponent will be Connecticut and the game will begin at 4 p.m. on Friday.

This past weekend was a combination of down-to-the-wire finishes and complete blowouts as Balschmiter once again turned heads while lessening her Earned Run Average.

With a perserial record of 6-3 with one save, and a season ERA of 0.98, Balschmiter has been able to handle the pressure of being a freshman pitcher and has posted 61 strikeouts in the process. At the USI-Adidas Spring Break Invitational, Balschmiter was able to continue her early success.

Balschmiter, junior Amanda Acampora and freshman Whitney Mollica were all named to this weekend's All-Tournament team.

Perhaps the most monumental win for the Minutewomen this weekend was a 2-1 edge of Georgia Tech (22-6) yesterday morning, in which UMass was able to knock off the Yellow Jackets in the semifinals of the tournament.

Throughout that match up, Balschmiter allowed just two hits and one run while posting a no-hitter through the first five innings.

It didn't take long for fellow sophomore Stacy Cullington to match Proctor's RBI, however, when Cullington nailed a homer over the left field fence in the top of the second inning, giving the Minutewomen a young 2-0 lead in the contest.

UMass quieted down over the next three innings, not scoring another run, but Balschmiter kept the lead on the side of the Minutewomen. It wasn't until the bottom of the seventh inning that the Yellow Jackets began to threat and scored their first run of the game with two outs. Balschmiter displayed some poise, however, as she was able to get out of a jam and close out the morning for UMass.

While the contest against Georgia-Tech got hearts racing for the Minutewomen, the team's contest against Tennessee-Chattanooga (15-17) the day before was even more of a nail biting experience.

In that quarterfinals game, Proctor came up big again, this time with the game tied in the bottom of the 10th inning. With senior KJ Kelley on third base, Proctor knocked a single to the right side of the field, and drove in Kelley for the win. Proctor is currently fourth on the team among starters in batting average with a mark of .273 and has registered five RBIs this season.

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team gathered its second win of the season as it defeated Albany (3-1) by a score of 11-10 on Saturday afternoon in New York. The win ended Albany's perfect 3-0 record, handing the Great Danes their first loss of the season.

The Minutewomen (2-3) tied the game at 10 goals apiece when sophomore Jeannette Villapiano took the ball end to end and scored an unassisted goal with 3:28 remaining in regulation.

Just over a minute later, sophomore Melynda Zwick put away the game-winning goal when she was set up by senior Kerri Connerty, giving the Maroon and White its first victory away from Garber Field in 2006.

UMass will be back in action when it travels to New York to take on Syracuse at 7 p.m. on Wednesday.

The majority of the goals in this game were scored in the first half, which turned out to be a 30-minute shootout for both teams.

The Minutewomen got on the board first with two goals less than four minutes into the game. Sophomore Kathleen Typadis got things underway with a goal from a free-position shot just three minutes into play, followed by an unassisted goal from freshman Kaytlin McCormick less than a minute later.

UMass was able to jump out to a 6-3 lead halfway through the first half with the help of three consecutive goals from Typadis, Zwick and freshman Holly Drown. Albany came back with five unanswered goals, three of which came from Kate Fontana, to end the first half with an 8-6 lead over UMass.

The Minutewomen regrouped and came out strong in the second half, scoring back-to-back goals less than a minute apart from Typadis and Meghan Reddy. The goals were just over four minutes into the second period of play and tied the game at 8-8.

Reddy's goal marked her fifth consecutive game with a goal.

The Great Danes took a 10-9 lead when Katelyn Primomo scored with 13:31 remaining in regulation. After a 10-minute scoring drought, the Minutewomen began their late-game heroics with less than four minutes left to play, giving UMass its first win of the current four-game road trip.

The Minutewomen had six different goal scorers in the win, including four players that had multiple goals. While

SGA encounters election controversy

Senate hopefuls debate issues, set election goals

Several goals resurfaced repeatedly at last night's debate between candidates for president and student trustee of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association: a more affordable UMass, a more accessible and transparent SGA, and protection of students' rights and privacy.

The debate was broadcast live on the campus TV and radio stations, UVC-TV 19 and WMUA-FM. Voting takes place today and tomorrow in all dining commons and at the Campus Center Concourse, from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. and 5 p.m. to 8 p.m.

Presidential candidate Shawn Robinson and student trustee candidate John Williams plan to introduce three new initiatives on campus: Coretta Scott King community service grants, which would grant ten $1,000 grants to registered student organizations each year for community service projects; vending give-back scholarships, which would direct a portion of University vending contracts directly to scholarship aid; and increased funding to RSOs and club sports for food and travel.

They also called for increased PVTA service on weekends, more wireless access on campus, and better washers and dryers.

The pair said the SGA needs to protect students' privacy and increase SGA transparency. Robinson described their platform as a vision "where a student can come into the SGA office and find someone at the desk, willing to help them."

Presidential hopeful Elvis Mendez also spoke of improving the SGA's connection with students and stressed the need increased funding for RSOs. "I feel that RSOs are generally neglected and given the scraps of the general budget," he said.

He emphasized that students need to be treated as adults. "The motto on campus is often 'students first,' but so far, that's only a slogan. We want to make that a reality," he said.

Mendez and student trustee hopeful Mishy Leiblum put forth a platform that focused on accessibility, affordability, accountability, protecting student rights, "bringing it back to basics" — teachers, students and books — and "chutzpah," which Leiblum defined as "having the balls to stick up for things."

Leiblum said that her primary responsibility as student trustee would be to act as a strong lobbyist. She also emphasized the importance of reaching out to state legislature members and community leaders, and bringing faculty and staff to meet-

SGA candidates faced suspension

Controversy and confusion filled the presidential and student trustee campaigns of the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts early this morning.

Two University of Massachusetts Student Government Association candidates were originally suspended from campaigning for 24 hours by the election commission late last night for allegedly violating SGA election by-laws. The violation was due to a banner hung above the Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity, which read, "Vote Makarski Fox SGA."

The election commission also confirmed that the tandem of presidential candidate Rob Shepard and student trustee candidate Ed Cutting are currently under investigation for a banner they allegedly hung above the Campus Center parking garage that advertised their campaign website.

But all investigations and suspensions were deemed null and void after Chancellor of Elections Priyanka Pant sent an e-mail to news organizations at 2:30 a.m., stating that the all charges had been halted until further notice.

"The Chief Justice has issued an injunction on the invalidation of Ed Cutting and Rob Shepherd," wrote Plant. "They have also issued an injunction and the suspension of Mike Makarski and Matt Fox. This means that the mentioned candidates are all allowed to campaign during the days of the election."

Election Commissioner Priyanka Pant and the election commission had informed presidential candidate, Michael Makarski and student trustee candidate, Matthew Fox of their apparent suspension shortly after the SGA debates.

Commissioners confirmed they had obtained a photo of the rule-breaking banner, taken by a bystander at 11 p.m. on Sunday.

"There's no time or date on that photo," said Fox. "That easily could have been Photoshopped into the photo."

"We didn't even know it was up," said Makarski.

Commissioners argued that the period of time the banner hung in front of the fraternity gave the candidates an unfair advantage.

According to SGA by-laws, candidates are not allowed to create banners using their own money. Candidates are only allowed to use fliers produced by the Campus Design & Copy

Student government prepares for election

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association will be holding elections for president, student trustee and area governors today and tomorrow.

Commuter students can vote in the Campus Center Concourse and residents can vote in the Worcester, Hampshire and Franklin dining commons. The polling tables will be open from 10:00 a.m. until 2:00 p.m. and from 5:00 p.m. until 8:00 p.m.

The election will be a culmination of several weeks' worth of preparations by the SGA and the candidates. Nominees for president and student trustee had to collect at least 250 student signatures to get their names on the ballots. Those running for area governors collected at least 100 signatures each.

Nominees then began their campaigns on March 9, passing out fliers and putting up posters in residence halls and in the Student Union.

Anyone with questions about the elections can contact Elections Commissioner Priyanka Pant at ppant@student.umass.edu.

UMass attempts to desegregate dorms

AMHERST (AP) — Officials at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst are phasing out self-segregated dormitories, the latest effort to rid the campus of separate programs for minorities.

"There's nothing healthy about segregation," said Michael Gargano, vice chancellor of student affairs and campus life.

Currently, minority students can choose to live in residence halls designated for particular races and ethnicities. There are residential clusters dedicated to students of Asian, African-American, and Native American backgrounds, and one dedicated to students seeking a multicultural. They were initiated as a means of providing comfort and comradeship on an overwhelmingly white campus.

But beginning this fall, there will be no floors set aside for minority students when an 860-bed cluster of residence halls open. The university also plans to discourage students from choosing to live with students of like race or ethnicity, The Boston Sunday Globe reported.

"Students who come to the university need to be exposed to different opinions and ideas. When you have segregated pockets in our residence halls, we are allowing students to shut themselves off, and then they are missing out," Gargano said.

The school does plan to offer living quarters that bring together people with the same interests. For example, students pursuing African-American studies could choose to live together.

The university also will require freshmen to live with other freshmen.

Nationwide, universities and colleges are struggling with whether minority students should be allowed or encouraged to live together. Some schools continue to embrace self-segregated living quarters as an answer, such as the University of California, Berkeley.

At UMass, the move to desegregate housing follows the dismantling of some other race-based programs. In the past five years, the school has stopped holding separate orientations for minorities and assigning them to separate academic advising offices.

But some students say they like the separate residence halls.

"We are like family!" said Nishu Mungroo, 19, a sophomore, who lives on a floor designated for African-American students. "You come here and find comfort in your community."

But others say they don't want to close themselves off.

Anton Pires, a freshman, said he lived in Southwest, a dorm for black students, for a semester, then transferred.

"It can be good to be with people who have had the same struggles as you, people you can be more open with," said Pires, a native of Cape Verde. "But I didn't want to close myself off to people. I wanted to get a different feel."

Grad student sues for diversity information

A graduate student who served on the University of Massachusetts' Diversity Commission is suing at least one member of the Commission for refusing to publicly release information, which includes student racial demographics from the commission's report.

In a press release submitted to media outlets yesterday, graduate student Uri Strauss says he filed a lawsuit in Hampshire Superior Court against UMass Amherst's Associate Chancellor Esther Terry, who serves as the director of the Office of Equal Opportunity and Diversity and Alan Cote, who is the Supervisor of Records for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Strauss claims he tried to obtain copies of transcripts of the report filed by the UMass Diversity Commission, which is a commission that was established by the administration in the wake of racial incidents and the infamous "KKK Nine" scandal in the Student Government Association in the fall of 2004.

In the KKK Nine incident, members of the SGA and Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy group (SCERA) were photographed drinking alcohol in the SCERA office. The students — who were all Caucasian — were viewed drinking in front of a markerboard with a hand-drawn Ku Klux Klan character, which said in a voice bubble, "I love ALANA." ALANA stands for "African Latino Asian Native American" students, which have an office that focuses on diversity issues on campus.

The Diversity Commission was made to examine diversity issue on campus by members of the administration. It was supposed to have released statistics on racial demographics and plans to implement regarding racial issues.

Several members of the Student Government Association have tried to obtain the Diversity Commission's report for some time.

In his lawsuit, Strauss claims Terry requested a payment of $500 for viewing the documents. Strauss claims this fee set "arbitrarily high" in order to deter him from seeking the information.

On Jan. 24, Strauss' request for the 4,500 pages of documents were denied by Cote, the lawsuit said.

The Diversity Commission met between November 2004 and February 2005 before making its report.

UMass spokesperson Ed Blaguszewski was unaware of the lawsuit yesterday. The University had no comment as of press time.

Romney requests Catholic adoption bill

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. Mitt Romney has asked his staff to draft a "very narrow" bill that would exempt Catholic Charities from the state's nondiscrimination laws so it can continue to provide adoption services without serving gay couples, the governor said Monday.

In so doing, Romney argued that maintaining the services of Catholic Charities, whose parent Roman Catholic Church opposes gay adoption, was more important than maintaining a faith-blind law, which has allowed 13 same-sex couples to adopt children during the past 20 years.

He refused to elaborate when asked where he would draw the line if other faiths or their charitable organizations similarly come into conflict with state law in the future.

"They have within their religion the belief that marriage should be between a man and a woman, and that children should not be sent into homes without a mother and a father, and that's their religious freedom to have that belief and we'd like them to be able to be true to their religion and at the same time provide a service to the commonwealth of placing special needs kids," Romney told reporters after a breakfast speech to the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce.

He said that while his exemption would allow Catholic Charities to stop serving gay couples, it would not inhibit them from adopting, because "there are many, many other agencies that can meet the needs of those gay couples."

He expected to file a "very narrow" bill perhaps this week.

In December, Romney refused to exempt Catholic hospitals from a new state law requiring them to provide emergency contraception, even though the church prohibits premarital sex and abortion. Romney had previously vetoed the law, only to be overridden by the Legislature.

"We would have preferred a different outcome, but we fought that fight

Candidates discuss UMass accountability, affordability

ings, in addition to working with the other four UMass campuses.

"We want to stress our 'No bullshit, get things done, whatever means necessary, work with whoever will work with us' attitude," Leiblum said.

Michael Makarski, who is running for SGA president, emphasized the difference between government and politics, lamenting that the SGA has recently fallen into the latter.

"Our student government has fallen into a very political realm," Makarski said. "We would like to bring back government to the University of Massachusetts."

He also criticized the current administration's lack of transparency, calling for "no more back door deals in the Ways and Means Committee."

"Students can't come to SGA meetings and speak up," he said. "The Student Union has actually been run more like Pee Wee's Playhouse than like an advocacy center for students on campus."

If elected, Makarski and running mate Matthew Fox want to allow all students to come and speak at SGA meetings. "It shouldn't just be the senators making the decisions. Students need to be there," Fox said.

If elected, the pair also plans to "reenergize UMass" both academically and socially by improving the writing center, creating a student mentoring program, and bringing better programming and guest speakers to UMass to increase school spirit.

Presidential candidate Rob Shepherd and student trustee candidate Ed Cutting said they are worried about the cost of UMass and student rights.

"I have seen the price of higher education go up and up and up to the point where it's beyond obscene in this University," said Cutting. "If UMass is not affordable, UMass is irrelevant."

Shepherd said the current SGA is ineffective. "The SGA just screams at Gargano and doesn't do anything," he said.

The pair said the SGA should be trying to lower textbook prices, create more flexibility in meal plans, make UMass more affordable, and take a stand against the new alcohol policy, which Cutting called unconstitutional.

"We have a bigger issue with drugs and guns on this campus," said Cutting.

Shepherd also criticized the current SGA for ignoring campus issues and focusing on state and national politics.

"They try to bring national and state politics into it," he said. "It's a student government, and they should understand that. It should be, 'What will help students?'"

Leiblum disagreed. "I don't think it's necessary to create a dichotomy between the small issues and the big issues on campus," she said. "What happens over the next few years is really going to determine if UMass is going to be an accessible, affordable, quality institution."

She said that because addressing big issues on campus requires increased public funding for the University, "you can't simply look to the little issues without looking to the big issues."

Eoin Moore lightened the mood with his bid for the presidency. Dressed in a faux fur hat and a loud orange shirt, he called for increased bag checks, more red tape in the administration, less money to RSOs, free guns for every student on campus, and "an increase in general student apathy—like me," to laughter from those present.

WMUA-FM 91.1 will air a live interview with the winning candidates on Sunday, April 2 at 5:30 p.m.

State representatives debate adoption laws and lost. It's the governor's job to 'faithfully execute' the laws, even the ones he disagrees with," Eric Fehrnstrom, the governor's communications director, said in an e-mail Monday.

As for gay adoption, Fehrnstrom said: "When it comes to the separation of church and state, we're very good about keeping the church out of the state, but in this case we're not so good about keeping the state out of the church."

Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, who is hoping to succeed Romney as governor, said recently she disagreed with the governor's position.

"I believe that any institution that wants to provide services that are regulated by the state has to abide by the laws of this state, and our anti-discrimination laws are some of the most important," Healey said earlier this month.

House Speaker Salvatore DiMasi has also said he would not support a bill such as Romney is suggesting.

U.S. Rep. Barney Frank, D-Mass., who is openly gay, said Romney's position is driven by his presidential aspirations. The governor has acknowledged he is considering a White House bid in 2008 and has sought to highlight his connections to social conservatives.

"This is not a competition where the question is, 'Okay, we have this child to be adopted, should we auction the child off to Boy George or does he go to live with the Cleavers and Wally and the Beaver?'" said Frank, who is Jewish. "The fact is, the question is whether the child will be adopted at all."

Wal-Mart pharmacies offer emergency contraceptives

By Kevin Zelaya
Daily Nebraskan (U. Nebraska)

LINCOLN, Neb. — Wal-Mart Stores Inc.'s decision last week carrying Plan B — often referred to as the morning-after pill — has brought the issue of women's access to emergency contraceptives to 4,000 pharmacies in Wal-Marts and Sam's Clubs across the country.

The decision comes after three Massachusetts women sued Wal-Mart for refusing to sell them emergency contraceptives, and the Massachusetts Board of Registration in Pharmacy ruled that Wal-Mart was required to carry the pills. All Wal-Mart stores' pharmacies will begin carrying the medication March 20.

Emergency contraception is a more concentrated dose of ordinary birth control pills and must be taken within 72 hours of having sex to be effective.

Ron Chomiuk, vice president of pharmacy for Wal-Mart, said in a statement the company expected more states to require the sale of emergency contraceptives in the coming months. Only Illinois and Massachusetts mandate the sale of emergency contraceptives by law. Chomiuk said this made it difficult for his company to justify being the only major pharmacy not selling Plan B.

Larry Lockhart, University Health Center chief pharmacist, said emergency contraceptives are carried at the University of Nebraska Health Center at a reduced price of $20. Like other medical visits, students who need to see a physician at the center to obtain a prescription for the contraceptive are not charged for the appointment.

Bobbie Kierstead, vice president of public affairs for Planned Parenthood of Nebraska and Council Bluffs, said she didn't see the availability of emergency contraceptives at one retailer as having an impact on Nebraska's effort to prevent unintended pregnancies.

A recent study conducted by the Guttmacher Institute, a nonprofit organization that researches reproductive health, ranked Nebraska last in the nation in preventing unintended pregnancies.

Kierstead said increased access to emergency contraceptives was only one area in which the state needs improvement, although she considered the drug one of the keys to preventing unintended pregnancies, which make up half of all total pregnancies in the United States.

The Guttmacher Institute study also took into account a state's allocation of public funds for family planning as well as laws and policies that promote access to contraceptive information and services.

Pat Tetreault, sexuality education coordinator for the University Health Center, said she thought people would be more likely to use emergency contraceptives if they were more accessible.

Because Plan B must be taken within 72 hours of sexual intercourse, she said this makes it even harder for people in rural Nebraska, where resources are limited and long drives are usually required to fill prescriptions.

But the battle over emergency contraception isn't over as the debate will continue to focus on the question of "over-the-counter" access.

Petitions asking Wal-Mart to carry the medication were collected from 31,000 people, said Ted Miller, communications director for NARAL Pro-Choice America based in Washington. Miller said supporters urged Wal-Mart officials to end what could be seen as a discriminatory policy.

Miller said his organization would continue working to gain over-the-counter access of Plan B. He noted that a Food and Drug Administration advisory panel of scientists recommended the over-the-counter sale of the drug in 2003, although the FDA didn't give the approval for over-the-counter sales, citing the need for more information on how the drug would affect adolescent women.

• In the March 7 edition of the Amherst Police Logs, police mistakenly reported that Patricia Nugent struck a vehicle while under the influence. Nugent was actually the victim of the accident.

• In yesterday's article, "Police seek out victims of campus car thefts," one of the victims' names was incorrectly reported as Loyniak. His correct name is Lozyniak.

The by-laws also state that a candidate isn't allowed to promote or use a website other than the sites provided to every student by the administration upon enrollment.

Candidates are also obligated to list all of their campaign supporters at the start of their campaign. Commissioners contend that because Fox and Makarski had named members of the Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity on their campaign helper list, the hanging of the banner was in direct violation of the SGA by-laws.

Police arrest man for assault and battery with dangerous weapon

Friday March 10

Joseph G. Malekeil, 23, of 238 West Lake St. Libertyville, Ill. was arrested after police observed Malekeil passing through a stop sign and swerving. Malekeil consented to a field sobriety test and failed. Upon inspection of the vehicle, police found a clear keg-cup with a sample inside. Malekeil is charged with operating under the influence, failure to stop/yeild and failure to have possession of a license.

Police responded to 328 College St. at 6:18 p.m. following reports of numerous bottles being thrown at the building, allegedly by residents next door. The reporting party stated that unknown people have been throwing bottles onto the roof at night, which would then shatter as they fell. Tenants living above Spirit Haus reportedly know nothing about the incident.

Christopher Andrew Sanford, 20, of 53 Dickinson Hill Rd B of Whately was arrested at 8:32 p.m. for being a person under 21 in possession of liquor, unlawful transport of liquor and possession of a class D drug, most accalimed and beloved spiritual teachers, will be speaking and signing books. Tickets are $25 in advance, $22 for seniors and students with ID. They can be purchased at Beyond Words Bookshop at 189 Main St. in Northampton.

Saturday March 11

A group of people waved down police at 12:00 a.m. at 553 Main St. after they witnessed a man under the influence lying in the grass near the sidewalk. Police reported that the man was in and out of consciousness, with blood coming from an apparent mouth injury. The man was restrained in an ambulance after he became uncooperative and began yelling racial slurs at police.

Eric Michael Ryan, 20, of 5 Taber St. Springfield, was pulled over by police at 1:35 a.m. at 79 South Pleasant St. and arrested for driving with a suspended license, failure to have an inspection sticker, speeding and being a person under 21 in possession of alcohol.

After leaving a party at 81 Summer St., Gary R. Fujiwara, 21, of 68 Park Ave, Cambridge, was arrested at 2:07 a.m. after police spotted Fujiwara with an open Pabst Blue Ribbon can.

A white 1990 Volkswagen Corrad was recovered at UMass's lot 32 at 3:50 a.m. The vehicle was reported stolen and the passenger window was smashed in.

Five women who wandered off the trail while hiking were found after aerial support spotted the women just south of Bachelor Street in Granby near a swampy area. They had been hiking since 4:00 p.m. that day. Officials from Granby, South Hadley and Westover Airwing were called in to help as was the Amherst Fire Department "Gater" and two available mounted police officers from UMass.

Sunday March 12

Police arrested Kevin Ianetta, 18, of 281 Mitchell G Dr. Tewksbury, at 32 Fearing St. at 12:44 a.m. for having an open container of alcohol and being a person under 21 in possession of alcohol.

Kevin Driscoll, 20, of 26 Acorn Path, Groton, was arrested at the corner of Puffton Village and North Pleasant St. at 12:46 a.m. after police noticed Driscoll with an open container of alcohol. Driscoll was also arrested for being a person under 21 in possession of alcohol. Jared T. Cassidy was arrested at 12:51 a.m. at 1040 North Pleasant St. after witnesses reportedly observed Cassidy spinning the tires of his vehicle, causing him to spin out, hit a curb, and then spin his tires more. Cassidy was arrested after failing a field sobriety test.

Stephen M. Rakusin, 18, of 10 Montgomery Dr. Framingham and Daniel Jones, 18, of 17 Cider Mill Rd, Framingham were arrested at 1:42 a.m. at 406 North Pleasant St. for both being persons under 21 in possession of alcohol and having open containers.

Police were called to 345 Puffton Village at 5:32 p.m. after Donald William Murphy, 20, of 98 Waverly St., Arlington, had seriously beaten another man. Murphy is charged with assault and battery, causing serious bodily injury, breaking and entering, and assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, in this case, a shod foot. The assault was believed to have taken place over a dispute between his girlfriend and another man.

Police investigate Wakefield homicides

By Brooke Donald
Associated Press

WAKEFIELD — Two men were found shot to death inside a cement pouring company on Monday and authorities say the co-owner who died in the attack may have been the target.

The bodies of Chester Roberts, 51, and Michael Zammitti Jr., 39, both of Wakefield, were discovered just after 8 a.m. at Allstate Concrete Pumping on New Salem Street. Authorities were responding to a 911 call placed by Zammitti's father, who co-owned the business with his son and walked into the murder scene when he arrived at work.

Middlesex District Attorney Martha Coakley said an initial investigation indicated burglary and theft were not motives, though she emphasized the investigation was in its early stages.

She also said police hadn't found a murder weapon and didn't have any suspects.

"Obviously we haven't ruled any theories out at this stage in the game," she said responding to a reporter's inquiry that Roberts may have been involved with drugs.

But, she said "It does appear given the location of the bodies that he (Roberts) may not have been the intended target of this. He may have happened upon the circumstances. We don't know this for sure."

"We will say at this time the shooting did not appear to be random," she said.

Roberts was found shot in the back on the first floor of the sprawling, metal-sided building in an industrial part of town; Zammitti's body was discovered seated at his desk in a second floor office with "a gunshot wound to the head area," Coakley said.

Authorities believe the murders took place sometime between 7:30 a.m. and 8:05 a.m. No other employees were in the building at the time.

Coakley said the building was equipped with security cameras, but authorities don't believe they were working properly.

"We don't believe they captured anything," she said.

Judge considers dismissal of 9/11 trial

By Michael J. Sniffen
Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — An angry federal judge considered Monday whether to dismiss the government's death penalty case against confessed al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui after a federal attorney coached witnesses in violation of her rules.

"I do not want to act precipitously," U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema said in scheduling a special hearing on the case Tuesday, but she said that it was "very difficult for this case to go forward."

Brinkema said a lawyer for the Transportation Security Administration sent e-mail to seven Federal Aviation Administration officials outlining the prosecution's opening statements and providing commentary on government witnesses from the first day of testimony. That was in violation of her pretrial order barring witnesses from exposure to any opening statements or trial testimony.

"An attorney for the TSA ... egregiously breached that order," she told jurors before excusing them until Wednesday. Of the seven, three were to testify for the government and four were potential defense witnesses.

Government officials identified the attorney as Carla Martin.

Brinkema wanted to hear Tuesday from the seven and from the attorney who contacted them to help her decide whether to throw out the government's case. If she does, Moussaoui would escape the possibility of execution and be sentenced to life in prison without chance of parole.

She said the rule against witnesses hearing testimony in advance is "a very important protection of the truth-seeking process."

Moussaoui appeared bemused as the lawyers debated how to proceed. Leaving the courtroom, he said, "The show must go on."

The stunning development came at the opening of the fifth day of the trial after the government informed the judge and the defense over the weekend of the attorney's contact.

"This is the second significant error by the government affecting the constitutional rights of this defendant and more importantly, the integrity of the criminal justice system of the United States in the context of a death case," Brinkema told lawyers outside the presence of the jury.

Defense attorney Edward MacMahon moved to have the judge dismiss the death penalty as a possible outcome, saying "this is not going to be a fair trial." In the alternative, he said, at least she should excuse the government's FAA witnesses from the case.

Prosecutor David Novak replied that removing the FAA witnesses would "exclude half the government's case." Novak suggested instead that the problem could be fixed by a vigorous cross-examination by the defense.

But Brinkema said she would need time to study what to do.

"In all the years I've been on the bench, I have never seen such an egregious violation of a rule on witnesses," she said.

The defense did not move for a mistrial, which would have restarted the proceedings.

Moussaoui is the only person charged in this country with the 9/11 attacks. He pleaded guilty in April to conspiring with al-Qaida to hijack planes and to other crimes, but he denies any role in 9/11. He says he was training for a possible future attack.

Zacarias Moussaoui is on trial to recieve the death penalty for his role as alQaida conspirator.

Universities may become subject to federal testing

By Christopher Charbon
Tufts Daily (Tufts U.)

MEDFORD — Through a commission established last fall, the Bush administration is exploring whether universities should be subject to federal standardized testing.

According to The New York Times, the commission was created in light of flagging literacy statistics for college graduates and related sentiment toward greater accountability in higher education.

But professors nationwide -- Tufts University faculty included -- are generally skeptical of standardized assessment of colleges, given the diverse and complex nature of the university experience in America.

"I'm guessing that all such a [testing] system would do is create numerous perverse incentives," Associate Economics Professor Thomas Downes said.

Tufts professors nearly unanimously opposed the tests during a faculty meeting on Feb. 22., mainly asserting that such tests would be a poor measure of an institution's academic excellence.

The form the tests would take and the uses of the tests' results remain unclear. Proposed uses of the test results have ranged from a national database to help with comparison between colleges to links with federal funding.

Dean Robert Sternberg has written extensively on the subject. He opposes mandatory, standardized testing at the college level.

"[The purpose of college] is not to get high scores on standardized tests, but rather to learn about leadership skills and responsibility," Sternberg said.

He also questioned the appropriateness of transferring a testing system from America's unsatisfactory high schools to the college level. "[America's] system of higher education is world-renowned, while [America's] secondary schools are viewed as mediocre," he said.

Sternberg said he isn't opposed to the concept of administering the same test to all college students for comparison purposes, as long as "[it is] a test that truly measures what colleges are supposed to teach."

Such test scores could also help prospective students compare different colleges.

"[Standardized tests can] help you compare apples and oranges, provided you use the information with some amount of common sense," mathematics Professor Zbigniew Nitecki said.

A host of standardized tests, such as the Graduate Record Examinations (GRE), are already used as criteria for entrance into graduate programs, but they are hardly foolproof for measuring student ability.

"Just as it is easy to misinterpret and misuse statistics, it is easy to treat test results in numerical form as far more accurate or objective than they really are," Nitecki said.

According to Ex College Lecturer Ming Chow, standardized testing is more difficult to implement for majors in the humanities than for majors in the sciences.

"I do not know how a standardized test can be implemented for the humanities and social sciences because the subjects are broad and open," Chow said. "Information is often debated and changed."

Controversy surrounds death of Milosevic

By Anthony Deutsch
Associated Press

THE HAGUE, Netherlands — A swirl of suspicion surrounded Slobodan Milosevic's death, with evidence emerging Monday that the former Yugoslav leader took medication he wasn't supposed to.

Among the scenarios being floated: Drugs smuggled into prison; a poisoning plot and the possibility Milosevic was undermining his own treatment in hopes of being sent to Moscow, where his wife and son live in exile.

There was also concern that a funeral in Serbia could ignite nationalist passions and cause turmoil for the pro-democracy authorities who toppled Milosevic in 2000. Milosevic was overthrown after a 13-year reign in which many around the world blamed him for a series of wars that killed hundreds of thousands and left the former Yugoslavia a splintered ruin.

As plans for Milosevic's funeral remained in disarray and his son, Marko, headed to the Netherlands to retrieve the body, a Dutch toxicologist said Monday that the war crimes defendant took unprescribed antibiotics that may have worsened his health.

The assessment by Donald Uges — based on blood tests carried out in recent months — raised questions about security at the prison and echoed past accusations by the trial's leading attorney that Milosevic repeatedly ignored medical advice and prescribed himself drugs.

But Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Moscow did not fully trust the Dutch autopsy results and would send its own pathologists to examine the body. The U.N. war crimes tribunal had said a heart attack killed Milosevic, according to preliminary findings from Dutch pathologists who conducted a nearly eight-hour autopsy.

Milosevic was found dead in his prison cell in The Hague on Saturday, just hours after writing Russian officials a letter alleging that an "extremely strong drug" was found in his bloodstream. Zdenko Tomanovic, his family lawyer, said Milosevic was "seriously concerned" he was being poisoned.

Milosevic had asked the tribunal in December for permission to seek heart treatment in Moscow. That request was denied after tribunal officials expressed concern Milosevic might not return. He repeated the request last month.

Serbian President Boris Tadic said the U.N. war crimes tribunal was responsible for Milosevic's death, though he added that it would not hamper Serbia's future cooperation with the court. Serbia was the dominant republic in the former Yugoslavia.

"Undoubtedly, Milosevic had demanded a higher level of health care," Tadic said in an interview with The Associated Press. "That right should have been granted to all war crimes defendants."

He added, "I think they are responsible for what happened."

It appeared increasingly probable the body would be returned to Serbia for a politically charged burial that could be a rallying point for nationalists.

Marko Milosevic, raised the possibility of a temporary burial in Russia — an apparent effort to get around the standing arrest warrant in Serbia against widow Mirjana Markovic.

But Tomanovic, the lawyer, said Monday it was the family's wish for his body to be returned to Belgrade, and prosecutors urged a Serb court to lift an arrest warrant against his widow temporarily — a sign that Serbian Prime Minister Vojislav Kostunica was working behind the scenes to ensure Milosevic's closest relatives will be able to attend the funeral.

Milosevic was arrested in 2001 and put on trial the following year on 66 counts for war crimes and genocide in Croatia, Bosnia and Kosovo during Yugoslavia's violent breakup in the 1990s.

He was the first sitting head of state indicted for war crimes, and the sixth war crimes suspect from the Balkans to die at The Hague. A week earlier, convicted former Croatian Serb leader Milan Babic, a star prosecution witness against Milosevic, killed himself in the same prison.

Despite uncertainty over where the funeral would be held, Milosevic's son was granted a visa to enter the Netherlands and claim the body.

Uges, the Dutch toxicologist, said he discovered traces of rifampicin in Milosevic's system — a drug that "makes the liver extremely active" and can undermine the effectiveness of other medication.

Rifampicin is used with other drugs to treat tuberculosis. It also can be used alone to treat certain bacterial infections or asymptomatic carriers of a type of meningitis.

According to the U.S. prescribing label, the drug affects enzymes in the body to speed metabolism of a host of other drugs, meaning higher doses of those other medications may be needed to compensate. It also can cause liver damage.

Milosevic, 64, had chronic heart problems and high blood pressure.

"First he wasn't taking his medicine. Then he was forced to take it under supervision and his blood pressure still didn't come down," Uges told AP. "So the camp said 'you see, these Dutch doctors don't know how to treat him and he should go to Russia.'"

Uges suggested it may have been a plot to be sent to Russia for treatment.

Geoffrey Nice, the leading trial attorney in the Milosevic case, had often accused Milosevic of intentionally ignoring the advice of his doctors.

On Sept. 1, 2004, during court hearings, Nice cited four medical reports all supporting assertions that Milosevic was self-medicating — and even lying about his drug intake.

"He has been obtaining for his own purposes other drugs, no doubt to help himself," Nice said. "This material makes it overwhelmingly clear that the accused will do whatever is necessary to serve his own purpose. ... The court might be quite satisfied he has been manipulating this tribunal."

A second report last August by another doctor working at the U.N. detention unit identified as Dr. Dijkman, said "another drug" had repeatedly been found in Milosevic's blood — a development he characterized as "odd."

Milosevic's family want Russian pathologists to conduct a second autopsy to determine the cause of death, their lawyer said. Four Russian doctors were granted weeklong visas to visit the Netherlands.

Theories that Milosevic was deliberately poisoned gained momentum. Mirjana Markovic, the widow, insisted that he "has been killed by The Hague tribunal."

Another theory circulating in Belgrade was that his legal advisers secretly funded Milosevic the unprescribed drugs, acting under order from ultranationalists who feared a conviction on genocide charges would hurt Serbia in another trial in The Hague. Bosnia has filed a suit against Serbia in the International Court of Justice for genocide for the 1992-95 Bosnia war — demanding billions of dollars in war reparations.

A tribunal spokeswoman said a final autopsy report would be released in coming days.

Lavrov, the Russian foreign minister, was critical of the U.N. war crimes tribunal for refusing last month to allow Milosevic to travel to Moscow for medical treatment.

"Essentially, they didn't believe Russia," Lavrov said. "In a situation where we weren't believed, we also have the right not to believe and not to trust those who are conducting this autopsy."

Bush calls for patience from Americans for situation in Iraq

By Jennifer Loven
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush called on Iraqis Monday to embrace compromise as they negotiate a new unity government and asked Americans to show patience amid "images of violence and anger and despair."

"The situation in Iraq is still tense," Bush said in the first of a new series of speeches aimed at building support for the U.S. goals there.

The Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite mosque in Iraq led to the deaths of hundreds in reprisal attacks. But though many fear the country may still be on the brink of civil war among rival Muslim sects, Bush said he was confident that would not happen.

"The Iraqi people made their choice. They looked into the abyss and did not like what they saw," he said. "By their response over the last two weeks, Iraqis have shown the world they want a future of freedom and peace and they will oppose a violent minority."

Bush said that forming a new permanent government that represents all factions in Iraq is a key next step. Talks are under way to put together Iraq's first permanent, post-invasion government with participation by Sunni Arabs, Shiite Muslims and Kurds.

"Forming a government will demand negotiation and compromise by the Iraqis; it will require patience on the part of America and her allies," he said. "Out of this process, a free government will emerge that represents the will of the Iraqi people instead of the will of one cruel dictator."

Bush is engaging in a public relations offensive on Iraq amid increasing worries in the American public. Only 39 percent of Americans support the way the president has handled Iraq, according to the latest AP-Ipsos poll. Nearly four out of five Americans, including 70 percent of Republicans, believe civil war will break out in Iraq, the poll showed.

Bush chose to focus in his opening speech on Iraqi security forces. He said that even though they need more training, they "turned in a strong performance" in the wake of the mosque bombing.

"From the outset, Iraqi forces understood that if they failed to stand for national unity, the country would slip into anarchy," Bush said.

"And so they stood their ground and defended their democracy."

He acknowledged that not all Iraqi forces performed as well as others, and said there were reports that some forces in eastern Iraq had let insurgents pass by unimpeded.

Thoughts on the upcoming election

Negative campaigns and name calling do the opposite of their intention, discouraging students to vote and diminishing the SGA to a sideshow.

David B. Lawrence

The people behind www.changesga.com seek to do just as the URL promises, change the SGA, and they are changing it – for the worse – by attempting a return to the ugly, partisan politics that used to characterize it. Under the leadership of President Pavel Payano and Speaker Sean Bliss, the SGA has improved this year. Under the current administration, the usual ugly reports of scandal and incompetence were supplanted by news of progress, of issues and ideas. That is a good thing.

But that can change. The character of student government could very easily return to the old standard of resume builders jockeying for position, of weekly Collegian articles smearing one student leader or another, of being an irrelevant political sideshow. The changesga.com authors are trying to motivate that change. For them, the first step in changing the SGA back is casting the first stone. Their website is in the mold of old SGA politics: don't discuss ideas, discuss people, and libel them even.

The site has added a link with the text "SGA Officials Complain About Students Exercising Their First Amendment Rights." Allow me to correct them: Criticizing speech is not the same thing as restricting speech. If someone says, "You shouldn't have said that, because it is a stupid/slanderous/ignorant thing to say," they are not violating your first amendment rights: they are in fact exercising theirs by criticizing your comments. Only when the government tells you, prior to your making a statement, that you are not allowed to make that statement, is your right to free speech being restricted. Otherwise you probably shouldn't bring the constitution into the debate.

The kind of politics practiced by the authors of changesga.com was commonplace in my first several years at the University. The SGA was a complete laughingstock. Consistently, students viewing the SGA from the outside saw only bickering and scandal. In recent times however, particularly under the administration of Payano, that perception has crept towards change, towards improvement. Up until the launch of the website, there had yet to be a scandal or personal attack this year. In place of the scandals and attacks we have heard about ideas, about democratizing education, about affordability, about diversity.

I don't even agree with Payano's stance on those issues. I think a service, hiring, and progress freeze (SGA leaders called it a "fee freeze") was unrealistic, and would hurt more students than it would help. However at least it was an issue, and with issues at the forefront the students have the opportunity to think about their education and make decisions. That process is what brings students to the polls. That process is what will earn the respect (and attention) of the administration and trustees.

Negative campaigns and name calling do the opposite, they discourage students from voting, and they cost the SGA influence by diminishing it to a sideshow. Negamapaigns and name calling are how the authors of changesga.com would like to change the SGA back, and return it to irrelevance.

Smear campaigns are bad for the SGA because the perception that students and the administration have of the SGA is vitally important to its ability to have its more expansive measures considered. While the association is granted some power to doll out money to RSOs and other programs, it has the potential to be much more powerful by acting as a vessel for communicating the students' wishes to the administration.

When the SGA is seen as a disconnected and scandal-torn body, its power to influence the administration is greatly diminished. Likewise as it becomes more and more positive and issue-oriented, it will garner greater respect from (and hence power within) the administration and the Board of Trustees. It is thanks to the respect that this administration has earned that the Board of Trustees is truly listening to student concerns this semester.

Though the SGA has a long way to go in terms of having a realistic agenda and a productive culture, progress has certainly been made this year. Under Payano and Bliss, the tone has started to improve. Issues have replaced scandals as the topic of discussion. The trustees have finally taken notice of what we have to say. Those things are good for student government and, more importantly, good for students. The choice facing those who vote in the election this week is a choice between two kinds of change: regressive and progressive. Do we want the SGA to continue the progress we've seen this year, or do we want it to revert to negativity and irrelevancy? Let's not vote to move backwards, let's vote to continue to change the SGA for the better.

Melissa Garber

We don't dance enough. I would have to say as a whole, the student population at this university is not dancing as often as it could be. Everywhere there are opportunities to dance. In the showers, in the dorms, on the walk to class, in the dining commons, on the buses, in the car, the list is endless. I was walking up Orchard Hill the other day and there was just some random guy with his eyes closed dancing up the hill like nothing matters. It was the coolest thing I have ever seen.

Dancing is so ridiculous. It's not about how good you are, or how many people you can grind up against, it's about letting go of all your inhibitions and going nuts. People get so caught up in how stupid they look and what everyone is thinking about them that they can't dance. When I see people dancing it just makes me happy. No matter what, whether they're really talented or absolutely terrible, it's not important.

I spend the week studying for exams, writing papers, doing OWLS – you know what I'm talking about. When I get time away from the work I can't waste it away being wasted, I need to be dancing.

Sometimes you can't help it. You just have these spontaneous bursts of dance built up in you and you have to do something about it. Last semester my roommates and I would get dressed up in spandex and go running around campus armed with a boom box blasting '80s music. We danced in the Franklin D.C., at the pyramid in Southwest, on the bus, in the Fine Arts Center, at Mission Improvable. Dancing is just something we do.

Things can get so mundane at college. Every weekend is just another party where people are drinking and doing their drug of choice. I need variety. I can't be stifled by small dorm rooms, and games involving cups and balls that get in the way of letting loose. I spend the week studying for exams, writing papers, doing OWLS – you know what I'm talking about. When I get time away from the work I can't waste it away being wasted, I need to be dancing.

Just one hour of dancing, doing whatever you want to whatever music you want to do it to equals complete freedom from everything. There are no restrictions on what you can do; no papers due on why you're dancing; no midterms or finals or cops or bills or authoritative figures telling you about all the responsibilities you have. You're in college, you're supposed to work hard, get good grades, and figure out what you're going to do for the rest of your life. Dancing means that none of that matters until after the dancing stops. For just a little bit every day you can reach euphoria, a higher state of mind without learning meditation.

Some days just suck. You have papers due and midterms to take and bills to pay and it's raining and you have to walk up the hill to your dorm and you are just miserable. You barely slept last night and you had a 9 a.m. class today; your shower was cold and you officially have nothing to wear because it's time to do laundry again. Your significant other just dumped you and you know what? It's time to dance.

I think everyone should just get over their hang-ups and their insecurities and just dance. All your issues will be waiting for you when you're done. You can go back to worrying about grades and friends and what people think about you after you're done. There's nothing better than a natural high. Sure drugs can give you a temporary high and that's great, but a natural one takes over your whole body and you can reach it without any outside sources.

The two of us rocking out...hard.

Sometimes you just have to dance up the hill. You have to close your eyes and pretend all there is out there is just you and that hill, nothing else. There are so many things we have to do as kids in college, so many responsibilities, and so many decisions we have to make. It can get so stressful and frustrating. We're not machines and we don't have off buttons. Consciousness is something we have to deal with.

I don't know, maybe I'm forcing my weird philosophies down unwilling throats. Maybe my love of dance can't be shared by everyone and I should just quit now. But I think if more people gave dancing a shot, people would be so much happier and more relaxed. This whole college deal is rough enough, everyone needs to let go of all that pent up frustration somehow. I believe in the power of dance, you should try it out.

"So, like, where do you live on campus?" inquires a friend to break the awkward silence.

"Up in Field, in O-H Hill," I reply.

"Oh, that's too bad, man."

"Yeah." I say after a moment's hesitation.

I hesitate because I like it where I live, something the city folk from Southwest can never seem to believe. Believe it.

Orchard Hill, for those who may not be aware, is a small clustering of four dormitories nestled atop the aptly-named Orchard Hill. The buildings are (in order of coolness factor) Field, Grayson, Dickinson and Webster. One can see us rising in the distance next to Upper Central, just behind the Worcester and Franklin DC's.

The reason conversations always drift toward the misfortune of my living arrangement still evades me. Why must I incessantly deal with this stigma that the non-Hillers attribute to my place of residence? My eyes hurt from having to repeatedly roll them at the inevitable backhanded jabs to which I must submit every time I am tricked into telling a new acquaintance where I sleep at night. Sometimes I make the pre-emptive strike: "Field...yeah, I know." Well, it is a bunch of bologna.

When my future roommate and I applied for our housing assignment last spring, we listed all the big guns: Baker, Van Meter, Greenough, hell, we even had Thoreau. Our last of eight choices was in Orchard Hill. We were "safe," we thought. We thought wrong.

I once lived in the more residentially reputed "South Central" (in, however, the unfortunate alcohol-free Brooks House). I had big dreams then. Like most of you, I thought lowly of Orchard Hill. When my future roommate and I applied for our housing assignment last spring we listed all the big guns: Baker, Van Meter, Greenough, hell, we even had Thoreau. Our last of eight choices was in Orchard Hill. We were "safe" we thought. We thought wrong.

When the housing assignments came out I was thrown for a loop. I had suffered two semesters in the oldest, smallest, alcohol–freest dorm on campus and I got my last choice. What the truck, you know? My then, future roommate, and Orchard Hill alum, spoke to me that evening as I sulked. He said something I will never forget. He said, "It could be worse. At least we didn't get Sylvan." It was true. At least we didn't get Sylvan. Maybe, though, even Sylvan is not as bad as everyone claims. (What's the deal, Sylv? Much love.)

Still, I worried: what would life be like in Field? Studying? Homework? Awkward, hunchbacked hall–mates? As friend after friend called up to describe their grand housing assignment fortune, I was, for the first time, exposed to the all–too–common reply in response to where I would be living: "That sucks."

I spent the summer at home on the beautiful Massachusetts shoreline and as summer ease set in, the distress with my soon–to–be accommodations melted away with the frost. By the time September rolled around and we moved in, the excitement of getting back to college, at the end of a summer that lasted too long (far after every friend from home had gone back to school), my animosity of moving up the hill had dissipated. I quickly learned that this place is not so bad after all.

We have respectable rooms, some of the most spacious on campus with built in book shelves, desks and closets. The people are cool, and I hear the beer tastes pretty much the same as anywhere else. We have a great view of campus, a couple basketball courts, a private gym, the "rape trail" (don't worry, it's just a name), some purple lots, Greenough Sub Shop, that cool tree you can sit on, the Bowl, and Sweets 'N More (our kick–butt candy store) is right downstairs waiting around the delicious scents of homemade goodies.

The walk up the hill can be tough, but it makes you feel not as bad about eating that soft serve.

So, put your notions of Southwestern superiority at bay for a moment next time we meet, and pause before you tell me how lame I am for where I hang my hat. Maybe we are the smallest living area on campus, but it is not the size of your unit that counts, it is how you use it. Let us also remember that it is the differences in life that make it so great.

Just once, I would love to hear the generic introduction conversations include mutual respect for the beauty that is inherent in each living area. You guys have the big city lifestyle and lots of beautiful, well-dressed girls; we have a nice, little hill. So come share our hill and we would be glad to share your girls. See, we aren't so different after all.... Oh, and that last sentence about the girls was a joke... (But seriously).

The moral here, people? The moral is that we have to foster UMass pride, campus–wide. We must unite and build pride from the tallest peak of the highest antenna atop the library, down to the lowest portion of the underground connector between Bartlett and Tobin Hall. Pride between those that deliver for Pinnocchio's and those that deliver for Wings or Bruno's or Fatzo's or D.P. Dough, or even, God love them, those that deliver for Domino's.

We are all Minutemen. We are all one, so let us start acting like it.

Validating corruption

Mike Sances

To quote George Orwell is to invite controversy, as Harper's discovered in January 1983, when the magazine published a cover story on Orwell by Norman Podhoretz, editor of the neoconservative journal Commentary. Provocatively titled "If Orwell Were Alive Today," Podhoretz's article claimed that, supposing he had lived past 1950, the English author of Nineteen Eighty-Four (not "1984") would be embracing the "anti-totalitarianism" of the New Right, thus supporting the war on Vietnam and opposing the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament.

The following issue featured an angry counterpoint by Christopher Hitchens (who in 2004 attacked Michael Moore's Fahrenheit 9/11 using the same quotes Podhoretz employed for his case), and for three months the journal was overwhelmed with letters to the editor.

The misappropriation of popular historical figures was something Orwell often warned about in his own life. In an essay on Charles Dickens, he noted that Dickens was "well worth stealing," and catalogued the various factions who "claimed" Dickens as their own since his death, using the dead man's stature to support their own political views.

Why do these various groups need historical or literary figures to latch on to? Probably because they are aware of the deficiency of their beliefs, and know that they would be hard–pressed to stand them up on their own.

Why do these various groups need historical or literary figures to latch on to? Probably because they are aware of the deficiency of their beliefs, and know that they would be hard-pressed to stand them up on their own. Still, there must be something to be gained from studying the political thought of dead authors, else Orwell wouldn't be as popular as he still is.

Since 2001, it has become increasingly common to refer to contemporary political events as "Orwellian." The context is usually either the political language used to promote the policies of the Bush administration, or anxiety about increasing government surveillance. If you look up Bush and Orwell on a search engine, for example, the first site that comes up is Students for an Orwellian Society, or SOS. According to this group, "Since the events of 11 September, we have been able to convince a number of figures in national and local politics to help forward our aims," specifically, their "mission to promote the vision of a society based upon the principles of Ingsoc, first articulated by George Orwell in his prophetic novel, 1984 [sic]."

That's all very cute, but we'd be deluding ourselves if we honestly believed that George Bush was the first politician to say the opposite of what he means, or to shroud unpopular policies in rhetoric or jargon, putting aside surveillance for the moment. Sadly however, many liberals have managed to pull this off without once cracking a smile.

It would be as great an act of delusion to believe that the recent wave of corruption scandals rocking Washington were an innovation of the Republican Party. But again, so common is this assumption among liberals that they raise a cheer with each new revelation of GOP misconduct.

I'm skeptical. Putting aside the comparative levels of corruption between the two parties, which I doubt varies too much in reality, we need to look at the big picture and see the whole system as it is. Because real corruption is at the root of all politics. The corruption focused on by the news media, on the other hand, is boils down to nothing more than the rich stealing from the rich.

No wonder, then, that most Americans can't be bothered to pay attention to these stories, or that Tom DeLay is on his way to reelection in Sugar Land, Texas.

But in addition to boring most observers, corruption can also be a good thing, at least when it takes place inside an already rotten system. Orwell realized this, or at least his character Winston Smith did, in Nineteen Eighty-Four. If I could choose only one quote from Orwell to apply to politics in 2006, it would be this: Upon hearing that Julia, Winston's forbidden lover, has had sex with members of the Outer Party, Winston is "filled...with a wild hope. Who knew, perhaps the Party was rotten under the surface, its cult of strenuousness and self-denial simply a sham concealing iniquity. If he could have infected the whole lot of them with leprosy or syphilis, how gladly he would have done so!"

It may sound nihilistic, and indeed Nineteen Eighty-Four, Orwell's final novel, is filled with the bleakest nihilism from start to finish. But there is also wisdom to be found within its pages, if we bother to look, and if we can manage to avoid, as Orwell accurately described Dickens' grave robbers, "the smelly little orthodoxies which are now contending for our souls" – and, for nearly sixty years now, the soul of George Orwell."

NINE INCH NAILS 'MARCH' TO THE MULLINS CENTER

By Bill Donovan
Collegian Staff

Nine Inch Nails created a storm Friday night on the Mullins Center stage, bashing their way through a two-hour set. Trent Reznor howled with ferocity alongside his refurbished band to many career-defining songs, such as "Closer," "Hurt" and "March of the Pigs."

Reznor looked fully healed and upbeat after his six year seclusion. Adorned in his traditional black attire, he ran all the over the stage, at times playfully pushing guitarist Aaron North aside.

"How you guys doing, are you having a good time?" he asked a few songs into the show. "I think that's the first time in this band's history I've asked that."

A tight rhythm section between bassist Jeordie White and Josh Freese on drums buffed up many of the songs. "Piggy" was such a song where these two shined. White's bouncy strings marched to the beat of Freese's shattering kit. A lone light hovered above Reznor as he walked off the set, embracing the throng of fans. He passed the microphone to people, who helped sing the apathetic chorus. Chants of "Nothing can stop me now, 'cuz I don't care anymore," echoed throughout the place.

A dark sea of lighters and cell phones illuminated the arena as Reznor performed "Hurt" alone on a keyboard. It was powerful moment, watching him reflect on his drug-fueled past. Reznor, like Red Hot Chili Peppers' John Frusciante is one of the few amongst '90s-rockers to survive from a bout with heroin. Clouds of smoke danced around him as he played the broken notes. North's guitar, accompanied by Alessandro Cortini's keyboard, screamed as the piece came to a halt.

The band took a stand against warfare and the Bush administration midway into the show. A silk screen lowered as the ominous "Eraser" began. Freese pounded out a marching band beat as shots of tanks and destruction filled the frame. Over this, North plucked along, bending notes neurotically.

Reznor, although now in his early 40s, is still as intense as ever. On songs like "Terrible Lie" and "Burn" he strummed his guitar furiously. The crowd, which had pushed its way to the front of the stage, shared the moment. "Burn" is a track off the soundtrack to the film "Natural Born Killers." People bobbed their heads and cheered the band on. But many did not know the lyrics to this song. At last year's show in Boston, NIN did a similar soundtrack song, "Dead Souls" from the movie "The Crow."

A sight to see was North during faster-paced songs like "Wish," off the "Broken" LP. He twirled his guitar as if it were a baton, playing it behind his back. Jumping onto his amplifier, he'd face Freese while playing. The show closed with the anti-authoritarian "Head Like A Hole." The crowd yelled the words defiantly as the band raced through it. It was interesting to see them end the show with the song that started it all.

Opener Saul Williams had an interesting mix of hip-hop beats, poetry and hard rock. Williams performed with NIN for the Voodoo Music Festival, a charity concert in New Orleans.

Nine Inch Nails frontman Trent Reznor appeared more upbeat than usual when he performed at the Mullins Center last Friday during its rescheduled show.

South by Southwest: Analyzing the hype

Brit-rockers Kasabian did not live up to the hype generated by their appearance at South by Southwest in Austin, Texas.

By Cary Darling
Knight Ridder Newspapers

AUSTIN, Texas — March in Texas means just one thing for music and movie fans: South by Southwest.

The annual Austin multimedia conference/film fest/club crawl — which kicked off Friday with a focus on film and the Internet while music takes over Wednesday through March 19 — brings with it at least 15,000 visitors who, the city says, pump nearly $30 million into the local economy.

But along with all those shiny, happy, pierced faces and their willing dollars, the 10-day party also tows something else — hype. Like runoff after a rainstorm, it's impossible to avoid for anyone wading, even gingerly, into South by Southwest.

This year is no different, especially once the guitars crank up. While there is chatter about this year's opening-night and closing-night films — respectively, Robert Altman's "A Prairie Home Companion" and the Hugh Grant/Dennis Quaid comedy "American Dreamz" — it's with the festival's music offerings that expectations run highest and letdowns sink deepest.

After being primed for months by an overeager British pop press on the hunt for the Next Big Thing and their American indie-rock counterparts in search of cool at all costs, SXSW-goers often find themselves waiting for hours in a groggy haze of smoke, beer and sleeplessness to worship at the altar of mediocrity. They end up asking, like the old song says, "Is that all there is?"

In that spirit, we revisit the last couple of SXSW confabs and some of the acts that we were assured would be setting the world on fire. In some cases, that hype turned out to be true. Others self-immolated, at least commercially speaking.

A few have been tapped to burn brightly this year, especially the U.K.'s overpraised Arctic Monkeys.

But let's look back before charging ahead.

— Who: The Killers

SXSW Buzz Factor: 7. Lots of curiosity, if not the well-oiled buzz machine of their British counterparts.

Background: Two years ago, Las Vegas' most famous rock export was just another band of wannabes with some cool haircuts and a hopeless addiction to the Cure and Psychedelic Furs.

Hot or Hype?: Hot. Years from now, youngsters will ask their parents incredulously, "You mean, there was a time when you could turn on a modern-rock station and not hear 'Mr Brightside'?" And they will think the world a most strange and illogical place. Since its 2004 release, the band's debut, "Hot Fuss," has sold more than 3 million copies.

— Who: Franz Ferdinand

SXSW Buzz Factor: 10. The Arctic Monkeys of their day.

Background: Brit band, named after a long-dead archduke, had become the darling of the English music press long before setting foot on American soil. That alone was enough to attract a mob to Sixth Street's Buffalo Billiards even though few actually had heard a note.

Hot or Hype?: Hot. Well, kinda. More like lukewarm. IT's self-titled debut disc sprawned a huge hit with "Take Me Out." But a second album, 2005's "You Could Have It So Much Better," was pretty much a stiff this side of the Atlantic. Now, the band is again trying to prove itself to America by opening for Death Cab for Cutie on their current tour.

— Who: Paul Wall

SXSW Buzz Factor: 10 among followers of Texas hip-hop; 3 for everyone else.

Background: A key figure in the explosively popular Houston rap scene, Wall was part of Chamillionaire's "Color Changin' Click" and a guest on fellow Houstonian Mike Jones' "Still Tippin' ".

Hot or Hype?: Hot. His 2005 "The Peoples Champ" disc hit No. 1 on Billboard's Top 200 and featured the smash single "Sittin' Sidewayz." He has helped take Houston's "chopped and screwed" sound to a national level.

— Who: Kasabian

Year: 2005

SXSW Buzz Factor: 9. What else would you expect from a band named after Manson family member Linda Kasabian?

Background: British group, fronted by the ego-bloated Tom Meighan, that hit the top of the charts at home with such tracks as "Reason Is Treason," "Processed Beats," "L.S.F." and "Clubfoot." The self-titled debut album immediately soared into the top 10.

Hot or Hype?: Hype. The Kasabian album didn't climb out of the college radio/underground niche. Most Americans got one whiff of what Kasabian was selling — a refried mix of such once-buzzworthy Brit bands as the Stone Roses and Happy Mondays — and said, "If you don't mind, we'll stick with Nickelback, thank you, very much."

— Who: Louis XIV

SXSW Buzz Factor: 9. These guys were supposed to be the hottest thing out of San Diego since Simon & Simon.

Background: Their riffin' Kinks' early-Stones style, not to mention singer Jason Hill's rock-star attitude, certainly struck a chord in Southern California and earned them national attention and a deal with Atlantic Records.

Hot or Hype?: Hype. When the group named its full-length CD, "The Best Little Secrets Are Kept," they probably didn't realize how appropriate it would be.

FosterChild gives new home to misplaced rock 'n' roll musicians

By Josh Duckett
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

Kevin Miller shot to fame as drummer for the rock band Fuel, a Harrisburg, Pa.-based quartet that had a platinum debut and string of hits beginning in 1998, including "Shimmer" and "Hemorrhage." Now, after a much publicized split with the band in 2004, Miller has come out rocking with a new band called FosterChild.

"We just want to bring back rock 'n' roll. Not grunge, not new wave, just straight-up, whiskey-drinking rock 'n' roll," says Miller.

In addition to Miller, the roster features guitarist Brian Quinn, a former member of Philadelphia hard rock band Octane; lead vocalist/guitarist Danny Beissel, who worked as a regional solo artist; and bassist Erik Leonhardt, former member of Freak, a New Jersey hard-rock cover band.

Miller says all the members were looking to start something new.

"Coming from our previous bands, we were just sick of trying to be something that we're not," says Miller. "That's why we chose our name. We're like the bastards of rock 'n' roll. We belong to no one but ourselves."

FosterChild debuted last summer and has been playing in small clubs and halls — basically everywhere it can get a gig — around the region and state and has drawn crowds — many old fans of Miller and Fuel — to local haunts. The band's biggest gig to date was the Fire Lake Festival in South Carolina last August, a four-day fest that featured 40 bands, including Sugar Ray, Keller Williams and Little Feat.

"We are pounding the crap out of the pavement," says Miller.

While Miller is the member with the highest profile, he says the band is truly a collaborative effort, with everyone contributing to the writing process.

"If you're a musician, you obviously need an outlet, and the outlet is being creative," says Miller. "It's the beautiful thing of being in my band now. Everyone writes and everybody can be creative and everybody can bring something to the table."

There was little collaboration in Fuel, Miller says, with guitarist Carl Bell doing all the writing.

"With all the success that Fuel has had, personally it wasn't mine. Because I wasn't allowed to write. It was one man's thing," he says.

Miller remains in litigation over publishing royalties with Fuel, which is now looking for a new lead singer after Brett Scallions left to form a band called the X's.

Says Miller "This is so much more of a fun experience for me. It actually has rekindled my love for music. I got so burned out on the Fuel thing, being part of the whole machine. Now I look forward to rehearsal and am constantly coming up with ideas. It's awesome."

FosterChild has recorded a few songs — pounding rockers like "Independence Day" and "Let Me Down" — and was getting ready to work on a demo CD with producer Jeff Glixman at StarCity Recording in Bethlehem, Pa., But Miller says that's now on hold as the band explores possibilities with a record company.

Ex-Fuel drummer Kevin Miller and his band FosterChild want to bring back straight-up rock 'n' roll.

'King of Macy's' leaves most interesting themes unexplored

By Greer Gilchrist
Collegian Correspondent

Allow yourself, as a reader, to be taken to the unimaginative world of minimum wage, part time, department store retail, where your only escape lies in the amusement of your co-workers or the dismal hope of landing an acting job. Now, as monotonous and dull as this setting might sound, imagine reading about a main character that leads this life.

The only escape for the reader is through a subplot brought on from a minor character. With that reflection, you will have produced the outcome of a failed attempt at a controversial, thought-provoking novel, "The King of Macy's" by Fred Beauford.

"The King of Macy's" brings out what everyone who has ever worked a part time job in retail knows: that it is boring, tiring, and relatively unbalanced with its rewards in the end. The main character, Randy, does not underestimate these expectations, nor does his life story, which only seems to allude to a vast number of sexual encounters and moderately uninteresting conflicts. Many times while reading about Randy's highly sexed and poorly narrated tale one can't help but wonder, "What is the point?"

Randy feels no need, as the narrator, to illustrate an optimistic view of Los Angeles in 2003. In fact, he exposes a very unwelcoming attitude to the fallen city. Using Macy's as a part time job to fill the void between his futile attempts at acting in any major plays, Randy is quite reminiscent of a starving artist. Randy blames his status on the apathetic population of Los Angeles. Beauford seems to be using this negative outlook on Los Angeles and the minimal success in theater to prove the lack of appreciation of art. He does not hesitate to denounce Hollywood and Hollywood actors through Randy.

Randy, painted as the ideal actor, unfortunately has not been given the right opportunity to really break out in theater. Therefore his bitter undertones with audiences' responses to theater as an art and Hollywood as their source of entertainment are understandable. It's as though

Beauford is trying to make a case for a wasted talent, suggesting that this man leads such an unsuccessful life due to the lack of interest and unfairness of others in their judging of theater and entertainment. While these seem like interesting points and thoughts to ponder regarding art appreciation, Beauford unskillfully depicts such an image through his somewhat sleazy characters and weak writing. In the end, they're just wimpy complaints emitted through Randy, which destroys Beauford attempts at any thoughts the reader might have produced.

Beauford almost manages to save his pointless novel with a second story line. He creatively develops a story within a story. It is this second story that manages to bring any acclaim to the novel. It unapologetically describes a bleak outlook of the World towards the 22nd Century. This smaller tale, titled "A History of the 21st Century," recounts the events post September 11th. It depressingly reports the complete destruction of New York City, as well as any positive relation the United States might have had with any other country. However, as depressing as this manuscript seems, it was thought-provoking. It provided insight on the consequences of our present actions regarding our government, the environment and our world policies.

"A History of the 21st Century," channeling works such as "1984" and "Fahrenheit 9/11", should have been the major plot of the story. Or it should have at least contributed to the overall plot of "The King of Macy's". Beauford excellently concocted this chilling manuscript; however, he failed to connect it to the overall plot, thus immediately concluding any meaning it might carry over to the rest of the story, regular, everyday life and to the reader. It is extremely disappointing when "A History of the 21st Century" ends and disturbing when it is never touched upon again.

If Beauford had managed to take these two separate plots and extend upon them separately he would have at least ended up with one very remarkable and brooding novel. However, his desire to aspire to developing these two contrasting plots together ended up stripping the novel of any meaning, leaving the audience searching for what "A History of the 21st Century" could possibly have to contribute to the rest of the plot. In the end there is no connection.

A "History of the 21st Century" took up half of "The King of Macy's". If not for this sub-story I would not encourage any reading of this book. It is an easy read, and very insightful when the manuscript approaches. Yet, the fact that there is no crossover between the two entirely damages the book. Without the manuscript there is nothing left to "The King of Macy's." The characters are poorly developed and often not important to the plot. The only reason for the existence of the minor characters is to have a background for Randy's many, and proud, sexual encounters. Just as the characters are barely touched upon, the plot is also underdeveloped. Overall, "The King of Macy's" provides one with no afterthoughts regarding its context or the future it was trying to prevent through the storylines.

Actress Loni Anderson says she wasn't made for marriage

By Luaine Lee
Knight Ridder/Tribune News Service

PASADENA, Calif. — Actress Loni Anderson has waited all her life to play it fast and nasty. At last she gets her chance. The new comedy "so noTORIous," premiering April 2 on VH1, is a fictionalized version of the life of actress Tori Spelling ("Beverly Hills, 90210"). Anderson, the dish from "WKRP in Cincinnati" and "Melrose Place," plays Spelling's mother in this funny poor-little-rich-girl saga.

Portraying a greedy, self-absorbed dowager is just what the doctor ordered, insists Anderson over tea on a blustery Southern California day here.

It's the perfect part, she says, her blonde hair skimming the lapel of her black pantsuit, "someone not very nice but still glamorous."

While it is based on Spelling's life — she is the daughter of successful TV producer Aaron Spelling and his wife, Candy — Anderson's character bears no resemblance to the real Mrs. Spelling, she insists.

"Candy and I have known each other for years," Anderson says. "I'm nothing like her, because she's just too NICE to be funny. I'm not her, not anything like her. It's just a fictional version of a mom who happens to live in a mansion."

Anderson herself has been a mom who lives in a mansion. When "WKRP in Cincinnati" hit big she had a pre-teen daughter and was married to her second husband.

"I was married to a really nice actor for about eight years and we moved out here together and I hit and he didn't, and it destroyed our marriage," she says.

Her daughter was embarrassed by the frantic notoriety that came with the popular TV show. "She was 12 years old and I was the poster in people's bedrooms that she went to school with. Or else, 'You're such a responsibility, Mom, we have to take care of you and we can't go here and we can't do this and our life isn't normal anymore.' It's really hard for a young person in junior high. That was the most difficult time," she shakes her head.

Anderson had been through a divorce years earlier. Briefly married at 18, she had her daughter, Diedra, and returned home to her parents while she attended college.

"That made people nervous. I remember going to college and all the sororities rushed me, and when they found out I was a divorced mother, they didn't want any part of me. Then guys would ask me out and find out I had a child. I was 19 years old and they're not taking ME home to mother. I'm terrifying. Or older guys asking you out thinking you've been married and you must be interested in easy sex. So I became very reclusive. That's really when I got into acting."

She majored in education, earned her degree and found herself, at 21, teaching art to 17-year-olds. "I'm in the art class, a lot of kids think that's an easy A, and a lot of the boys were asking me out. I thought, 'I can't handle this at all.' Right after that I taught at a girls' school and that was much easier before I went acting full time."

Still, acting was what she'd wanted all her life. As a kid she put on shows charging the neighbors a nickel to watch her perform and landing her first professional appearance at 10. When she first began to pursue acting she did commercials, industrial shows and plays out of Chicago and Minneapolis-St. Paul, with a beauty contest thrown in from time to time.

But it was her move to Los Angeles that thrust her into the stratosphere. "I was here three years and got 'WKRP in Cincinnati,'" she recalls. "I wasn't prepared for celebrity. I was prepared to be an actress but not a celebrity. It's totally invasive and, unless you have 15 minutes of fame, forever after you've given up your anonymity and nobody knows how to prepare you for that."

Anderson entered a celebrated third marriage with actor Burt Reynolds. They adopted a son, Quinton, who is 17 now. But, after five years, that union failed too.

"You know, marriage hasn't worked for me," she sighs. "I think that's more my fault than anyone's because I think there's something about marriage that makes me feel caged."

Her current flame, lawyer Geoff Brown, never puts restrictions on her, she says. "I always feel I can go. That's probably why Geoff and I have been together as long as we have because I never felt I couldn't go any time I wanted. There's something in me that goes, 'Oh, oh, don't smother me.'"

Anderson, 59, describes herself as "very Scarlett O'Hara." She says she always looks forward, not backward. "My parents dying so young made me very aware — they both died when I was in my 30s. I realized you really have to enjoy every moment. All the people my age who are dealing with aging parents, I don't have that. My parents are already gone, but I would trade it in a second, deal with all the problems of an aging parent, just to have had them for the last 20 years."

Former "WKRP In Cincinnati" star Loni Anderson will play Tori Spelling's mother in the upcoming VH1 show "noTORIous."

Dan Brown takes stand in copyright-infringement lawsuit

By Jill Lawless
Associated Press Writer

LONDON — Dan Brown guards his privacy obsessively, but the author read by millions around the world was forced into the spotlight of a London courtroom to defend himself against accusations he copied the work of others.

The trial is a serious change from Brown's small-town New Hampshire life, where he lives with his wife Blythe, and rises at 4 a.m. to work — "by making writing the first order of business every day, I am giving it enormous symbolic importance in my life," he said.

The few seats in the 10th-floor courtroom not filled by journalists on Monday were quickly taken by avid trial-watchers hoping to catch a glimpse of Brown's testimony — including many with an interest in shadowy medieval orders, alleged dark secrets within the Roman Catholic Church and celebrity authors.

Brown took the stand in London's High Court and dismissed claims he copied two writers' work for "The Da Vinci Code." Branding the allegations of Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh as "completely fanciful," he said he had not read their book until the ideas and story line of his theological thriller were already in place.

In a witness statement made public by lawyers as he took the stand, Brown said he was "shocked at their reaction" to his book. But under questioning by the plaintiffs' lawyer, Brown acknowledged that he could not always recall exact dates of milestones in the creation of his novel.

Both books explore theories — dismissed by theologians — that Mary Magdalene was not a prostitute but Jesus' wife, the couple had a child and the bloodline survives.

"I cannot possibly tell you the precise date I learned that Mary Magdalene was not a prostitute," Brown told Jonathan Rayner James, a lawyer for the plaintiffs.

Baigent and Leigh are suing "Da Vinci Code" publisher Random House for copyright infringement, claiming Brown "appropriated the architecture" of their 1982 nonfiction book "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail."

If the writers succeed in securing an injunction to bar the use of their material, they could hold up the scheduled May 19 film release of "The Da Vinci Code," starring Tom Hanks and Audrey Tautou.

Random House lawyers argue that the ideas in dispute are so general they are not protected by copyright. They also say many of the ideas in "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail" do not feature in Brown's novel, which follows the fictional professor Robert Langdon as he investigates the murder of an elderly member of an ancient society that guards dark secrets about the story of Jesus and the quest for the Holy Grail.

In his 69-page witness statement, Brown acknowledged reading Baigent's and Leigh's book while he was writing "The Da Vinci Code" — along with 38 other books and more than 300 documents submitted as evidence to the court.

He said the writers' work "was not a crucial or important text in the creation of the framework of 'The Da Vinci Code.'

"I'd never heard of it until I'd seen it mentioned in some of our other research books," he said.

Brown said he had fully acknowledged his debt to the two authors by having a character in "The Da Vinci Code" refer to the earlier book and its theories.

He even named a character Sir Leigh Teabing — an anagram of Baigent and Leigh.

"Over the past 10 years I have placed in my novels the names of more than two dozen close friends and family," Brown said. "The names I chose are always those of people I care for or respect."

Other authors whose works he mentioned had sent letters of thanks, Brown said. But the plaintiffs had made allegations which contain "numerous sweeping statements which seem to me to be completely fanciful."

The author, who usually shuns the spotlight, has traveled from his home in Exeter, N.H., to give evidence in the case. His statement and testimony provided tantalizing glimpses of his pre-'Da Vinci' life — from pupil at exclusive New England prep school Phillips Exeter Academy to semi-successful Los Angeles songwriter.

It also revealed a complex and wide-ranging research process undertaken with his wife, whose interest in "the sacred feminine," Brown said, led to one of "The Da Vinci Code's" key themes.

Brown appeared composed on the stand, only occasionally showing traces of impatience with Rayner James' forensic questioning about documents and dates.

"It's as if you've asked me to go back five years or 10 years and asked me not only what I got for Christmas, but what order I opened the presents," he said.

Brown is due to continue his testimony on Tuesday.

The third author of "The Holy Blood and the Holy Grail," Henry Lincoln, is not involved in the case. A lawyer for the plaintiffs, Paul Sutton, refused to say why he was not participating.

Lincoln, who is in his 70s and reportedly in poor health, could not be reached for comment.

Actress Maureen Stapleton dies of chronic lung disease at 80

By Adam Gorlick
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD — Maureen Stapleton, an Oscar-winning character actress whose subtle vulnerability and down-to-earth toughness earned her dramatic and comedic roles on stage, screen and television, died Monday. She was 80.

The longtime smoker died from chronic pulmonary disease in the Berkshire hills town of Lenox, where she had been living, said her son, Daniel Allentuck.

Stapleton, whose unremarkable, matronly appearance belied her star personality and talent, won an Academy Award in 1981 for her supporting role as anarchist-writer Emma Goldman in Warren Beatty's "Reds," about a left-wing American journalist who journeys to Russia to cover the Bolshevik Revolution.

To prepare for the role, Stapleton said she tried reading Goldman's autobiography, but soon chucked it out of boredom.

"There are many roads to good acting," Stapleton, known for her straightforwardness, said in her 1995 autobiography, "Hell of a Life." "I've been asked repeatedly what the 'key' to acting is, and as far as I'm concerned, the main thing is to keep the audience awake."

Stapleton was nominated several times for a supporting actress Oscar, including for her first film role in 1958's "Lonelyhearts", "Airport" in 1970; and Woody Allen's "Interiors" in 1978.

In television, she earned an Emmy for "Among the Paths to Eden" in 1967. She was nominated for "Queen of the Stardust Ballroom" in 1975; "The Gathering" in 1977; and "Miss Rose White" in 1992.

After moving to the Berkshires, Stapleton was a regular at the Candlelight Inn, a favorite gathering spot for actors that has since closed, said Elizabeth Aspenlieder, an actress with the Lenox-based Shakespeare & Co. acting group.

"Maureen would be sitting at the bar, ferociously playing charades," said Aspenlieder, who remembered Stapleton as a fun-loving eccentric who would often be seen wearing a housedress and pair of furry boots.

"She was always warm and inviting," Aspenlieder said.

Brought up in a strict Irish Catholic family with an alcoholic father, Stapleton left home in Troy, N.Y., right after high school. With $100 to her name, she came to New York and began studying at the Herbert Berghof Acting School and later at the Actor's Studio, which turned out the likes of Marlon Brando, Paul Newman and Julia Roberts.

Stapleton soon made her Broadway debut in Burgess Meredith's 1946 production of "The Playboy of the Western World."

At age 24, she became a success as Serafina Delle Rose in Tennessee Williams' Broadway hit "The Rose Tattoo," and won a Tony Award. She appeared in numerous other stage productions, including Lillian Hellman's "Toys in the Attic" and Neil Simon's "The Gingerbread Lady," for which she won her second Tony in 1971.

She starred opposite Laurence Olivier in Williams' "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof." Stapleton's friendship with Williams was well-known and he wrote three plays for her, but she never appeared in any of them.

Along the way, she led a chaotic personal life, which her autobiography candidly described as including two failed marriages, numerous affairs, years of alcohol abuse and erratic parenting for her two children.

She often said auditioning was hard for her, but that it was just a part of acting, a job "that pays."

"When I was first in New York there was a girl who wanted to play 'St. Joan' to the point where it was scary. ... I thought 'Don't ever want anything that bad," she recalled. "Just take what you get and like it while you do it, and forget it."

Cast throughout her career in supporting roles, Stapleton was content not playing a lead character, Allentuck said.

"I don't think she ever had unrealistic aspirations about her career," he said.

Beside Allentuck, Stapleton is survived by a daughter, Katharine Bambery, of Lenox and a brother, Jack Stapleton, of Troy, N.Y.

Academy Award winning actress Maureen Stapleton died yesterday in her Massachusetts home.

The (punk) song remains the same for many aging bands

By Ben Weiser
The Orange County Register

It's been four years since X's punk goddess Exene Cervenka launched her Original Sinners project, so it should come as little surprise that the band's lineup has been completely revamped for its second album, "Sev7en," which arrived Tuesday. Only guitarist, co-producer and occasional duet vocalist Jason Edge remains now, with new players Dan Sabella (guitar), Chris Powers (bass) and Kevin O'Connor (drums) filling out the sound now.

Not that anyone but the band and its friends can tell the difference between the original Original Sinners and these new devils. The only noticeable changes I spot are less of a reliance on cow-punk twang (which is arguably a good thing) and less bite and wit and depth to Exene's lyrics (which is surprising). Too often she seems like a hollow shell of herself. I wouldn't describe her vocals or concepts as complacent — she'll never be that — but her fury seems forced and her sad ruminations and strong social convictions don't sting like they usually do.

That said, musically "Sev7en" is as close as any post-X album has come to sounding like the genuine article. It's downright eerie, actually, how much Edge and Exene can replicate those old off-kilter collision harmonies she once concocted with John Doe, and the brisk pace and rockabilly flourishes superbly recapture the feel of "Los Angeles" and "Wild Gift," even if Billy Zoom's signature riffs and solos are sorely missed.

But such similarity once again begs the question: Seeing as X turns up every six months or so to play more gigs, why don't they finally make a new album? What's the hold-up here? Doe has issued several first-rate solo albums, and despite some lyrical clinkers here Exene is still at the top of her game. What's keeping them from working together on fresh material? Don't they see any hypocrisy in being anti-nostalgia groundbreakers who now profit mostly from peddling the past?

As proof that dusting off old formulas can work, however, I'd direct Exene (and any punk fans, young or old) to the Buzzcocks' latest, "Flat-Pack Philosophy." Technically it's the fifth album the speedy Manchester pop-punk originators have put out since initially reuniting in 1989, but the reality is that the quartet didn't regain its potency and melodic acumen until 2003's self-titled effort, the bulk of which ranks among its best work ever. "Flat-Pack Philosophy" isn't quite as revelatory; it's hard to keep reinventing this rather limited wheel. But there is slight progress here.

For starters, the tempos aren't quite so amphetamine-crazy anymore, which suits their age and places many of these society-wary and romantically forlorn ditties in the realm of early Offspring, yet Pete Shelley's vocals retain a youthful zest and angst that, er, offspring half his age aren't capable of. What's more, few of the tunes sound recycled or formulaic; if they regurgitate anything, it's only the Buzzcocks' rarely-duplicated power-pop fuzz stamp and catchy, veddy-English oh-oh-oh hooks, classicist approaches that hold up better than anything the '90s belched up.

In fact, the one heartening thing I've taken away from newcomers like the Academy Is ... and Panic! At the Disco and such is that they've started a trend toward downplaying the punk and playing up the pop — and without resorting too much to what their immediate forbears set forth. If anything, they hark back to the heyday of '70s piano-based softies — like Todd Rundgren with a lot more whine.

The Buzzcocks are nothing like that, of course, but they also never lapse into brain-numbing riffing or barked choruses devoid of panache. The Adolescents and TSOL and the Vandals and NOFX have managed the same in recent years, delivering energetic platters that actually sport hummable, meaningful songs. If only X — and the Damned, for the matter — would follow suit. After all, as almost every album in their catalog proves, when Exene, Doe, Zoom and DJ Bonebrake put their minds to crafting something fresh and lasting, it typically comes off head and shoulders above the rest.

"He's been great so far. He's stepped up," senior attacker Sean Morris said. "He's a leader on the team [Schneider] being this successful doesn't really surprise any of us because he puts everything he has into it."

The Minuteman offensive attack has helped take some pressure off of Schneider, averaging 12.3 goals per game, and Morris has spearheaded the attack. The All-American leads the nation in scoring with 6.7 points per game, and on Saturday he will be joined on the field by his closest competitor, Albany's Frank Resciaris, whose 5.3 points per game average is second in the country.

UMass coach Greg Cannella expects Resciaris and his offensive counterparts to come into Amherst feeling confident.

"Albany is an excellent team," Cannella said. "They're very well-coached on both ends of the field. They have an offensive group that is excellent. It's a dangerous group that has a lot of experience in winning and playing in big games. They've had success here at UMass, and they've had some success against us in the past couple of years, so they're going to come in with that same feeling of confidence."

Another challenge the Great Danes pose is goalie Brett Queener. The junior net-minder is unusually active, as he often will make a save and then advance the ball the length of the field himself. This style has caught some opponents off-guard and resulted in Queener recording goals on the only two shots he has attempted this season.

While the team has had only one day to work on how to combat this, Morris feels the best way to negate Queener's offensive ability is to keep the pressure on him.

"It's up to us to attack and keep him on his side of the field," Morris said. "He's definitely going to be an interesting match-up – he's not like anything we've seen before, so we're going to have to make on-the-fly adjustments."

Junior midfielder Andrew Recchione started 14 games for the Minutemen last season, and scored a goal in last year's first-round win over Syracuse.

Tough schedule is potent test for UMass

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Over the next 11 days, the No. 7 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (3-0) will have to take on more than just a few different opponents on the field. These 11 days will also prove to be a huge endurance test for the Minutemen.

After having a full week off to rest up for its first three contests, UMass will take on Albany (1-2) today at 3 p.m. at Garber Field, three days after beating Harvard 12-7, also at Garber. The Minutemen are in the middle of a 15-day stretch in which they will play five games.

UMass coach Greg Cannella is about to find out if his team can maintain the necessary intensity that is needed to be successful during a short stretch with a compacted schedule.

"It really depends on your team, and we're going to see [today] how this team is able to handle it," Cannella said. "This is the first time we do it so how can we handle it? Some teams that we've coached here have handled it fine. Other teams that we've coached here haven't handled it well at all, they haven't been able to match that intensity that they had on Saturday. We'll find out [today]."

Brett Garber, a junior midfielder, likes his team's chances because of their preparation during the fall and winter months leading up to the season.

"We prepare very well in the off-season," Garber said. "We play games. We do a lot of running and training, and for the past four weeks, we've done a lot of conditioning so I feel like it's really given us an advantage in a time like this when we have to play five games in a short amount of time."

"This is what we work out and condition for, so we're ready for moments like this," freshman goalie Doc Schneider echoed. "This is what you work hard for so you've just got to be ready to go no matter what."

In a normal week in which the Minutemen have from Saturday to Saturday to prepare for an opponent, the players have Sunday off, focus on their game on Monday and then center their attention on their opponent from there on out. This week, though, Cannella gave his players Sunday off while the coaches watched Albany game tapes, and they got back on the field for a Great Dane cram session yesterday.

"It's going to be tough just getting all of the X's and O's ready, getting our scouting reports right and keeping guys mentally focused," All-American Sean Morris said. "Physically, it's tough because guys get nicked up so we're just trying to go easy over the two days."

"It's different," Cannella said. "Your intensity level is so high on a Saturday to play that game that it usually takes a couple days to get that feeling of intensity back. You're usually pretty exhausted on Sunday and Monday. But as I told our guys, 'You can't feel that way. You're 18 to 22 years old, and you've got to rest up and stay off your feet as much as you can from Saturday night until [today] at 3 o'clock.'"

Freshman Jim Connolly is the third member of his family to play for UMass lacrosse. His father captained the team in 1969.

and it is difficult to tell if the photo was even taken during a game at all. Darren Flutie was wearing his home jersey, but with two visible fans in the stands behind him. It looked very much like it was taken during practice.

Also in the e-mail, Cameron stated, "Mr. Howe apparently noticed the ball in our trophy case while attending BC's 29-7 win over UMass this past October. While I'm sure he was disappointed in the outcome of the game, I'm not sure what Mr. Howe's personal motivation is for pursuing this story. ... I'm sure Mr. Howe's first priority, though, is to report truthful and accurate information."

In fact, I saw the ball after UMass tied BC 3-3 in hockey, not following a football game – though I did indeed cover that football game earlier in the year.

Also, my motivation behind this story was to peak the interest of those who decided to read it, and here were the facts I reported: I saw the ball at Conte Forum, and I got statements from Wilson and the NCAA, which both believed – but could not positively confirm – the NFL ball wouldn't have been used in a collegiate game.

At no time did I accuse the Boston College athletic department – which is of the most highly respected athletic departments in the country – of displaying a fake ball, though Cameron was overly defensive when I attempted to give him an opportunity to give his side, which was one of the first things that struck me during our conversations.

If I were to present a one-sided story, I wouldn't have gone to such measures to get a statement from Boston College and would have hung up the phone once Cameron began to harass me. But a story without both sides isn't a good story, so I kept plugging away, regardless of the verbal assault I continued to endure.

Cameron also made this request in the email to my superiors.

"Frankly, instead of a newspaper story, I feel he should be writing us an apology," Cameron wrote.

I didn't feel as though I owed anyone an apology, but I didn't run the story for the sole purpose of escaping from the harassment I continued to receive from these multiple angles.

It's been eating away at me for the last year, though. I knew I had a story to tell, but it was a difficult situation to handle – until a couple months ago.

I returned to Conte Forum on Jan. 20 to cover a hockey game between BC and Vermont. After the Eagles skated off the ice with a 2-0 victory and Jerry York finished addressing the media, I took one last stroll through the building and visited the trophy case that got this whole thing started.

A funny thing happened.

The ball wasn't there.

Hawkins wins the individual skiing title

down [safely], but she tried to make that turn," Rouleau said. "She really sacrificed herself for UMass on that run.

"They both gave one hundred percent that day, and what else could you ask for as a coach?"

Friday's slalom races marked an improvement for the Minutewomen as a team. Although their best finish was Hawkins in fifth place, Collin and Mains recovered from their falls to finish 19th, and 25th, respectively, to round out the top-3. The Maroon and White earned fifth overall in the slalom.

Hawkins' elder brother Rush, last year's outright men's champion, could not repeat last year's feat of winning both the slalom and giant slalom races.

Hawkins did lead the Minutemen, however, to strong showings in both races, as the Maroon and White finished fifth as a team in the giant slalom and sixth in the slalom.

Individually, Hawkins led UMass with a pair of eighth place finishes. Considering the fact that he is coming off a sweep of the Eastern Collegiate Ski Conference regionals just a week before, Hawkins' performance does not look as bad, yet he was still expecting more.

"I'm pretty disappointed," Hawkins said. "I wasn't happy with any of my runs all week."

Rouleau pointed out that more foreign competitors were in this year's field.

"[Hawkins] held his own," Rouleau said. "He was skiing against a lot of European racers in their mid- to late-twenties who have World Cup experience that were competing for the west coast teams, so I'm pretty proud of how he did."

Hawkins has been suffering from a lingering knee injury all season. He is scheduled to have surgery in April, but chose to continue skiing with the ailment.

"[The knee] was really bothering me the day before the giant slalom," Hawkins said.

ECSC MVP runner-up Jason Small also had a rough time on the slopes. He finished 16th in the giant slalom, but was 44th in the slalom, and was not one of UMass' top three skiers.

Freshman Alex Zahoruiko finished 25th in the slalom and 29th in the giant slalom for the Minutemen, and was part of the top three for both events.

Senior Pat Bachant 14th in the giant slalom to help UMass to a fifth place finish.

Eliza Hawkins will be competing in the same event, the U.S. Championships that her brother competed in last year, so going into the event, the sophomore will have some exposure to an event of this magnitude before she races.

"I'm just going to go in with no expectations," Hawkins said. "I'll be starting dead last, so I really can only hope to improve."

Hawkins will be one of 50 female skiers racing at the multi-day event that include not only slalom and giant slalom, but downhill and super G, which are Olympic events.

However, Hawkins, who has only ever competed in the slalom and giant slalom, will only race in those events which she has experience in.

The event will take place at Sugarloaf, Maine, where the USCSA Nationals were held last week.

University of Mass

Dear Campus Community and Friends,

Today, through one simple act, you can join an effort that is defined by passion, intensity and spirit.

We have the opportunity to raise considerable scholarship funds for students attending the University of Massachusetts Amherst, and I am asking you to add your energy to this effort and join us. Below this letter, you will find a link with information about purchasing a UMass Amherst license plate, with all proceeds going directly into a scholarship fund for our students.

In the coming weeks, our campus promotional effort will be supported by a number of Isenberg School of Management students that will serve as our campus sales team. This group of seventy-five students will have a very visible presence and can be easily identified by their "Ride with Pride" T-shirts, bright smiles, and engaging personalities. Our stellar sales team will organize sales promotional efforts at special events, receptions, and open houses and at many other campus activities: they are trained and eager; they are skilled and savvy; they are collegial and determined; they are focused and competitive; they will ask for your license plate commitment!

I have purchased my UMass Amherst license plate and ask that you join us and purchase one or more plates today. By investing in our students, we are realizing the greatest return possible – student scholars.

Thank you. I look forward to seeing you on the road.
GO UMASS!

Sincerely,

Michael Gargano, Ed.D
Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life

UM preps for Great Danes

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

With a 20-10 record during the past two seasons, very few opponents have been able to enjoy success at the expense of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team. The exception has been the Albany Great Danes, who beat UMass 10-9 last season and won 11-10 two years ago at Garber Field.

That loss in 2004 marks the last time the No. 7 Minutemen (3-0) have lost at home, and they will be looking to extend their 13-game winning streak at Garber – and exact a little revenge for the recent past – when they host No. 18 Albany (1-2) today at 3 p.m.

"This game means a lot to us," junior midfielder Brett Garber said. "Every game means a lot to us, but we want this game real bad. They beat us here two years ago on our own turf. They own our turf and we have to get it back from them. Right now it's the biggest game of the season for us. That's the way we're looking at it."

Being a freshman, goalie Doc Schneider obviously wasn't between the pipes in either of the two losses to Albany, but he is well aware of how much this game means to his veteran teammates.

"I know they beat us twice in a row, so a lot of guys on the team haven't beaten them before," Schneider said. "We're definitely going to come out fired up. They're a good team like every team we play, so we just have to handle it like every game."

Schneider will need to continue his solid play in goal in order for UMass to be victorious today, as he has held opponents to 8.3 goals per game this season. A big reason for Schneider's success has been his ability to assume a leadership role despite his freshman status.

Junior Mike Sciamanna and the Minutemen take on the Albany Great Danes today at 3 p.m. at Garber Field. The Great Danes beat UMass 11-10 at Garber Field in 2004, which was the last home loss for the Minutemen.

Finding the truth behind the Flutie ball

Jeff Howe

This is a story that began about 16 months ago, but it came to an apex last February.

I've sat on it for a little more than a year now, knowing the story I'm about to tell is one that people would want to hear, but I never printed it. I just couldn't figure out why.

I'm a sports writer, so it's my responsibility to the reader to share any sports related story I happen to stumble across, regardless of who I might anger.

So here it is, straight down the middle, exactly how it happened.

On Nov. 12, 2004, I sat in the Conte Forum press box for a hockey game between UMass and Boston College, the top-ranked team in the country at the time. At one point during the night, a fellow Collegian writer told me about the BC trophy case sitting behind one of the student sections. He mentioned something interesting about a certain football in the case.

You know the football. Doug Flutie chucked it 48 yards to Gerard Phelan during the last play of the game between BC and No. 1 Miami on Nov. 23, 1984. It was a historic upset, and that play is considered by many to be the all-time greatest six seconds in college football history.

But maybe you don't know the football.

There was something strange about that ball as it sat there in the Conte Forum case. For one, I didn't understand why this ball, which would have been used in a collegiate game, would have an "NFL" insignia on it. To say the least, it peaked my curiosity.

I grew up about a half-hour north of Boston so I'm very aware of Flutie and what his name means to Boston College, the school's fans and the school's alumni. I know what he means to the people in the Boston area who were just simply in front of their television sets for that 47-45 Miracle in Miami. I even have friends whose parents have shrines of Flutie in their homes. In the words of Ron Burgundy, Doug Flutie was kind of a big deal.

I needed some kind of an answer; as a journalist and as a sports fan in general. So I started to make some phone calls – first to the NCAA and then to Wilson Sporting Goods, the company that manufactured the ball in question.

I spoke with Lisa Douglass, who worked in the NCAA archives department, on several occasions. She couldn't prove to me whether or not the NCAA used that type of ball during that particular game or even in the 1984 season in general.

When I talked to her the last time, I asked her straight forward if she thought an NFL ball would have been used in that game, and she gave me a straightforward answer.

"I doubt it," Douglass said.

OK, so the NCAA couldn't give me a definitive answer, but I still had Wilson to go to. I spoke with a company executive, Ted Kochowicz, several different times over the course of a few weeks. He tried tracking down shipping receipts from 1984, but later told me that Wilson's records didn't date back that far.

Kochowicz, like Andrews, couldn't offer me any solid evidence to prove one way or the other if the ball could have been used in that game, but he did provide one very good point.

"I'm almost 100 percent certain they wouldn't use the NFL ball," Kochowicz said. "I spoke to the football marketing director, and he strongly doubts it because the NCAA ball is smaller than the NFL ball. The pebble pattern is different. The science is different. The collegiate ball is narrower and thinner around the middle."

With that, I had two calls left to make; first, to the University of Miami, which gave me absolutely no help at all, and then to Boston College to hear its side of the story.

All I wanted was a simple statement from that end, but I guess I was a little too naïve to know what would happen.

BC athletic director Gene DeFillipo simply stated, "I don't know anything about that," but it was sports information director Chris Cameron who seemed to take the most offense to my allegations that the ball may not be the real one from Nov. 23, 1984.

He argued with me, insulted my integrity as a journalist and seemed completely unwilling to present his side of the case in a level-headed manner. After explaining to him that all I was looking for was a simple statement, he provided me with this.

"Your story is totally, 100 percent erroneous," Cameron began. "The ball in the trophy case was donated by Gerard Phelan, who kept the ball after the game and donated it to BC. ... We have many action photos from that season in our archives that show the Wilson NFL insignia on the side of the ball."

After that, I told Cameron all he needed to do was provide me with a photo from the game in Miami that would show the NFL logo on the ball, and the story would be squashed completely.

But he couldn't.

Instead, he sent an e-mail to my editor-in-chief, managing editor and sports editor – in short, all three of my bosses. The e-mail, which was also carbon copied to UMass athletic director John McCutcheon and Chancellor John Lombardi, among others, contained a photo of Darren Flutie – Doug's brother – carrying a football that was indeed made by Wilson and also had the NFL insignia on it.

But it wasn't a photo from the game in Miami,

Grades for 2005-06 men's basketball team

Rob Greenfield

The Massachusetts men's basketball team finished the 2006 season last week with a 75-66 loss to the Xavier Musketeers at US Bank Arena in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament. This was the Minutemen's first campaign under coach Travis Ford, the 36-year-old Kentucky alum who took the UMass reigns after five years as the Eastern Kentucky head man.

It was a tumultuous season for the Minutemen, filled with many sets of twists and turns. Maurice Maxwell, who was assuming the point guard duties from Anthony Anderson, was suspended indefinitely for academic reasons and did not return. Art Bowers transferred at the beginning of the season. Both junior captains – Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme – encountered personal issues off of the court. Freshman Chris Lowe played over 35 minutes per game because of UMass' lack of depth.

The Minutemen finished with 12 wins, four fewer than 2005, but many would consider this season a success in light of the speed bumps UMass hit along the way. Here are the grades for this year's team.

Offense: C

The Minutemen struggled mightily on the offensive end. Freeman led the team in scoring with 13.9 points per game, but the junior lefty wasn't a reliable force on the block. His teammates either didn't feel comfortable giving him the ball come crunch time, or they simply couldn't get it to him. Although he works extremely hard and deserves all of the accolades that come his way, Freeman was not a go-to guy for the Minutemen this season. He got most of his points off of offensive rebounds or by being in the right place at the right time, but rarely did Freeman dominate in one-on-one situations.

When junior James Life was hot, he couldn't miss. But when he went cold it seemed like he couldn't throw it in the ocean. Life averaged 10.8 points per game and shot 29 percent from three-point land. Some of his shots were ill-advised (like taking pull-up 3-pointers on fast breaks with a man advantage) but when the offense struggled like it did, Ford had to get points wherever he could find them.

Lasme is as good a finisher as there is in the A-10, and he displayed his superior athletic ability on several occasions this season. But Lasme struggled in one-on-one situations. Maybe he hasn't had the opportunity to display his abilities, but Lasme didn't have a consistent offense when he was on the interior. Like Freeman, he got most of his points through offensive rebounding and off of dribble penetration by the guards.

Defense: B-

With Lasme hanging around the paint, any team can be great defensively. The big man finished the season averaging 3.9 blocks per game, good for third in the nation. Like Ford said many times during the season, Lasme's presence lulled Lowe and Life into a false sense of security on the perimeter. While Lasme made sure every shot was contested, the Minuteman perimeter defense was sub-par. Both Lowe and Life had trouble containing opposing guards, and the whole defense broke down when dribble penetration was allowed. Luckily for the guards, Lasme was there to block and alter shots, but the perimeter defense needs to improve if UMass wants to win the A-10 next season.

Rebounding: A

UMass was the best rebounding team in the conference. Lasme and Freeman made sure of it. The two big men cleaned up the glass almost every night, and Freeman prides himself on his ability to rebound the basketball. Lasme averaged 6.9 boards per game this season and Freeman averaged 9.3 per game. With that duo on the court, no one rebounded better than the Minutemen this season.

Coaching: B+

When your freshman point guard is playing over 35 minutes a game, you know you're in trouble. Ford had to deal with many obstacles in his first season at the helm. Maxwell left, Bowers left, and Lowe — a guard with no college experience — was running the offense from the start. With a seven-man rotation, the players' legs were gone quickly and Ford might have had to go easier than he would have liked.

The real test for Ford will be his recruiting classes. Will he be able to bring in enough talent to win? Many basketball aficionados say that 99 percent of a college basketball coach's job happens off of the basketball court. We'll see if Ford can bring in the big guns.

Hawkins becomes first US Nationals champion in 10 years

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

Last week the Massachusetts Ski team repeated last year's feat, as a Hawkins became the individual champion at the United States Collegiate Ski and Snowboard Association Nationals.

The 2005 season finished with sophomore Rush Hawkins sweeping the USCSA Nationals and earning the individual crown. He was the first American to do so in 10 years.

This year it was sister Eliza's turn. The sophomore placed second in the giant slalom and fifth in the slalom. Her times were good enough to place her first overall at the Nationals for the women's division as she led the Minutewomen to fifth place overall.

As the faster American woman on the slopes, Hawkins was invited to the U.S. ski championships, also at Sugarloaf, on March 22. She will be racing against members of the U.S. ski team, including Olympian and gold medalist Julia Mancuso.

"It still hasn't really registered," Hawkins said. "Someone asked me who won the Nationals, and I had to think for second before I realized, 'Oh yeah, it was me.'"

The victory is a huge improvement over Hawkins' results last year as a freshman, where she struggled on the slopes while fighting off an illness at the same time.

"I lost 15 pounds before Nationals last year, so I went in with no expectations," Hawkins said. She also credits her win to the added experience of being there the year before.

"This year I knew what to expect. Last year I was just a freshman and had no idea what to expect going in," she said.

The USCSA Nationals went on all week, and included not only alpine skiing events, but cross-country skiing and snowboarding events as well.

The first alpine ski race, the women's giant slalom, took place Wednesday on a very icy course. Hawkins was second after the first run, but was nearly a full second behind the leader. After the break, she just missed catching first place, as she won the second won outright. She finished just .12 seconds out of first.

"She was on fire. It was like she could do no wrong," UMass coach Justin Rouleau said. "She was loose and relaxed. You could see the confidence in her stance. You could almost smell it in the air."

Senior Lisbet Rauh finished in 22nd place, and freshman Amanda Lea was 61st, completing the top three for the Minutewomen. The team finished 8th overall in the giant slalom.

Seniors Shaleighne Collins and Erica Mains both fell hard during the giant slalom, knocking them out of the competition.

Collins fell just three gates from the finish line in her first run. She was on pace for one of her best times as a skier. "I barely recognized her out there, she was going so fast," Rouleau said. "She was going for something else that day, and it just didn't happen for her."

Mains fell in her second run, and crashing head-first into the protective netting at the outskirts of the course.

"She probably could have just stood up and slowed

Chaney retires after 24 years

By Dan Gelston
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA – John Chaney's scowl was gone, the dark, deep-set eyes concealed behind sunglasses.

The raspy voice, which has boomed to the upper deck of many arenas, was hushed. It was perhaps one final, subdued look at a Hall of Fame basketball coach who realized it was time to leave Temple.

This was indeed a different Chaney.

"Excuse me while I disappear," Chaney said, his shirt unbuttoned and his unraveled tie draped over his shoulders.

With those words, Chaney left the podium Monday and retired after 24 seasons, ending a career of fatherly, off-the-court mentoring that was sometimes overshadowed by a temper that got the better of him.

"It's always a very traumatic time, but it is time," Chaney said. "Temple gave me a chance to make my own decision and that's the great thing about it. Right now I'm faced with another problem with my wife, so it's the right time to go."

Chaney will not coach the Owls' opening NIT game against Akron on Tuesday night because his wife was scheduled to undergo a procedure for an undisclosed health problem. Assistant Dan Leibovitz will take his place, and it was not clear if Chaney would return to the bench if Temple won.

The 74-year-old Chaney guided Temple to 17 NCAA tournament appearances, including five NCAA regional finals – where he went 0-5 and never made the Final Four. He was twice named national coach of the year and entered the Hall of Fame in 2001.

This season, Temple (17-14) made the NIT for the fifth straight season, a dramatic decline for a team that was once an NCAA tournament regular.

In typical Chaney fashion, Monday was no ordinary goodbye. Flanked by former and current players and coaches, Chaney wove his life story around amusing anecdotes about his friend Bill Cosby, a playful threat to slap the mayor, and several pokes at school administration.

Chaney also wiped away tears from behind his sunglasses and talked at length about a favorite subject – education's role in helping the poor and disadvantaged.

"I'm going to be mean and ornery when I see something that's wrong and I'm going to try and right it," Chaney said.

Chaney has 741 wins as a college coach, including a 516-252 record at Temple, where he won seven Atlantic 10 conference titles. His teams did remarkably well considering Chaney couldn't recruit the high school All-Americans who filled the rosters of the power conferences.

Only Bob Knight, Eddie Sutton, Lute Olson, and Mike Krzyzewski are the active coaches with more career victories.

Chaney was a commanding figure on the court – restless, cranky, his otherwise natty clothes in shambles by the end of the game. Often, as he exhorted his team, he put himself in situations he later regretted.

Last season, Chaney seemed on his way out.

He inserted a player he called a "goon" into a game against Saint Joseph's for the sole purpose of committing hard fouls because he thought the Hawks were using illegal screens. A Saint Joseph's player, John Bryant, ended up with a broken arm after being knocked out of the air. Chaney later apologized and was suspended for five games.

In 1984, Chaney grabbed George Washington coach Gerry Gimelstob by the shoulders at half-time of a game. In 1994, he had a heated exchange following a game against UMass in which he threatened to kill coach John Calipari. Chaney apologized and was suspended for a game. The two later became friends.

While Temple president David Adamany joked Chaney "gave me heartburn every three or four months," Owls guard Mardy Collins said it was a mistake to focus on Chaney's outrageous actions.

"Those little incidents don't measure up to the things he's done here at Temple," Collins said.

Collins has one last chance to give Chaney a championship, even if it is the NIT and Leibovitz is coaching. Leibovitz, who's spent 10 years as a Temple assistant and coached the Owls last season during Chaney's suspension, wished Chaney could have had a better send-off.

"It's just regretful we couldn't get to the tournament one last time," he said. "We put everything we had into it. I may never forgive myself for not getting him back in."

Judiciary Board files petition against 'Change'

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

In filing a petition to the Student Judiciary Board, President of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association Pavel Payano has encountered harsh criticism from supporters of controversial Web site changesga.com.

The petition, filed on March 8, states that on Sunday, March 5, a number of witnesses, including Payano, noticed Senator Sean McNair, Senator Jenn Kennedy and former Area Governor John Williams placing materials on bulletin boards in the Student Union.

According to the petition, the posting and publicizing of those materials acting directly against the SGA constitution and by-laws.

"This material presented fallacious and inappropriate claims against fellow SGA members and advertised a forum (changesga.com) which elaborated upon those claims. Furthermore, the respondents did so knowingly, as evidenced by revised versions of their material."

"Change/SGA" members, who later stated their support for Shawn Robinson as President and John Williams for Student Trustee, contend that because the Web site had failed to specifically nominate a candidate at that time, there is no violation of the SGA by-laws.

"The 'change' Web site, which called for SGA reform and criticized the current student leadership for failing to accomplish most of their campaign promises, was legal under SGA rules and protected by the first amendment," said Kennedy.

According to Payano, if the "Change/SGA" supporters are

E-mails and accusations invade SGA

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

Some students running for the presidential and trustee positions on the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association threatened some SGA members with lawsuits early Tuesday as allegations surfaced that four candidates took part in illegal campaigning.

Angry e-mails and formal complaints were filed after members of the Sean Robinson for President and John Williams for Trustee campaign alleged that members of two other campaigns hung illegal banners to gain votes, among other violations.

Information surfaced at the SGA's Student Union offices around midnight that presidential candidate Rob Shepherd and trustee candidate Ed Cutting, and presidential candidate Michael Makarski and trustee candidate Matthew Fox would be thrown out of the now-heated race.

Around the time of the debates, information surfaced that banners that supported the Makarski-Fox ticket were allegedly hung outside the Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity.

Due to certain SGA election by-laws, campaign materials, such as posters and stickers, can only be produced by Campus Design and Copy, a student-run business located in the Student Union. Because the business does not produce large banners, none can be used in the SGA elections.

Students to research Katrina damage in Gulf Coast

By Anna Doulantis
Collegian Staff

While most university students have booked their plane tickets to Cancun or Miami, five University of Massachusetts students, along with their teaching assistant, are heading to the Gulf Coast to witness the devastation left in the wake of the hurricanes of this past season.

Jennifer Bonin, the teaching assistant for Geosci 250 Natural Disasters, taught by Sean Fitzgerald, will be leading the trip and will be accompanied by honors students Elaine Richardson, Jordan Stout, Catherine Stubbington, Michael Wilson and Jordan Veney.

The trip will take place during the week of Spring Break, March 17 to March 26. The stops on their itinerary include New Orleans, La., Jefferson Parish, La., Bay St. Louis, Miss., Waveland, Miss., Biloxi, Miss. and Cameron, La., which was devastated by Hurricane Rita.

Bonin, a graduate student in the department of Geological Sciences, spent two weeks in September 2005 researching the damage caused by Hurricane Katrina on the Gulf Coast.

"I wanted to return to New Orleans six months after the devastating hurricanes to show these folks that a TV screen cannot do justice to the immense scope of this true American tragedy," said Bonin.

Commenting on the current condition in which she expects to find the Gulf Coast, Bonin said, "Like it happened a week ago, minus the flooding and the press."

The group will photograph the damage, personally interview the victims, video record events and collect GIS Ground Verification data. Each person is responsible for a certain aspect of the research, and the group will collaborate with their documentation upon its return to the University.

"We are not scheduled to repair any damage, just research it," said Bonin.

Trip coordinator Jennifer Bonin expects herself and students to find the Hurricane-ravaged Gulf Coast as though "it happened a week ago, minus the flooding and the press."

Bonin organized the trip herself, and says that she was motivated by the look on a student's face when she first mentioned the possibility. Freshman Jordan Veney said, "Jennifer was joking around in class about going down to New Orleans for Spring Break. About a week later, Jen informed me that we got the money to go on the trip."

The trip is being fully funded by Commonwealth College and the Geosciences Department. The total cost of the trip will be $2,500, and the students will be responsible for "food and incidentals," said Bonin.

Also included in their trip will be a guided tour on a Bay St. Louis fire truck, and a special invitation by Harry Anderson for a comedy show at his French Quarter night-club, Oswald's Speakeasy, according to Bonin.

"The only reservation that I have about going on this trip involves the first and the last 28 hours. These are the critical driving hours but I think if we can make it past these hours without too many problems, the rest of the trip should be a piece of cake," said sophomore Jordan Stout. "Our professor took all of the people going to New Orleans on a four hour field trip just so we could all get acquainted. Let's just say that four hours in a car will all of us – you learn a lot about the people you are going to be staying with," added Veney.

A future career interest in natural disaster research and relief was not a requirement for the students.

"I want to dance after college and eventually teach high school physics, so this trip will probably not help me achieve those goals. I do, however, believe that I will learn invaluable lessons and gain much knowledge on the Gulf Coast," said Stout. "I am going on this trip to take myself outside my comfort zone and to better understand what's going on around me. I figure this is as great an opportunity as any to put myself into someone else's shoes and to join the millions of people who are helping with the Hurricane Katrina relief," added Veney.

Speaking about the future of the program, Bonin said, "Whenever I have the money and time I will go. I made friends there and I want to keep helping when I can." Bonin is also considering using the area as her focus in her future Ph.D. dissertation on what not to do in a natural disaster.

"I feel great about this," said Stout. "I think it is a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity and I am more than blessed to be joining this group."

"Many people I know are spending their break in different countries or at the beach or somewhere exotic. But I can't think of any better way to spend my vacation than helping people who are a lot less fortunate than I am," added Veney.

Upon returning from the Gulf Coast, the honors students will give a final presentation of their experience and research collected over the week, which will be open to the Geosciences Department, and the five students will also receive two honors credits.

Strong winds from Hurricane Katrina uprooted large trees and blew the shingles off of the house shown above.

SGA prepares for final day of voting

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association will be holding elections for president, student trustee and area governors today.

Commuter students can vote in the Campus Center Concourse and students can vote in the Worcester, Hampshire and Franklin dining commons. The polling tables will be open from 10:00 a.m. until 2:00 p.m. and from 5:00 p.m. until 8:00 p.m.

The election will be a culmination of several weeks' worth of preparations by the SGA and the candidates. Nominees for president and student trustee had to collect at least 250 student signatures to get their names on the ballots. Those running for area governors collected at least 100 signatures each.

Nominees then began their campaigns on March 9, passing out fliers and putting up posters in residence halls and in the Student Union.

Anyone with questions about the elections can contact Elections Commissioner Priyanka Pant at ppant@student.umass.edu.

Bulger's pension ruling appealed by Reilly

BOSTON – Attorney General Tom Reilly is appealing a Superior Court decision giving former University of Massachusetts President William Bulger a more generous retirement package than he was awarded by the state's pension system.

Reilly filed a motion with the state Appeals Court on Tuesday.

In November, Superior Court Judge Ernest Murphy ruled that Bulger's University-funded housing allowance and the contents of an investment fund should have been taken into account when his pension was calculated.

The ruling increased Bulger's annual pension by about $29,000, to $208,000.

In the appeal, Reilly's office argues that the University never treated the housing allowance as compensation, that it was instead a kind of reimbursement similar to travel expenses.

"To be 'compensation' the payment must be remuneration for work or services performed by him, not simply the value of something required to be used by him as part of his job," the appeal said.

Reilly said Bulger's pension should be based on pay, not perks.

"To include housing allowances and annuity payments in calculating his pension simply goes too far and sets a dangerous precedent for the Massachusetts public pension system," Reilly said in a written statement.

Bulger resigned under pressure in September 2003 after Reilly and Gov. Mitt Romney argued that he had not done enough to assist authorities in the search for his fugitive mobster brother, James "Whitey" Bulger.

Before he was UMass chief, Bulger was president of the state Senate.

Shepherd threatens lawsuit

com, was presented to the SGA Elections Commission by members of the Sean Robinson for President/ John Williams for Trustee campaign.

Makarski and Fox dispute the photo and have filed a formal complaint against Elections Commissioner Priyanka Pant and the entire Elections Commission.

"There's no time or date on that photo," Fox said to the Collegian early Tuesday morning.

"According title VIII section 24 point 2, banners as defined by the by-laws are legal means of campaigning," Makarski and Fox wrote yesterday in their formal complaint.

The more serious allegations also surfaced around midnight Tuesday morning, when claims were made by the Robinson/Williams campaign that presidential candidate Rob Shepherd and trustee candidate Ed Cutting also hung illegal banners on campus, used personal money to create the banner and created an unauthorized promotional Web site, all of which are against SGA by-laws.

SGA candidates are only given $120 from the Association to use for their campaigns. In addition, candidates may only use their personal Web site provided by UMass, which is part of the umass.edu domain, to publicize their campaign online.

In an angrily worded e-mail to President Pavel Payano and other prominent SGA members, Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano and editors of the Collegian, Cutting expressed his outrage at the allegations.

In all capital letters, Cutting wrote, in part, "I have a constitutional right to say anything I damn well please, to anyone whom I damn well please, and you do not have the right to tell me that I have to get your permission to do it."

Shepherd, in a separate e-mail sent mostly to the same individuals, threatened the Elections Commission and members of the Robinson/Williams campaign with a lawsuit.

He also said in his e-mail that he did not know of the allegations against him until he read about them Tuesday in a Collegian article.

Here is Shepherd's e-mail in its entirety:

"I am NOT a litigious person, however this is RIDICULOUS I am not speaking of the Civil Rights violation, but rather my specific case. I DID NOT EVEN KNOW ABOUT THIS SUPPOSED BANNER UNTIL I READ ABOUT IT IN THE COLLEGIAN THIS MORNING!!!!!

"I NEVER AUTHORIZED MY SUPPORTERS TO MAKE ANY BANNERS ETC. AND TOLD THEM SOLELY TO PUT UP CAMPAIGN FLYERS AND MAKE SURE THEY DO NOT RIP DOWN THOSE OF OTHER CAMPAIGNS!

"I followed the restrictions to a T. AND NOW WHAT???? I am being punished over something I DID NOT EVEN KNOW ABOUT UNTIL IT WAS RULED ON?

"THIS IS FING RIDICULOUS. HOW CAN I HONESTLY BE IN TROUBLE OVER SOMETHING THAT I DID NOT EVEN HAVE ANYTHING TO DO WITH!!!!!

Iraq edges closer to open civil warfare

By Steven R. Hurst
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — As Iraqi authorities discovered at least 87 corpses — men shot to death execution-style — Iraq edged closer to open civil warfare. Twenty-nine of the bodies, dressed only in underwear, were dug out of a single grave Tuesday in a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad. The bloodshed appeared to be retaliation for a bomb and mortar attack in the Sadr City slum that killed at least 58 people and wounded more than 200 two days earlier.

Iraq's Interior Minister Bayan Jabr, meanwhile, told The Associated Press security officials had foiled a plot that would have put hundreds of al-Qaida men at critical guard posts around Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone, home to the U.S. and other foreign embassies, as well as the Iraqi government.

A senior Defense Ministry official said the 421 al-Qaida fighters were recruited to storm the U.S. and British embassies and take hostages. Several ranking Defense Ministry officials have been jailed in the plot, said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information.

Police began unearthing bodies early Monday, although the discoveries were not immediately reported. The gruesome finds continued throughout the day Tuesday, police said, marking the second wave of sectarian retribution killings since bombers destroyed an important Shiite shrine last month.

In the mayhem after the golden dome atop the Askariya shrine in Samarra was destroyed on Feb. 22, more than 500 people have been killed, many of them Sunni Muslims and their clerics. Dozens of mosques were damaged or destroyed.

Underlining the vast unease in the capital, Interior Ministry officials announced another driving ban, from 8 p.m. Wednesday to 4 p.m. Thursday to protect against car and suicide bombs while the Iraqi parliament meets for the first session since the Dec. 15 election.

After the driving ban was announced, the Cabinet said Thursday would be a holiday in the capital, presumably because residents would not be able to get to work. Restrictions on movement also had been put in place on the two weekends after the Samarra bombing in an attempt to quell the violence.

The most gruesome find Tuesday — the 29 bodies dressed only in underwear — was made after police, acting on a tip, discovered an 18-by-24-foot grave in an empty field in Kamaliyah, a mostly Shiite east Baghdad suburb. Interior Ministry official Lt. Col. Falah al-Mohammedawi said. He estimated the victims were killed about three days ago, which would mean they died before the Sadr City attack Sunday evening.

Residents watched, some covering their eyes in horror, others offering scarves and newspapers to cover the bodies as they were pulled from the grave.

Uniformed Iraqi police guarded the site as members of a Shiite militia dug out the corpses.

An abandoned minibus containing 15 other bodies was found earlier on the main road between two mostly Sunni west Baghdad neighborhoods — not far from where another minibus containing 18 bodies was discovered last week, al-Mohammedawi said.

An Iraqi woman walks past the bodies of Iraqis killed during sectarian violence, at a hospital in Baghdad, Iraq Tuesday.

At least 40 more bodies were recovered elsewhere in Baghdad, in both Sunni and Shiite neighborhoods, al-Mohammedawi said. Police found three other corpses dumped in the northern city of Mosul.

Also Tuesday, the U.S. military reported the deaths of two more soldiers in fighting in Anbar province. The soldiers, assigned to the 2nd Brigade Combat Team of the 28th Infantry Division, Pennsylvania Army National Guard, were killed Monday, bringing the number of U.S. military members killed to at least 2,310 since the Iraq war started in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

Scores of frightened Shiite families have fled predominantly Sunni parts of Baghdad in recent weeks, some at gunpoint. More than 100 families arrived between Monday and Tuesday alone in Wasit province, in the southern Shiite heartland, said Haitham Ajaimi Manie, an official with the provisional migration directorate.

More than 300 Baghdad families — 1,818 people — have taken shelter in the province after fleeing the capital, he said.

North of the capital, a roadside bomb exploded Tuesday among Shiite pilgrims headed on foot to the holy city of Karbala, killing one person and wounding seven near Baqouba, police said.

The sectarian violence has complicated negotiations for Iraq's first permanent, post-invasion government. A caretaker government has been in charge since the December elections and U.S. and Iraqi officials fear the vacuum in authority has fueled the bloodshed.

Once parliament meets Thursday, it has 60 days under the new constitution to elect a president and approve the nomination of Shiite Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari and his Cabinet.

After members of all the major Iraqi political blocs met Tuesday with U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, no breakthrough was reported on solving the deadlock over the nomination of al-Jaafari to head a new government.

But in an interview with Fox television, U.S. Embassy Political Counselor Robert Ford seemed guardedly optimistic.

"They definitely made some progress forward. They have a ways to go. I can't say that we've had a breakthrough, but we had good talks today," Ford said.

But Iraqis in the meeting said the sides were still so far apart that major Sunni politicians were again pressing for the new constitution to be thrown out, despite its adoption late last summer and approval in a subsequent national plebiscite.

Miners' deaths due to lightning

By Vicki Smith
Associated Press

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. — An explosion that killed 12 workers at the Sago Mine likely was caused by a massive lightning strike that ignited methane gas in a sealed-off area, the mine's owner said Tuesday.

The company's own investigation turned up three pieces of compelling evidence of a lightning strike, all from 6:26 a.m. on Jan. 2, said Ben Hatfield, chief executive officer of International Coal Group Inc.

He said weather monitors confirmed an unusually large and powerful lightning strike near the mine; the U.S. Geological Survey confirmed a seismic event at Sago; and the mine's own atmospheric monitoring system signaled a combustion alarm.

The precise route the electrical charge followed remains under investigation, but Hatfield said there is no evidence that a nearby gas well contributed to the explosion.

Hatfield broke the news to miners' families in a series of private meetings Tuesday, and Sago workers were to be briefed Tuesday night as they returned to work. The coal mine is set to resume production Wednesday.

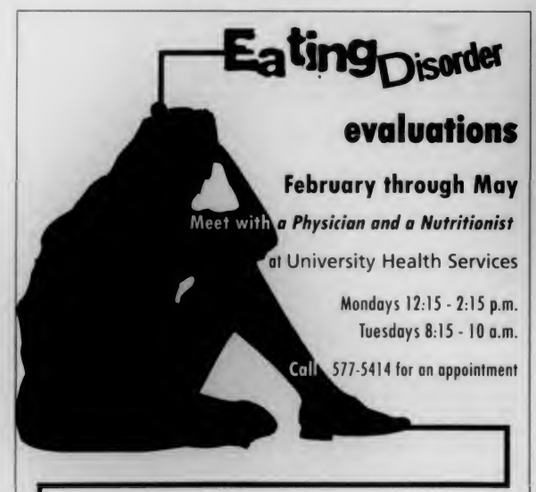
"While our independent investigation is certainly not the final word on the explosion, we are confident that the joint federal-state investigation will reach a similar conclusion," Hatfield said. "We are pleased that we can get our Sago employees back to work with the knowledge that the explosion was an unpredictable and highly unusual accident."

The explosion trapped a crew of 13 men more than 250 feet underground for more than 40 hours. By the time rescue teams reached them, all but one had perished, most slowly succumbing to carbon monoxide poisoning. Survivor Randal L. McCloy Jr. is still recovering from severe brain damage and other injuries.

Although the federal Mine Safety and Health Administration declared the mine safe to re-enter last week, Hatfield said he delayed resuming production until he could share the initial findings with the families.

Hatfield said reactions ranged from anger and frustration to relief. Mainly, though, families appreciated getting the information before it was released to the media or the general public.

He said he promised the families that lessons will be learned from the disaster, and coal mines will be made safer.



Though MSHA cited the mine for 208 violations in the months before the accident, the company's investigation showed that none of those violations was related to the blast, Hatfield said. Still, the company expects to be under the microscope.

"Frankly, we welcome that scrutiny," he said. "We have worked hard to address all concerns and are confident that we will provide a safe working environment for our miners."

Ashland, Ky.-based ICG has aided state and federal officials throughout the Sago probe but also hired outside consultants to do an independent investigation.

Hatfield said the team concluded the explosion occurred behind 40-inch-thick, dense foam block seals that were designed to withstand 20 pounds per square inch of pressure. The seals, called Omega blocks, were pulverized by a blast that initial calculations suggest had forces of at least three times that amount in some locations.

Hatfield told The Associated Press on Tuesday that ICG will no longer install seals at the Sago Mine and will ventilate existing sealed areas with boreholes to the surface. In time, the company hopes to adopt a technology used in some other mining countries — pumping nitrogen into the abandoned areas to make them inert.

Candidates go head to head

Threats of law-suits and unkind words through e-mail lead to doubts of maturity. Is the SGA returning to days of yore?

All was quiet on the SGA front until Monday, when eight students at the University of Massachusetts debated live on television for the positions of trustee and president in the Student Government Association.

Compared to years past, 2005-06 was definitely a quiet year for the SGA. There was very little fighting between ALANA and the speaker, no declarations from the president to stop working with the administration and no secret e-mails passed back and forth behind the president's back.

It was possible that this school year could have passed without a single mud-slinging match between SGA members, and controversy might not grace the Massachusetts Daily Collegian's front page as it did on a regular basis in years past.

That was, until Monday.

After a relatively calm round of debates, serious allegations surfaced about some of the candidates within hours.

The campaign of Sean Robinson for President and John Williams for Trustee told the SGA Elections Commission that the campaign of Michael Makarski for President and Matthew Fox for Trustee illegally hung banners on the Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity.

In addition, the Robinson/Williams campaign told the Elections Commission that the campaign of Rob Shepherd for President and Ed Cutting for Trustee hung an illegal banner promoting their campaign, used personal money for campaign finances and created an unauthorized Web site.

Fox and Makarski have denied the allegations and have issued a formal complaint against the Elections Commission.

As of press time, it was unclear whether Cutting and Shepherd would lodge a similar complaint. However, the pair released several strongly worded e-mails to top University officials and the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, which include vulgar language and threaten a lawsuit against some SGA members. (Two of the e-mails are printed in their entirety on page 2 of today's Collegian and on the Collegian's Web site, dailycollegian.com.)

To put it bluntly, in a matter of 24 hours, the SGA elections went from peaceful to frightening.

The idea that these candidates — particularly Shepherd and Cutting — have reduced themselves to name calling, swearing and lawsuit threatening is absurd. These two men want to represent the best interests of the students and work with the administration on important issues. That's scary.

In the case of Makarski and Fox, the question of their guilt is irrelevant. The two did have the decency to at least file a formal complaint with the SGA Elections Commission, which was the appropriate thing to do.

Shepherd and Cutting did the exact opposite. They publicized their raw and offensive comments to student politicians, the administration and members of the media to get their point across.

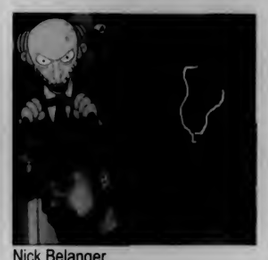
Unfortunately for them, their message got lost in their rhetoric. Our mothers always taught us to be polite. Swearing and berating SGA members isn't going to accomplish anything.

Students who have attended UMass longer than a year or two certainly recall the name-calling, race card-playing SGA of years past. We all remember broken promises and how nothing of real value was accomplished.

We remember when the ALANA caucus was banned from the Senate. We remember when former President Eduardo Bustamante decided to stop working with Vice Chancellor Gargano on student issues. We remember when former Speaker Patrick Higgins and Gargano sent e-mails to each other behind Bustamante's back. We remember when senators bickered about people's SGA appointments. And, of course, we remember when senators, SCERA members, Higgins and Associate Speaker Seamus Brennan were photographed drinking in a University office in front of a hand-drawn picture of a Ku Klux Klan member mocking ALANA.

Is this the type of behavior we want our future SGA president and trustee to emulate?

The SGA has made strides this year by having less confrontation, more working together and most importantly, rallying the UMass students to speak up on important issues, such as tuition increases.



You would think that older people are wiser, but interestingly, a candidate who is undoubtedly at least 20 years older than the rest of his competition is the first to start the SGA mud-slinging in 2006.

We must ask ourselves, do we really want an SGA of years past, or do we, the students of UMass, want to move forward?

The answer is clear.

Penalize jaywalkers too

Nick Belanger

Recently, a number of pedestrians have been hit by motor vehicles on campus — six, to be exact, within a month. However, it should come as no surprise, seeing as how the pedestrian population that shuffles around campus day after day is apparently impervious to motor vehicles.

Apparently all those kids crossing the street with iPods on are thinking to themselves, "Cars? Cars can't hurt me, I'm car-proof." Case in point, I've seen people cross the street at a busy intersection as if they thought they were Moses and traffic would part like the Red Sea. I guess what I'm getting at is that pedestrians are taking for granted that drivers will lean on their brakes for them, so how many more people need to get hit before people become more self-aware?

A BRIEF RANT

Anywhere else in the world, pedestrians yield for traffic. I mean, after all, getting hit by a car would probably suck. But, for some reason, here traffic comes to a screeching halt because little Ms. Ugg Boots needs to get to Psych 101 10 minutes early so she can save a seat for Susie Sweat Pants who is running 10 minutes late because she is putting on a pound of makeup (but is still wearing sweatpants, which I don't get). Most likely she's putting on the pound of makeup to impress Mr. iPod, who will probably get hit by a car driven by Joe Road Rage on his way to class as well.

THE REAL DANGER TO PUBLIC SAFETY

Pedestrians need to be more self-aware, and for the love of God, respect that 2000-pound car speeding down the street enough to not step in front of it. You really never know when a driver is checking him/herself out in the rearview mirror and not watching your dumb ass tempt fate and leap into the crosswalk.

For some reason, here traffic comes to a screeching halt because little Ms. Ugg Boots needs to get to Psych101 10 minutes early so she can save a seat for Susie Sweat Pants who is running 10 minutes late because she is putting on a pound of makeup (but is still wearing sweatpants, which I don't get).

I know that pedestrians have the right of way, but it has gotten a bit ridiculous as of late. UMPD is out in full force cracking down on drivers who roll past crosswalks with pedestrians waiting on the sidewalk. Nothing beats getting a ticket for being a danger to public safety.

However, I'm curious to whether or not the UMPD is out in full force cracking down on the biggest threats to public safety, jaywalkers. You know who I'm talking about, those three dudes you always see (and they might as well be the same three guys) sprinting across the road from Boyden heading towards Southwest causing you to stop while making a turn thereby trapping other drivers in the intersection. But hey, those pedestrians can do no wrong. God forbid a driver force a person to stop walking for five seconds.

ROAD RAGE

I live off campus. Every day I drive onto campus and park in the garage (thank you Daily Collegian, one perk of being a manager here). While driving around campus during the day I have experienced some of the worst cases of road rage I've ever had.

I have this vein in my forehead that pops out, I start to sweat and eventually I roll down the window and start yelling at people. When that doesn't work I'm that guy stopped at a crosswalk sobbing in my SUV (I love gas). Needless to say, if I'm trying to cross campus in the middle of the day, I'm always late to class, but it's cool because Susie Sweat Pants will fill me in on what I missed.

SOLUTION

First off, in no way do I condone hitting people with your car, and in no way is this editorial taking all the blame off those drivers who have hit people. However, I do believe drivers are entitled to rights, just as well as pedestrians. We are in the midst of a semester-long pedestrian safety program designed by UMass officials to improve the attitudes and actions of pedestrians as well as drivers.

Needless to say, our administration understands the problem, but this pedestrian safety program is really just a small step towards fixing the problem as a whole. In order to improve pedestrian safety campus-wide, more traffic lights and crossing lights need to be put in. Crossing guards could be implemented at busy areas on campus, and pedestrians should be penalized for jaywalking.

It's important that UMass becomes a campus where drivers and pedestrians can coexist without any more accidents. The best way to do that is to force pedestrians to wait their turn before crossing and allow lights to regulate the flow of traffic through campus, not people crossing the street.

UMass: more Flintstone than Jetson

Chris Reardon

The signs are all there: the healing of my cracked hands, the slightly warmer temperature than it was two weeks ago and Monday's thunderstorm all hint at what's just around the corner: spring. It gets me thinking about what's to come here at UMass. For the next several months, we'll be harassed by SGA hopefuls at the dining commons, we'll hope fruitlessly that they book someone good for the spring concert and we'll trudge to class through acres of mud.

As I begin to venture out of my Southwest hibernation period, one thing I notice is all the work being done to the campus. From the new dorms in the North Residential Area, to the new Berkshire Dining Hall, it seems like we've got a lot of nice additions to the campus to look forward to — next year. I have no doubt in my mind that these works-in-progress will only serve to improve the value of the campus, but there's no denying the fact that while the construction is going on, UMass feels less like "the Jetsons" and more like "the Flintstones."

Let's face it: for the rest of this semester, this campus is not going to be the prettiest thing to look at. It's par for the course when so much work is being done.

It certainly doesn't help matters that the campus construction signs all read "new dirt." It's like some sadistic way to constantly remind us that while the work is being done to campus, that's about all we get to look at: dirt. I realize the phrase is a kitschy euphemism for "construction," but with all the vast resources afforded this campus (laugh), you're telling me that no one could think of anything better to call our beautiful new buildings and parking lots than "dirt?"

The signs are all there, literally. They're everywhere. "It's the first thing you see when you get to campus from Rt. 116," said sophomore Molly Chiligerian. "It sounds hillbilly," she quipped.

Let's face it: for the rest of this semester, this campus is not going to be the prettiest thing to look at. It's par for the course when so much work has been looked down upon over the past several years for its inability to give UMass a good name. We're already being bashed across the country as the most violent college campus, and the recent wave of injured pedestrians does nothing to ease that reputation or the one as a party school.

Maybe instead of calling our attempted improvements dirt, we should be focusing on the fact that the students and alumni of this school need to have pride in something, and these additions could be what it takes to instill that pride.

At least we can take solace in the fact that the dirt is new. Heaven forbid they should fill this campus with old dirt.

Untruths of first person stories

Andrew Freeman

Hi, my name is Andrew Freeman. I was born in Boston, Mass., attended a prestigious high school and am a junior and history major here at UMass. I am an honors student, gamer and high achiever. I care deeply about the events of the campus, nation and the world, and I write a weekly column to share my thoughts about them.

The preceding paragraph is a narrative, a short story designed to impart certain impressions through its presentation and content. After reading it, you may feel you know something about me — you may be repelled or drawn in, bored or intrigued. But whatever conclusions you draw are products of your own mind. You haven't met me, talked to me or shared any common experiences.

As a society, we attribute a great deal of importance to the narrative. From the cover letter to the college essay to the online profile, we tell stories to advertise ourselves. Stories mediate our interactions, inform our conversations and collect our memories, but stories are also, to a large extent, not true depictions of the reality of life.

Many of the stories we tell are distortions of the truth, if not outright lies. Writer James Frey, who wrote a memoir brimming with untruths, provides one of the more recent examples, but there are many others. He claimed in his book "A Million Little Pieces," among other things, to have been in prison for months rather than hours and to have undergone dental surgery without anesthetics, none of which was found to be true.

Narratives constitute degrees of truthfulness, never absolute honesty, because we are limited in what we can perceive, just as others are limited in what they can determine.

Memoirs are inherently a problematic form of writing, because they often imitate fiction in form, stylizing and seeking drama in often ordinary occurrences. Few readers of popular writing expect a boring and rote recitation of life, so the memoir writer is under pressure to provide drama, real or illusory.

What is important to many stories is the meaning behind it, not the actual truth. When we exaggerate or distort our lives, we appeal to the particular demands of the audience. At a job interview, often the interviewer will ask you a question that seems to have little relevance to your labor.

I remember being asked what my best experience in the past year was at one interview. The significance of these types of questions lies not in the specific answer that you give, but whether you can convey through it how you are a good person, qualified and eager to work. Essays for college applications are another reflection of this.

The self-descriptive narrative helps you connect with others and it also allows you to integrate yourself into broader society. Beyond college essays and job interviews, narratives also underlie our media. Most journalism frames occurrences through the lens of the individual, rather than the event itself, in the hopes of appealing to people on a personal, emotional level. Thus we see hundreds of stories of crime, kidnapped children and other atrocities, which capture more attention than focus on ordinary, day-to-day life. The process of celebrity making is also an illustration of the narrative, with each tabloid news story, episode of "American Idol" or exclusive interview creating a public image.

The artificiality of celebrity and reality television is apparent, but the whole process of narrative formation is inherently flawed as well. In presenting ourselves, we change to adhere to the norms of the format — a memoir, for example — and to the demands of the audience. Even expressing your inner views of yourself is not a fully accurate image — only a reflection of what you see in yourself. Narratives constitute degrees of truthfulness, never absolute honesty, because we are limited in what we can perceive, just as others are limited in what they can determine.

I strive for truthfulness in my understanding and writing, and believe that without a commitment to the highest degree of honesty and self-awareness we confine ourselves to mediocrity. Narratives are a highly useful way of structuring information, making it accessible and interesting to audiences, but they should not be taken too far.

You cannot accurately judge a person's worth by their anecdotes, no more than a book by its cover. Ultimately, reality is far more complex than we fully understand, and the best we can hope for are glimpses of its truth. Narratives will show us much, but we can never see everything.

Jewish man murdered in France

Bonnie Solomon

Ilan Halimi. Is that name familiar to you? If not, remember it. This name represents more than just an innocent young man held for ransom and murdered. It represents global prejudices and anti-Semitism. Here is his story:

Ilan was a 23-year-old who was born in Morocco and was living in Paris. On Jan. 20, he was kidnapped and held for a $500,000 ransom. His abductees, a youth gang, asked for such a large amount of money because they had the strong belief that all Jews were wealthy. They knew his family was far from wealthy, and when his family could not produce this kind of money, they expected the local synagogue to produce the money.

The synagogue could not give them the money either, so his captors kept him imprisoned in their dingy basement for three weeks. He was naked, bound and gagged. His face was mutilated with a knife and with a burning cigarette. His eyes and mouth were covered, except for a small hole with a straw for him to breathe and drink occasional liquids. On Feb. 13, flammable liquid was poured on his live body; he was burned and then was dumped in a wooded area. He was discovered too late. All this happened just because he was Jewish. This is an anti-Semitic homicide.

France has been having issues with anti-Semitism for a while, but never has it been this bad since World War II. The members of the gang were from mixed cultures and most were Arabic. The leader was 26-year-old Youssouf Fofana, a Muslim immigrant from Ivory Coast. He claims that the abduction was carried out for financial reasons, but investigators realized that the abductors had an obsessive belief that Jews have the money.

I was so moved after reading about this horrific crime. As an American Jew, I feel quite safe being open about my Judaism. Now that this has happened in France, I realize that even now, being so open about one's religion is not so safe anymore. I was considering studying abroad in France, but I'm not going to hide my religion and the Jewish star around my neck for the sake of traveling there.

I was considering studying abroad in France, but I'm not going to hide my religion and the Jewish star around my neck for the sake of traveling there.

I didn't even realize that the human race still has the audacity to do these things to other human beings. Not since the Holocaust have there been so many hate crimes against the Jews in France. In the past 10 years, there has been a dramatic increase in anti-Semitic acts among Muslim immigrants because of opposition to Israel. In France, these gangs have been spray-painting swastikas on Jewish gravestones and synagogues.

This automatically makes me revert back to what happened during the Holocaust. I am not saying that this is the beginning of another Holocaust. As much as we tend to repeat history, I feel that is an event that we (hopefully) will not let happen again. I believe that this is something that needs to be watched, and no one should allow anything like this to happen anywhere.

In France, there were 974 recorded anti-Semitic incidents in 2004, which is a record high in this post-World War II era. In 2005, this number dropped to about 500. However, "Jewish leaders say the decline is less a reflection of growing tolerance than of the heavy precautions that synagogues have felt obliged to adopt in recent years, including installation of high, heavy-gauge steel security fences, 24-hour surveillance cameras, and armed patrols" (Boston Globe 3/13/06).

Also, children in schools do not feel safe. They are bullied for being Jewish and cannot walk home without getting harassed. Men get berated while walking the streets just for wearing yarmulkes.

Just two weeks ago, however, there was protesting in the streets of Paris. French Jews, Arabs and Africans were among those carrying signs and remembering Ilan's life. I have nothing against any of these groups as a whole, and I am glad that they are rallying with the 600,000 Jews in France for the loss of this young man.

In this modern day and age, no one should be fearful of practicing their religion. There is no reason at all that one should believe their religion is better than others, and no one should ever have to die for being who they are. Remember Ilan Halimi. Don't ever let this happen again.

Functions of a newspaper

Michael Toomey

I didn't think anyone cared about the Student Government. From the extensive coverage granted by our own Collegian, you'd almost think otherwise. To infer from articles nobody reads — that translate rather easily into budget toilet paper — that the concerns of the public are being reflected, you'd be somewhat naïve.

By no means exclusive to our little paper here at UMass, journalistic relativism saturates all-encompassing endeavors, The New York Times, all the like. Solely from what constitutes the main sections of the typical newspaper, we find clues which suggest that there's a good chance a successful journalist is actually just a hack politician. Why else would we fill the news with affairs the average Joe cares nothing about?

Maybe it's because newspapers are elitist tools, allowing its staff to feel part of a noble cause while its readers are afforded the erudite luxury of knowing the inside scoop about why the world's in utter disrepair. Sounds to me like an international "warfeast," although it's likely that, while relatively articulate, I'm just a philistine like the other 99 percent of us.

What do we care about? A whole lot of nothing, really. Why Gina is still pining over Trevor when Sam's such a great guy and he likes her so much. How drunk the whole crew is going to get this spring break, America's exodus of idiots, only further deteriorating the world's public opinion of the U. S. of A.

Stuff of that designation is certainly not very highbrow content, but it's still necessary to acknowledge it as entirely common. Having strong interests revolving around our direct personal experience is rather organic, wouldn't you say?

In defense of newspapers around the world, I think we can all appreciate the lack of coverage that your uncle's urinary tract infection receives, or Chris and Sam's impossible love, for that matter. Some sort of common ground needs to be used as the foundation for public print, because we probably aren't going to read about your boring friends day in and day out. But curiously, a thread of the people, so to speak, is what's missing from the majority of the big boys of journalism.

Instead, we get loads upon loads of the despicable abstractions composing the world of politics. More on the wretchedness of political thought later. We see the aforementioned elitism in the noticeable disparity between what's featured and what's interesting to most folk.

Is that why a New York Times under your arm seems integral to the Starbucks dress code, along with a laptop and conceit? Could be. If you're into the whole "I want to know what's going on in the world because I'm a responsible participant" philosophy, a newspaper can flag potential power-lunch mates.

Is that why a NY Times under your arm seems integral to the Starbucks dress code, along with a laptop and conceit? Could be. If you're into the whole "I want to know what's going on in the world because I'm a responsible participant" philosophy, a newspaper can flag potential power-lunch mates.

The journalistic standbys can also provide great ideas to regurgitate into your own editorials when you realize you actually have nothing to say. CNN.com, baby. Never be insightful again. So in a game of monkey see, monkey do, one of our longest standing forms of propaganda has become culturally symbolic first, and that jive we call the news falls somewhere behind maintaining the façade.

If you'll believe me, it only gets worse. While wearing a white cap, white shoes and a silver chain might implicate a variety of unfortunate traits and behaviors, that look at least represents something genuine (albeit dumb).

Worst of all, our big time newspapers are responsible for spreading the righteous disease of political thought. It's based on a most pretentious, presumptuous notion that our ideas are God, the human population its canvas and government its pallet, where followers essentially delude themselves into conceiving a fairy tale as fact.

Now, don't get me wrong if you haven't already, fantasy is a blast. I'll regale you one of my own; I often envision myself in a sauna with Vida Guerra, Jennifer Lopez and Salma Hayek. Mind you, I don't go around telling my buddies of my enviable connections, nor do I believe in their existence outside of where they loiter, in my head.

The folly of politics lies in vaporous standards being considered concrete, tangible and of the utmost importance. Ideas have far succeeded palpable realities in importance, as if the rules of duck-duck-goose apply to all facets of society.

Consequently, politics have repeatedly made unfathomable damages to society throughout history. But you know, someone told me just the other day that it's critical to keep our political hogwash in the forefront of the public eye, in hopes of finally getting through to the poor saps that keep pushing it away. I happen to think that we resist because most of us aren't interested in something that comprehensively sucks.

Do you think there's something behind all those clichés having to do with the sordid nature of politicians, or do they stink from the sour grapes of those incapable of understanding? I'm hesitant to use this word, because it's been bastardized, now used by angry preteens to describe their 8:30 curfew, but here goes — fascism.

Now before y'all fire up Microsoft Word to prepare a fiery protest of my general equation of politics to fascism, realize that it can simply describe a social system where the means of production are manipulated by a core group of leaders. It just so happens that humanity's tragic flaw is political thought, and all the hubris that goes along with it. We by no means have to play along with this role so many have assumed, knowing that in the long run, if we cling to it, we're going to end in epic tragedy.

America breeds cutthroat rivalry

Sanam Hakim

Let's just cut to the chase here: I'm great. I have an exotic, foreign look and one of the prettiest faces on campus. I have gorgeous brown eyes, silky black hair, I'm in shape, I'm intelligent, I'm hard working, guys love me, I have a great sense of humor and I'm popular. If you have a boyfriend or a girlfriend, he/she would like me better than you. I don't want to say I'm perfect, but I'm pretty damn close. I can't even think of a flaw or two to mention right now.

Chances are good that your eyes jumped directly to the squished little picture of my face that my editor makes me attach to my columns. Why?

I blame competition. You automatically want to make fun of me. You want to make a list of my flaws. You can think of lots of girls that are prettier than me, or you just think I'm ugly. In the back of your head, you want to prove to me that I am not everything I said I am, and maybe you should because, let's face it, I sound pretty arrogant and someone should pull me out of my own fan club really soon before my head implodes.

Competition is something that is engrained in us from childhood, and in my opinion, it's a good thing. However, competition has also become this country's obsession and, daily, it is becoming more and more amplified, especially in the media. Competition sells. We want to see people compete viciously and we want to laugh at them while they do it.

Consider almost every popular show on television today. "The Bachelor": dozens of beautiful women sacrificing their dignity and self-respect on national television, viciously competing for the affection of a man they barely know. "American Idol": thousands of American men and women competing for instant fame and money, allowing themselves to be ridiculed not only by a vicious Simon and two other judges, but by millions of American viewers. "America's Next Top Model": a lineup of confident American women competing for national recognition of physical appearance, while viewers watch and laugh at the ones who get eliminated. There is actually a show called "The Biggest Loser"…

What can I say though? Competition sells. We get excited about watching girls attack each other like snakes for a guy. We think it's hysterical to laugh at people who think they have really good voices, when in reality they sound like whining animals. We love to watch beautiful people and make fun of their flaws. We love to watch overweight people bounce up and down.

Even in the news, we are constantly bombarded by the vicious competition between politicians and journalists, politicians and politicians, journalists and journalists — all in the name of freedom. Politicians use the media not to highlight the positive things they are doing, but to show that they are doing a better job than the other guy. Republicans are out to show the world why Democrats are wrong. Democrats are out to show the world why Republicans are wrong. Then on top of that, we journalists have the power of speech and the media and the ability to ruin lives, and essentially, that's our goal, because that's what sells; a good story. It doesn't matter who gets hurt along the way, as long as you get the vote and as long as you get the story.

This cutthroat, man-eat-man competition is making a mockery of all our nation's most respected institutions and everything this country stands for, and it's even being mimicked by college students in campus politics. The Student Government Association elections, although they will never escalate to the dirtiness in national politics, mimic the same vicious competition. Campaigners ridicule other candidates and will say anything to get elected, including things that they do not even have the power to change. The school newspaper will always love controversy, and it has its eyes open for it.

Politicians use the media not to highlight the positive things they are doing, but to show that they are doing a better job than the other guy ... Campaigners ridicule other candidates and will say anything to get elected, including things that they do not even have the power to change.

Underneath all of that, competition is essentially the root of progress in this country. Capitalism works, and it works really well. If you keep people competing, the best workers will emerge and the best products will be circulated in the best way. Competition brings about progress.

However, competition also implies that some will succeed and some will not. Unfortunately for this country, that decision of who will not succeed was made from the start when a nation full of Native Americans were murdered, and essentially built over, and when thousands of Africans were shipped in as products to do the building.

A shaky foundation such as ours can never hold up a nation, no matter how powerful and strong it may appear, and that is proving to be true as the years go on. Competing businesses quickly turned into corporate monopolies and the gap between wealth and poverty is rapidly getting wider and wider. A diminished middle class is the formula for a revolution, and we are headed in that direction really soon in this country.

Vicious competition may sell, but it is also rapidly shattering basic human virtues, like compassion and tolerance, and it is changing the face of all human interactions. It's why we gossip, why we dislike people we don't even know, why we're capable of hurting our friends, why we lie.

I'm scared to see what kind of shows my children will watch, I'm scared to enter the job market after graduation, but I'm absolutely terrified of the direction this country is going. Vicious competition really will destroy us all, in every way that we can be destroyed. Isn't it time to change it?

Students, not ATMs

As a public university, it is UMass's mission to provide an accessible, quality education to the people of Massachusetts and beyond. Yet on our campus, the principles of educational access and quality are being replaced with the principles of disciplinary management and control. Now more than ever, our campus is in the midst of a transition between the old UMass and the new UMass. The question is: what will the new UMass look like?

In one vision, students move lifelessly from one overcrowded class to another; as they walk between their dining commons and their dorm rooms, a dozen surveillance cameras record their every movement.

Police perform full cavity searches before students are allowed to enter their dorms, liquor is prohibited on University property and all on-campus housing is segregated by academic class (freshman-only, sophomore-only, etc.) and by socio-economic class.

In this vision, students are required to take at least two online classes per semester in order to "maximize profit and resource efficiency," and students must take standardized exit exams before receiving their diplomas.

But there is also an alternate vision. In this vision, campus resources are revitalized; a young, energetic, diverse and creative faculty is hired across all the departments on campus. Cultural centers and lounges are refurbished. The library is fully funded, support services and academic certificate programs are revitalized, and — like all other quality schools in the area — UMass classes are worth four credits each.

In this vision, student organizations are prioritized and given the resources, power and independence needed to run truly student-initiated events and programs. There is no need to have police patrol our dorms, since students are respected, trusted and viewed as a vital part of the University community.

Tuition and fees are slowly abolished as state and federal governments invest in public schools such as UMass; the endless drive to profit from our education shrivels and withers away. Students graduate feeling a sense of pride, respect and hope — not dreading a grueling entrance into the job market that hinges on a mass produced degree.

These policies emanate from a philosophy that places more emphasis on our discipline and our pocketbooks than our education.

Judging from the administration's new policies, it is clear which vision they share for the new UMass, and it ain't the latter.

Evidence of this abounds. Just recently, our Vice Chancellor mandated that police patrol the halls in our dorms — an unprecedented request with a disastrous set of possible consequences.

Last Friday, while my friend was putting up flyers in Southwest, a police officer that was roving the halls smelled marijuana smoke. The officer approached the suspect room and demanded entrance, citing the smell of marijuana as probable cause that would legitimate searching the student's room. Yet, at what point does the potential protection provided by these officers outweigh the loss of privacy in our dorms?

Similarly, according to the new, stricter alcohol policies, a majority of our campus is likely liable for policy infraction: if I happen to use an old wine jug to hold my drinking water, or if I have a Beirut table in my room, I can be written up in violation of this policy.

These developments are evidence of an administration that is encroaching on our social lives and our privacy. These policies emanate from a philosophy that places more emphasis on our discipline and our pocketbooks than our education. In the face of these policies, we must remember that the future of UMass is still unwritten. We still have a choice between those two visions.

In my vision of the new UMass, I see a diverse, active and engaged campus that shares a sense of community and purpose. I see a campus that puts its utmost emphasis on students, teachers and books. I see a campus that has high-quality services and abundant resources, thanks to increased state and federal funding.

I see a university that is affordable and accessible to all who want to attend. I see a university where the student government and other decision-making bodies on campus truly have the power and independence to act as decision-making bodies. I see a campus shaped by the students and workers. I see an alive and vibrant UMass run from the bottom up.

The time has come to push for a clear, bold vision of the new UMass that we want, while combating encroachments on our rights and working for immediate, realistic gains on campus. Yet without a two-pronged strategy that deals with both the little and the big issues on campus, we will make little leeway in our efforts to bring about a quality campus that respects our privacy and treats us as students, and not suspects or ATMs.

So let's build on our vision of the new UMass and move onto the next step — let's push on the little issues, but let's not forget about the big issues. For as soon as we withdraw from the debate about the future of the new UMass, a new UMass will have arrived, and it's a sure bet that this UMass will realize the former vision and not the latter. So here's to engaging in all the issues with chutzpah and with respect! Here's to our vision of the new UMass.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

MORE DEATHS DOES NOT EQUAL WORSE

After reading Ben Duffy's article that compared abortion to the Holocaust, I felt a great disappointment at our education system. It made me very sad to discover that our schools did not do an adequate job at emphasizing the horrors of the Holocaust to young students, who later grow up and compare it to issues that are far from ever becoming remotely as monstrous.

Even for someone who is anti-choice when it comes to abortion, how can you suggest that the termination of a pregnancy (this so called "American Holocaust," according to Duffy) is "undeniably worse" than the murder of millions of human beings with established lives and families? While a mother who makes the decision to get an abortion walks into a sanitary clinic, in her choice of clothes, maybe with a friend or a partner for emotional support, recently widowed mothers in the Holocaust stood in the filthy streets naked and disgraced after being raped by Nazi soldiers and watched as their babies were forcibly taken away from them, only so their skins could later be turned into buttons and their fats into soaps (that is, if the Nazi doctors decided not to do inhumane experiments on them first).

Duffy's main argument rests on the numerical value that more fetuses died than people during the Holocaust, but he does not acknowledge the manner in which people died and the effect it had on their families and friends. To him, death is death, and a higher number is automatically worse, regardless of the many other factors involved.

I am glad that many people out there are not as one-tracked as this columnist. While it is one thing to present an anti-abortion opinion article, it is a whole other to try to compare it to such a historically scarring event that demonstrated some of the most inhumane, gruesome actions that human beings are capable of committing to members of their own species.

I would hope that someone that currently resides next to a Holocaust memorial would appreciate the magnitude of the event, not pull quotes away from it (out of context), as Duffy did, to compare it to a far less terrible modern controversy. Comparisons such as these are demeaning to the Holocaust and are degrading to people who relate to it.

While I am certain that more than anything Duffy's aim was mainly to get a reaction out of people with his controversial and inaccurate comparison, I suggest that he research the links between the two more closely and realize that there is a reason why, as he states, "German children feel [shame] when they learn about the Holocaust."

Perhaps it would be best if Duffy just stayed at the location in which he is studying abroad. That way he could visit the Guns memorial some more, and keep his repugnant personality out of this country for a little longer.

It's teatime, and Belle and Sebastian pour out their souls

By Ross Raihala
Knight Ridder Newspapers

When Belle and Sebastian emerged a decade ago, the Scottish seven-piece instantly built a cult following based on what it didn't do. The band didn't conduct interviews, pose for publicity photos or embark on proper tours.

Those idiosyncrasies — coupled with leader Stuart Murdoch's insular, wry lyrics — proved to be polarizing. Detractors branded Belle and Sebastian's music as the soundtrack for tea-sipping, poetry-reading shut-ins, while fans passionately declared the band the most important of its ilk since the Smiths.

Little by little, though, Belle and Sebastian have dropped all those precious affectations and, in the process, become almost "normal." The group's currently on the road promoting album No. 7, "The Life Pursuit," on a largely sold-out tour.

Lead guitarist and vocalist Stevie Jackson understands that some followers prefer the messier, less-flashy Belle and Sebastian of old.

"But being shambolic isn't something you can contrive," he said during a phone interview from his home in Glasgow, Scotland. "Maybe some groups do, but the irony is that we were always trying to get it together. You can't forever be innocent and charming, and if you are, you're faking it.

"As a collective, we've been going deeper into our influences and showing different sides of ourselves. And we're getting better because of it."

Indeed, "The Life Pursuit" is the most ambitious and colorful Belle and Sebastian album to date, with the band's trademark gentle folk ("Dress Up in You," "Mornington Crescent") bumping up against neo glam rock ("White Collar Boy," "The Blues Are Still Blue") and some of the liveliest pop songs of their career ("Sukie in the Graveyard," "We Are the Sleepyheads"). Many critics have rightfully dubbed it Belle and Sebastian's best effort since 1996's "If You're Feeling Sinister," the band's public debut (following the limited-edition "Tigermilk").

"It's my dream that it sounds like someone's first album, not their seventh," Jackson said. "It's got a sense of purpose, enthusiasm and vibrancy that, for me, we've been lacking since 'Tigermilk.' I'm not saying the other 10 years of work was bad, but I get a real buzz out of us now."

"The Life Pursuit" also feels like the most finely integrated collaborative effort from a band that was initially Stuart Murdoch's mouthpiece. Murdoch first started making steps toward democracy with 1998's "The Boy With the Arab Strap," for which Jackson wrote one of the band's hidden gems, "Seymour Stein."

"Stuart was insisting [we contribute songs], which I thought was a pretty disastrous idea," Jackson said. "The first couple of records were very self-contained worlds with a style that was all their own. It struck me as being insane to muddle what was so distinctive in the first place. I thought there would be a decline in quality. And I think there was."

Jackson is talking about 2000's patchy "Fold Your Hands Child, You Walk Like a Peasant," his least favorite record: "It was very misconceived, and I had such a miserable time making it."

The bland 2002 follow-up didn't help matters — it contained music written for, but largely not used in, the film "Storytelling."

A major rethink was clearly in order. That's what happened with 2003's "Dear Catastrophe Waitress," for which the band hired big-name producer Trevor Horn (Yes, Seal, Tatu). And the popular thinking at the time suggested Murdoch had reasserted control over the band.

"Actually, it's just the opposite," said Jackson. "Stuart is still the main guy, obviously, but he now draws more from the group than ever. In the old days, people would come in with their finished songs. Now, everyone in the group contributes ideas — a chord sequence or a riff or a rhythm or anything."

For "The Life Pursuit," the band pulled in another famous producer, Tony Hoffer (Beck, Air, the Thrills) and allowed him an unprecedented level of control.

"We did pre-production for the first time," Jackson said. "He listened to the songs and made suggestions on structure and other things. We're such control freaks, we never let anyone hear anything in the past. But when we recorded, we were prepared — we tried really hard to nail every part, every vocal, every guitar. And I think that lends it a certain urgency."

Of course, all of this talk of newfound professionalism surely sounds like heresy to all those tea-sipping, poetry-reading shut-ins.

Again, Jackson gets it.

"If you like the early stuff, you have it. You've bought it and paid for it. And if you don't dig us now, I totally understand.

"But it's like that first energy of a relationship. You can't have your first kiss again. Being in a band for 10 years, you can't keep doing the same thing over and over again. To me, there's a real joyful feeling about what we're doing now, and I'm hoping people see that and react to it."

Art Garfunkel more reconciled with his past than ever before

By Ben Wener
The Orange County Register

It's the morning after the Oscars, and as he answers the phone at his Manhattan office and cracks a complimentary joke about my promptness Art Garfunkel laughs, then inexplicably announces, "I'm in one of those moods."

What that mood is, he never makes clear, though the philosophical performer with a reputation for not suffering fools seems far more playful than prickly. Still, that's a dangerous opening statement.

It's been two years since Simon & Garfunkel reunited not for another Central Park one-off but for an acclaimed, highly profitable tour. Meanwhile, Garfunkel, 64, hasn't issued anything new since 2002's well-received "Everything Waits to Be Noticed," his first solo set to sport self-penned lyrics.

So that begs the question: Just what will he perform?

Turns out he just compiled a set list of about 16 songs. "I do keep the famous hits in the show because I don't want to be coy and difficult. I play down the middle. And I love to sing 'Bridge Over Troubled Water' and 'Scarborough Fair.'

"But the trick is to not lean too much on the past, because I have made 11 solo albums." Indeed, he's hard at work on the 12th, which he describes as "pretty creamy. It'll be a lovers album, [for] late-night dancing. Nothing esoteric about it."

As you might expect, given the current trend, it will find Garfunkel dipping into the Great American Songbook. "These elegant oldies are to music what Fred Astaire is to film — rich in entertainment."

Don't accuse him of jumping on Rod Stewart's bandwagon, however. All along Garfunkel has included standards on his albums; one of his biggest hits, of course, was his remake of "I Only Have Eyes for You," from 1975's Top 10 album "Breakaway" — which was produced by Richard Perry, who has been re-enlisted for Garfunkel's latest project.

Incidentally, 1975 was the same year S&G regrouped for their last hit, "My Little Town." As has so often been the case, where Garfunkel goes, music from or questions about Simon aren't far behind.

Like this one: Did the S&G reunion tour overshadow Garfunkel's last album, seeing as one was launched soon after the other came out?

"Perhaps, I don't know," he says resignedly. "It's a dangerous thought, because the next one is: Was it calculated by Paul's manager to snuff out my moment in the sun?"

Doubtful, seeing as "that tour came out of the fact that the Grammys chose to honor Paul and Artie for a lifetime achievement, and that experience of me and Paul getting together [to perform at the ceremony] was much like fun and games in junior high school."

For once, Garfunkel notes, the duo spent a prolonged period of time together without feuding. "It was a very easy, talented Paul Simon that I just dealt with. He's had three kids in the last decade, and he's a very benign papa."

Garfunkel, too: In addition to raising son James, 15, the singer and his wife welcomed a baby, Beau, six months ago. "So I've undergone a similar ... I won't use the word 'mellowing,' but I'm easier to take."

Art Garfunkel, one of the most influential folk performers, will be making a comeback with a new solo album.

Finding that special someone: an everyday college struggle

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

She says: You know you're attractive. You know you're not one of those crazy girls that guys always complain about. Basically, you know you're a great catch. So why can't you find a good guy in college?

In my experience, finding a good guy at UMass isn't too hard. Finding a good guy who's going to want what you want, not have other girls on his mind or some serious baggage from some ex-lover is next to impossible.

We seem to have a perspective that finding a boyfriend, if you want one, should be simple — you like him, he likes you, you both aren't into random hooking up so you make a commitment. But usually in college it goes like this: you like him, but he likes you and his ex who goes to school 100 miles away, plus he thinks the freshman girls are very cute, and then he's not sure how serious he really wants to be. And this is with a "good" guy.

Then you'll hear guys complaining about how girls always go for jerks. Well, jerks are more confident, know how to make conversation with a girl and know what to say — they've got game. They go in for the kill, then they don't want you anymore because it's on to the next. In a lot of ways, it's simpler. And admit it, girls, we like the chase almost as much as we like whining about why this guy (who, incidentally, we do know is a jerk) is being a jerk.

Now here's the kicker. Guys all consider themselves "good" guys. No guy considers himself a jerk — although he'll definitely know when he's been a jerk in the past, but only in retrospect. Take, for example, a great friend of mine. He claims he kind of wants a girlfriend, but knows as soon as a girl gets close he finds faults and bails. He's a sweetheart to me and would be to any girl who he eventually settles down with, but is pretty much caught up in the college dating game for the time being. He's constantly asking himself if this is the best he could get, and then convincing himself it's not. He doesn't think he's a jerk, and he's not — he's one of the sweetest guys I know. How a girl is going to reach the sweet guy is beyond me. He also says he has to act like a confident jerk to get a girl's attention. And he claims, like many guys do, to be a simple guy. Guys: you're way more complicated than us, and your complications are furthered by the fact that you think you're simple.

So why can't you find a good guy? Chances are you already have, but there are about 10 other factors that aren't making things as simple as they should be, so he may look like a jerk. And let's face it, you're not going to settle for some cat who can't score — so it's not as easy to bag him as you would like, if you think he's a cutie, other girls will, too. Basically, I've learned that in college there are a lot of good guys — but most of them are caught up in the game and the college experience so they're tinged with jerkiness. Don't lose hope; just realize what you're dealing with.

He says: I'm a good-looking guy at UMass. I'm thinking about three different girls. My plan for this upcoming Monday, Wednesday and Friday is to get to know that cute girl that sits near me in my biochemistry class. And if she doesn't show enough interest, there's always that girl in my physics class who's pretty cute.

Not all guys are like this, but a lot of us have become this way due to how girls have treated us. Why? The girls I've been nice to I'm either no longer talking to or are missed opportunities turned friends. Guys, if you're reading this you know exactly what I'm talking about. So I turned into the guy that is interested in a girl for two weeks and then moves on — amazingly enough, this type of confidence and nonchalant attitude seemingly hooks girls. That's why a lot of guys think girls are dumb.

So here's my main problem with the female element at UMass. Most of you have this messed up image of what a nice guy is. If he's nice, he can't be good-looking, and if he's a good-looking guy, he's got to be a jerk. Even Hannah is guilty of this stereotype to some extent. Recently we were talking about it and she said, "Nice guys are ugly most of the time. Sorry, but I'm not ready to kiss an ugly dude to get some roses."

Personally, I think girls who think this way couldn't be more wrong. I'm a good-looking guy, and I used to be the nice, good-looking guy, but since that didn't work for me I am now the nice-looking jerk who you're complaining about to your friends. Face it, ladies, you've had a large part in creating your own situation.

And if you're one of those girls who think they're the hottest thing at the party and you want a nice guy, then either lose the attitude and learn some humility, or stop complaining about hooking up with the jerks. And as a good-looking guy, if I say hi to you in one of my classes, don't automatically think you're just another girl to me. With a little bit of effort on you're part, maybe you're that girl that this jerk has been looking for to bring back the sweet guy. I'm still skeptical, though; it takes a lot to change — once bitten, twice shy.

Conclusion: Rob blames girls for teaching guys that to hold our attention, they need to be jerks. Although I'd like to tell him he's wrong, I know to a certain degree, it's true. Just like guys take us for granted, we take them for granted sometimes, too. And I know I used to not like a guy if I thought he was too nice — if a guy is too easy to get, I couldn't see him as that valuable a catch — and guys think the same way about girls. (Unless, of course, he's already tried really hard to get you, and then it's okay to cut him some slack and show him that you like him.) So girls, don't think that guys don't care if you don't return their calls or reject them. They get just as hurt but are almost guaranteed not to show it — they can't, that's not manly. Imagine putting yourself out there time after time — they are supposed to approach, call, IM, whatever — we either reject or accept. Imagine what it does to go up to someone you think is really cute risking rejection, then getting rejected. Now imagine a lifetime of that same risk. It's no wonder some good-hearted guys turn into cynical jerks. But Rob is right. "Players only play 'cause they're afraid to give their hearts away" — I've known several guys who have made a complete 180 once they've found the right girl. "Once a jerk" does not mean "always a jerk."

'Sopranos' still with the family

By Michael Mix
Cornell Daily Sun (Cornell U.)

ITHACA, N.Y. — The last time that a new episode of HBO's "The Sopranos" aired was June 2004. At that time, I was a senior in high school, the Red Sox were still cursed and Tom Cruise was still a respectable actor. That being said, it is amazing that the cast of the show remembered what character they play. Despite the long break, "The Sopranos" returned Sunday night with one of the best and most shocking episodes ever.

In case your only exposure to the mafia is through repeated viewings of "Corky Romano," "The Sopranos" stars James Gandolfini as Tony Soprano, leader of a New Jersey crime family. Not only does Tony have to deal with his inner circle of mafiosos such as Christopher (Michael Imperioli), Silvio (Steven Van Zandt) and Paulie Walnuts (Tony Sirico), but he also has to worry about his family, including his wife Carmela (Lorraine Bracco), his mature daughter Meadow (Jamie-Lynn Sigler) and his rebellious son A.J. (Robert Iler). Complicating matters are Tony's incredibly annoying sister Janice (Aida Turturro) and his Uncle Junior (Dominic Chianese), the technical boss of the family who is dealing with severe bouts of Alzheimer's disease. Only Dr. Melfi (Lorraine Bracco), Tony's therapist, can help him deal with all of his problems.

When we last saw "The Sopranos" two years ago (and it's amazing that I can remember this), Tony decided to kill Christopher's fiance Adrianna (Drea de Matteo) for talking to the feds. He also witnessed the arrest of Johnny Sack (Vincent Curatola), the newly appointed leader of the most powerful New York City family. Fast-forward to this season and Christopher seems to feel no ill effects after Adrianna's death. Johnny Sack is in prison and Phil Leotardo (Frank Vincent), one of Tony's enemies, is the interim head of New York, setting up a precarious relationship between the two families. On the family side, for the first time in the series, Tony's marriage seems to be going well, and to prove this, Tony buys Carmela a brand-new Porsche. Tony also stubbornly refuses to put Uncle Junior in a nursing home.

Overall, the episode is superbly acted, written and directed. Gandolfini is near-perfect as always, especially in dealing with Tony's stress. Falco flawlessly infuses Carmela with passive-aggressive tendencies. As Uncle Junior, Chianese once again shows why he is the most underrated actor on the show (and my personal favorite). His portrayal of Junior as a lonely, untrustworthy old man is heartbreaking.

No discussion of Sunday's premiere would be complete without mentioning the last five minutes. For six seasons, Tony has had a tumultuous relationship with Junior. Despite Junior's plot to kill him in season one, Tony never retaliated. Dr. Melfi suggests that Tony does not want another family member to hate him after his rocky relationship with his mother. Without giving anything away, the relationship culminates in the shocking and bloody end of the episode, which equaled Bruce Willis's porn mustache in "16 Blocks" on the "things I never saw coming" scale.

'Pretty' leaves readers craving more

By Leann Sulzen
Kansas State Collegian (Kansas State U.)

MANHATTAN, Kan. — It is a story about sex, drugs, boys and the unbreakable bond of friendship.

Amanda Boyden's debut novel "Pretty Little Dirty" tells the tale of two adolescent girls as they stumble blindly through their middle school, high school and college years, searching for their identities.

The story is told from the perspective of Lisa Smith, who considers herself to be a simple girl, with a simple name, in a simple family.

Her best friend is Celeste Diamond, who Lisa considers to be perfect in every way, and more interesting than she could ever be.

Lisa and Celeste grew up together in Kansas City, Mo., and they were inseparable from the day they met in the sixth grade. For years they were known as the good girls who got straight A's and excelled in everything they pursued. That is, until they got bored one summer.

The girls decided they wanted something different. What they found was a world of sex, boys and drugs that changed them forever.

They soon separated when they went off to college, but it didn't take long for them to get back together on the path of destruction they started in high school.

Although there is a foreboding sense of doom throughout the novel, it still doesn't prepare the reader for the tragic and shocking ending.

When reading this novel, it is best to plan ahead large blocks of time to devote to it, because it so engulfing you lose track of time. For me, it became an excellent procrastination tool. I anticipated the end of my work day, so I could go home and get my fix of the novel that remained at my bedside for only a week.

The intoxicating adventures of Lisa and Celeste are rudely interrupted in between each chapter with excerpts that are only vaguely related to the novel, and seem to come out of nowhere. This interruption becomes especially frustrating during extremely juicy parts of the novel.

Although there are things that are frustrating about the novel, it is definitely one of the best books I've read this year, and I am looking forward to more of Boyden's work.

Professor Jeffrey Holmes wins big

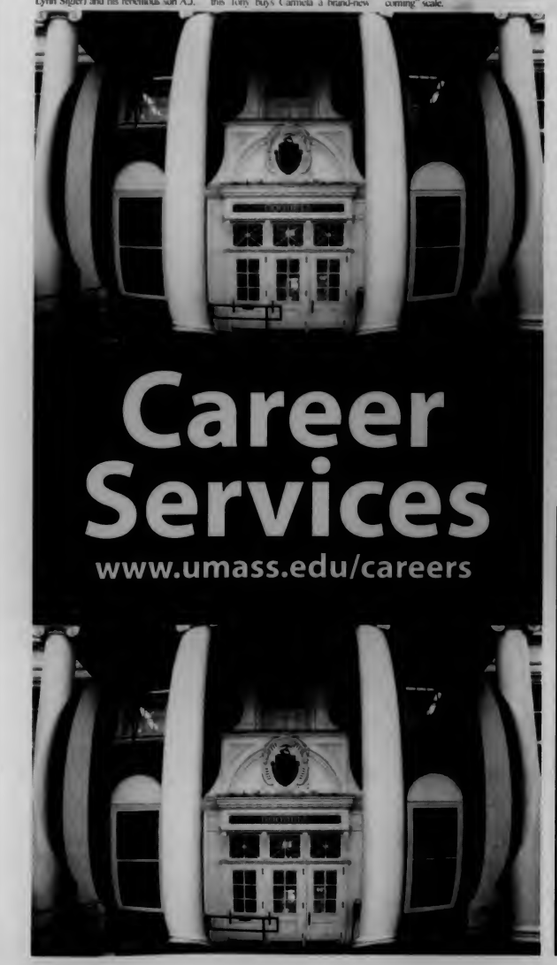
By Dave Master
Collegian Correspondent

Within the past decade, music has undergone some national abuse, starting with the teen sensation Hanson to the embarrassment of Paul McCartney rapping with his boy Jay-Z on the Grammy stage this year. Who would have thought that Paul McCartney would become a rapper? His voice is as versatile as they come, but that was a stretch. Will there ever be a musical savior? For this world is in need of a savior. By the way, Kanye does not fit the credentials of a musical savior.

The fact is, a musical savior is hard to come by. McCartney was close to assuming the role, until the Grammys.

Even though the Grammys lacked a savior this year, the award itself is a mark of high achievement that is coveted by most contemporary musicians. Jeffrey Holmes, Director of Jazz and African American Studies in the Department of Music and Dance here at UMass, rightfully took home a Grammy this year in the New Age category. Holmes won the Grammy for his performance on the Paul Winter Consort album "Silver Solstice," on which he played keyboard. The record marks the 25th anniversary of the Consort's annual performances at St. John the Divine in New York City, called "Winter Solstice."

Holmes is a man dedicated to his music and his university. At a campus this size, many challenges arise. To name a few, "maintaining a strong and thriving jazz program, providing an invigorating environment and perhaps mostly making sure that the student body at large realizes how great their peers perform," says Holmes. Somehow, Holmes made it possible to create a healthy balance between his career, his teaching and his family, ultimately resulting in a well-deserved Grammy win.



Along with performing, Holmes makes his students his priority. They have been nationally renowned in Downbeat Magazine, where they were competitively cited in categories such as best Jazz Ensemble, best Jazz Combo, best Vocal Jazz Ensemble, best Blues/Pop/Rock Ensemble and more.

A Grammy win must give a shot to the ego, but not for Jeffrey Holmes. He stayed calm and cool. He saw the Grammy as an asset to the University, not as a personal triumph. "The win has contributed to the ongoing notoriety of the Department of Music and Dance and to the University. It is the type of award that has name recognition to those in and out of the musical world," says Holmes. Holmes claims this award will not change his attitude or affect his career in any way.

As far as personal accomplishments go, Holmes has plenty under his belt. He plays drums with the Amherst Jazz Orchestra; plays trumpet and piano with his own big band, plays lead and solo trumpet with the New England Jazz Ensemble and travels the globe to perform. Holmes has had the chance to play with some of the Jazz Greats, such as Dizzy Gillespie, Max Roach, Billy Taylor, Henry Mancini, Sammy Davis Jr., Louis Bellson and, of course, Paul Winter.

In addition, Holmes has received multiple composition grants from the National Endowment for the Arts to write commissioned works for ensembles and solo artists, such as Ernie Watts, Max Roach, Yusef Lateef, Doc Severinsen and the Tommy Dorsey Orchestra. The University recently celebrated Holmes's 25th anniversary with the Department of Music and Dance. Holmes says it was wonderful and touching. The next 25 years for Professor Jeffrey Holmes remain a humble request; "25 years of health and creativity."

Holmes, though not a musical savior, makes self-sacrifices everyday for the promotion of music here at UMass. He truly lives his life based on the direction of his music. His students are his number one priority, like sheep to a shepherd. And this is the stuff a true musician is made of.

about the team. This time around, with both teams having played five games, the Minutewomen have seen some real film, including the Orange's epic battle with the Dartmouth Big Green earlier this season, and have a more rounded scouting report.

Bolduc also has some confidence because she used to play for Miller, which means that — unless she's drastically changed her coaching style — she knows what to expect.

"I know Lisa well," Bolduc said. "Sometimes I know what she's going to do during the game. We're as prepared as we can be."

Last time the Minutewomen were in the Dome, the Orange needed a Leigh-Ann Zimmer goal with five seconds left in regulation to topple UMass, 12-11. SU was ranked ninth at the time.

Like UMass, the Orange have had a sudden impact from two freshmen off to great starts and spots this week on the Big East Honor Roll. Kathryn Rowan currently leads Syracuse in points with 16, while Megan Mosenson is third on the team with 11 points off nine goals and two assists. Mosenson also leads the team with 14 ground balls and 11 draw controls.

The Orange have also had some help from senior and graduate student Caitlyn Dragon, who is currently ninth all-time on SU's career-points list and had the game-winning goal with one second left in overtime in SU's nail biter against Dartmouth.

To accommodate this attack, change is needed, which is why Bolduc has slated sophomore Krissy Anderson as the starter. Junior Lauren McCarthy was pulled from net late in the first half last weekend against Albany in favor of Anderson, and Bolduc was impressed enough by the Long Island native to keep her in the rest of the game, which they won 11-10 on a late goal by Melynda Zwick.

"Krissy, she's full of flair out there," Bolduc said. "If you ever see her play, she's a big kid, she comes up with saves that you kind of question like, 'How did she ever save that?' She's calm in there, and I think she's going to do great."

KAREN WONG/COLLEGIAN

The Minutewomen look to get back to .500 today, but they will need to overcome national power Syracuse, which is ranked No. 13 this week.

UM outfielders must make up for big loss

UMass will be sophomore Ryan Franczek, who is currently riding an 11-game hitting streak. He will bat third for the Minuteman offense.

OUTFIELD

UMass's outfield will have a big hole to fill with the loss of Twomley. Leading the Minutemen in center field will be senior Derrick Durepo, who will also be the team's lead-off man for the foreseeable future. Durepo missed 19 games due to injury in 2005, hitting .250 with four doubles and 11 RBI, and is ready to have a big year.

In left field will be junior Bill Rankin, while competing for the job in right field is junior Travis Munsey and freshman Joe Cotone.

CATCHER

Sophomore Bryan Garrity will be the team's No. 1 man behind the plate and will be backed up by junior Frank McPherson, who missed most of 2005 due to injury. Garrity started 44 games last season and was outstanding defensively, leading the team with a .985 fielding percentage.

While McPherson has started the season due to some injury issues with Garrity, Stone believes that Garrity will eventually be back at the top spot.

PITCHING

Stone believes that this year's entire pitching staff is more balanced and much improved.

"On the mound, it appears that we have more strength throughout the staff, as opposed to just having one horse like we had last year in Matt Torra," Stone said. "Obviously, we didn't have many people who did much after that, so hopefully we'll have other people who can contribute."

Juniors Chris Lloyd and Rory McDonald will lead the starting rotation, while senior David Sullivan will anchor the bullpen, with some appearances by Adamski as well.

it was pouring rain so I decided to take a taxi because I didn't want to walk into the arena soaked. I got into the cab, told the driver where I was going, and he gave me lip (that's the censored version) about the short distance of the ride and the insufficient funding he would receive. I gave him a 200-percent tip to shut him up.

POSITIVES

Halftime shows — The halftime shows were completely original. I had never seen anything like them. One act had dogs catching frisbees with acrobatic jumps and leaps — another had about 20 kids jumping rope like boxers and doing crazy stunts with them. It was more entertaining than the games.

Coaches — The A-10 might not have the best teams, but they won't be down for long with all of the talented coaches in the conference. Saint Joseph's Phil Martelli, Temple's John Chaney (though now retired), GW's Karl Hobbs, Xavier's Sean Miller, Rhode Island's Jim Baron and Charlotte's Bobby Lutz are the heavy hitters. Chaney, Lutz and Martelli have made NCAA Tournament appearances almost routine for their programs. This season, only two A-10 teams received the nod for the NCAA's, but soon enough these great basketball minds will turn things around and the A-10 will be a conference to be reckoned with. Both Miller and Martelli have advanced to the Elite Eight in recent years, and this mediocre season will soon be forgotten when they bring in some talented recruiting classes.

PERSONAL ISSUES

This is my whining about the treatment of the media in U.S. Bank Arena. It's selfish, I know, but I have to get it off my chest.

Bathrooms — There was only one bathroom for all of the reporters and journalists in the building! Usually there was a line of five or six people clogging the walkways because everyone needed to use the bathroom at halftime. For those of us who didn't want to wait, there were port-o-potties outside and around the corner next to the propane tanks. That's inexcusable. If you're going to serve hundreds of Pepsis and Aquafinas to us, then there needs to be a better bathroom system.

Food — The food situation wasn't much better. Only two times during the day could you get real food, and that was during some of the games so people couldn't get to it in time. For the rest of the day it was pretzels, popcorn, chips and, the curveball of the tournament, bananas.

Bad seats — All of the student newspapers got seats right next to the band. Not only did we have to deal with loud and obnoxious band members, but the noise gave me a five-star headache by the end of the day.

Internet — For all of the writers who felt like having a stress-related heart attack, the wireless internet in the arena was spotty at best. So trying to e-mail a finished story before a fast-approaching deadline was like running to catch a bus before it takes off.

Dacko looking for improvements committed to being a better team than they were in 2005-06.

"We have the nucleus of a young team returning," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "Right now, the future is as good as they want to put the time in. We're giving them three weeks off, and we're coming back and doing a lot of conditioning, and getting them in great shape. You might categorize it as boot camp."

While you probably won't be seeing the Minutewomen run by the Campus Center wearing army fatigues, you will be seeing a majority of the team coming back to suit up for the Maroon and White again next season. UMass will only be losing three players in point guard Katie Nelson, guard Ashley Sharpton and center Patrycja Gulak.

With the three seniors graduating, the point guard position will undoubtedly be up for grabs and open for anyone to take, even for one of UMass's top incoming freshman, point guard Kim Benton.

"It's an open door right now," Dacko said. "The point guard mentality still has to be a learned behavior. Sakera [Young] has the speed defensively. She has to clearly get in better shape physically and mentally. Kaylie [Schiavetta] has an outstanding shot. She has to get bigger, faster and stronger. Kim Benton, who is coming in as a freshman next year, is a terrific point guard and has all the intangibles. So these two kids here have to work hard because Kim is coming in, and she is going to be in great shape. Katie is going to be missed for the way she moves the ball, but [Young and Schiavetta] certainly should have learned from that."

The Minutewomen will be in pretty good shape other than that, especially with the likes of sophomores Pam Rosanio and Kate Mills being back in the fold for next season. Mills and Rosanio were named to the second-team all-conference squad two weeks ago, and will continue to be the catalysts of the Minutewomen offense in 2006-07.

Along with Mills and Rosanio, the Tatham sisters will also be back to help improve this team next year. Junior Tamara Tatham will be heading into her final stint with UMass, while sophomore Alisha Tatham will only be playing in her third season for the Maroon and White.

Those four will comprise for the backbone of the returning players next season and will be looked to provide some much-needed leadership and experience on both ends of the floor.

"This year, in many games, it was inexcusable for us to come out and not be prepared to play the game," Dacko said. "Athlete for athlete, I would put our players up against anybody in the conference. So, the mental set has to be tougher with the returning players, and that's what we're looking to change."

UMass will be looking to make some changes in multiple places, but maybe the most important changes would be preventing the number of turnovers that it had this past season and winning the games that they are supposed to.

"We can't throw the ball out of bounds," Dacko said. "We can't throw the ball away. We really have to work on our ball handling skills because all the guards returning don't have a lot of game minutes. We need to be able to take care of the ball, and we need to be able to put away a team when we have a lead. We need to come out consistently on an everyday basis and play hard. We want to be the team that's beating everybody on hustle points."

Dacko stressed the word "hustle" many times this season, and it is an aspect of UMass's game that will be driven into the brains of every athlete who suits up under her watch.

The Minutewomen will have to find a new identity next season, but if some of Dacko's dark horses can step it up next season, they will be in pretty good shape come November.

"I would like to see Whitney McDonald get a spark," Dacko said. "And I would like to see her just have a consistent mindset, day in and day out, not get down on herself, take responsibility and make a difference in this program from a post position. She had it early; she lost it to Patrycja, and she never really fought to get it back.

"I would also like to see somebody like Stefanie Gerardot come in and shoot the lights out. We've got to re-vamp her shot. She's got to get a much quicker release, and she's got to handle the ball because she is certainly capable of putting up a lot of numbers."

UMass will be an exciting team to watch next season. And with the progression of players like Rosanio, Mills, Tamara Tatham, Alisha Tatham and Gerardot, this group has all the makings of being one of the upper echelon teams in the A-10 in 2006-07, and Dacko could not agree more.

"I think we're going to be able to build on this team and really make a difference next year," Dacko said. "I'm looking for everybody. I want everybody to just make more of a concerted effort to help the direction of our program. We don't want to get on the floor, and lose to teams we're supposed to beat. We want to be in with the better teams that we're supposed to lose to on paper, and we need to put people away. We don't want to just get in the tournament. We want to win the tournament."

Culpepper and Brees on the move

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

Two star quarterbacks found new homes on Tuesday, and two talented but troublesome receivers went on the open market.

Daunte Culpepper landed in Miami and Drew Brees in New Orleans, a few hours before Terrell Owens was released by Philadelphia and Keyshawn Johnson was cut by Dallas. For the Eagles, parting ways with Owens was inevitable. But the Cowboys' move was unexpected and is sure to fuel speculation that Owens could be headed to the Cowboys, where he could never have coexisted with Johnson, sometimes dubbed "Me-shawn."

The quarterbacks played off each other.

Brees, who had been considering Miami and New Orleans, agreed to a six-year deal with the Saints shortly after the Vikings traded Culpepper to the Dolphins for what was reported as a second-round pick. However, Brees' agent, Tom Condon, said his client had been leaning toward the Saints in the last two days.

Not only did that take the two experienced QBs off the market but it raised another question: does New Orleans dangle the second pick in the draft for teams seeking Southern California quarterback Matt Leinart? Aaron Brooks, the Saints quarterback for the past five years, is likely to be released, adding another quarterback who still has some value to the market.

Both Culpepper and Brees are coming off major injuries.

Brees, a standout for the Chargers the last two seasons, injured his throwing shoulder in the team's final game last season and underwent surgery. He has said that he expects four or five months of recovery but doesn't anticipate any long-term effects.

The Saints will pay him $60 million over six years, $10 million guaranteed.

Culpepper threw just six touchdowns and had 12 interceptions last season, playing just seven games before he tore three ligaments in his knee. The Dolphins declined to confirm the deal although the Vikings announced it.

"Anything we do is contingent on a player passing a medical exam," Miami spokesman Harvey Greene said.

Another veteran quarterback, Jon Kitna, is going to Detroit, according to his agent, Michael Moye. Kitna backed up Carson Palmer in Cincinnati for two years after being named the NFL's comeback player of the year in 2003, his first season with the Bengals and his only one as a starter with them.

Then there were the receivers. Owens and Johnson were partly responsible for a clause in the new labor agreement that prevents teams from benching players by deactivating them.

It first happened with Johnson in Tampa Bay in 2003, when coach Jon Gruden deactivated him for the final six games for disciplinary reasons. The Eagles did the same last season with Owens, suspending him for four games, then deactivating — or "Keyshawning" — him.

Owens' release was timed so that the Eagles could avoid paying him a $5 million roster bonus due Wednesday. In addition to Dallas, Denver, Kansas City and Miami are said to be interested.

In other moves Wednesday:

–In addition to agreeing to terms with Kitna, Detroit re-signed defensive end Kalimba Edwards and kick returner Eddie Drummond to five-year deals.

–Former New England wide receiver David Givens signed with Tennessee. Givens, who had a career-high 59 catches last season, has seven touchdowns in the postseason — a high for New England. The Titans also signed 35-year-old Kevin Mawae, the six-time Pro Bowl center who was cut by the New York Jets last month.

–Mike Williams, the fourth overall pick in the 2002 draft, was signed by Jacksonville. The 360-pound offensive lineman was cut by Buffalo after being a major disappointment.

–Philadelphia signed former Bengal Matt Schobel to back up L.J. Smith at tight end. Schobel caught 90 passes for 938 yards and nine touchdowns in four seasons with the Bengals.

Albany downs UMass late

By Jeff Howe

For some strange reason, the No. 7 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (3-1) just can't figure out Albany, and the Great Danes left Garber Field as 9-8 victors in front of 1,132 yesterday.

With the momentum, an 8-7 lead and the ball late in the fourth quarter, UMass appeared to be on its way to a 4-0 record, but things fell apart for the Minutemen while everything came together for Albany midfielder Jordan Levine.

With less than three minutes to play in regulation, Levine was working with the ball at the top of the box and then rolled to the right off a pick set by attackman Merrick Thomson. Levine found enough space and sent a laser past UMass freshman goalie Doc Schneider — who made 14 saves in his first collegiate loss — to tie the game at 8 with 2:41 to play.

UMass had the ball with under a minute remaining and a chance to escape with a victory, but Clay Stabert sent a pass across the field to an open Brian Jacovina that sailed over his head and out of bounds, giving the Great Danes possession with 46 seconds left.

"You can't do that in those situations," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "You can't give the ball back to Albany in that situation. You've got to be able to execute and hopefully get a good opportunity to score, and we didn't do that [yesterday]."

Not wanting to divert from a successful game plan, Albany coach Scott Marr called the identical play that they used to tie the game, and Levine delivered yet again, breaking off the pick to the right side and scoring on a shot to the top corner with 18 seconds left on the clock.

Midfielder Sam Moody and the Minutemen fell victim to the Great Danes of Albany at Garber Field yesterday. It was the third consecutive win for Albany over UMass, two of which have come in Amherst.

"Once we realized that they were really face-guarding Merrick Thomson and Frank Resetarits, we talked about getting out and picking for our short sticks to try to free some guys up," Marr said. "We tried to create some confusion on their defensive side, and it seemed to work well for us."

"Merrick Thomson kept setting the pick up top, and no one was sliding off him because he is such a good shooter so it would give me enough separation to have room to shoot, every time, top corner," said Levine, who scored four goals after entering the game with one all season.

After the ball rolled out of bounds on the ensuing face-off, UMass had 11.8 seconds to take the ball down the field in an attempt to force overtime. Jacovina made a couple nice moves at midfield and brought the ball into the box. Two passes later, Stabert had a nice look from point-blank outside the crease, but goalie Brett Queener made a quick move to knock away the low shot as the horn sounded.

"Time was ticking down, and I didn't know when the horn was going to ring so I was just paying attention to the ball," Queener said. "Somehow, they got into the crease and quick-sticked it, and luckily I got an eye on it. The ball popped up, and I just whacked it away. Everyone started yelling, and it felt good."

"I couldn't believe we got a shot off at the end to maybe tie it, but the kid made a save," Cannella said. "Albany cashed in, and we did not. That was really the difference in the end."

The Minutemen took a 5-3 lead into halftime after Sean Morris, who scored two goals and had four assists, beat a double-team and sent a high rocket past Queener, but Albany rattled off the game's next four goals to take a 7-5 lead with 12:52 to play in the fourth quarter.

UMass followed the four-goal spurt with three quick goals on three straight possessions by Bret Caretsky, Andrew Recchione and Rory Pedrick to take an 8-7 lead at the 10:36 mark.

Reflecting on the sins of Cincinnati

Rob Greenfield

The Red Sox are starting up. The Celtics are limping to the finish line. And March Madness is around the corner. For your Minutemen, the 2005-06 basketball season ended abruptly with a loss in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament to an inspired Xavier team.

I made the trip to Cincinnati last week to cover UMass in the A-10's biggest event of the year. It was a two-hour flight which, of course, no one will on. So I got an entire aisle to myself and made use of it by sleeping for the whole plane ride.

The airport where I landed (still don't know the name of it) is actually in northern Kentucky, so the 25-minute cab ride to Cincinnati made a significant dent in the wallet. When I arrived in the city, I found out, to my great displeasure, that the hotel where I planned to stay didn't take anyone under the age of 21, which was not made clear on Orbitz.com, where I booked my tickets.

Luckily, down the block another hotel took my business, but I had to hurry down to the arena right after I checked in to cover the 12 p.m. game between Saint Joseph's and Dayton. The UMass game wasn't until 6:30 that night, so I had some time to kill.

I spent 10 straight hours in the U.S. Bank Arena watching A-10 basketball — and 10 more the next day — and I noticed some stuff along the way. Mostly, it was that the A-10's organizational ability is sub-par, and the entire operation could have been a lot smoother. Here are my observations — which are mostly complaints — of this year's A-10 Tournament.

General issues

U.S. Bank Arena — First of all, that's a terrible name. Secondly, U.S. Bank Arena is a dismal location for a tournament as big as the A-10's. It's located by the waterfront of the Ohio River, which sounds nice, but the arena itself is significantly grayer than Great American Park — where the Reds play — which is next to it. It is barely visible from the street and there is no big electronic lettering to point fans in the right direction. It looks like a huge parking garage.

Cincinnati — It's the Pittsburgh of the Midwest and one of the more dangerous cities in the U.S. There really isn't much to it. Any free time that I had I spent at the arena because there wasn't anything to do in the city. And the weather was so bad that walking around wasn't an option. It's not the best place to host a tournament.

Location — When Xavier played it might as well have been a home game for the Musketeers. Cincinnati is about 20 miles away from Xavier. The 30-minute drive was easy for the thousands of Musketeer fans that showed up. UMass is 630 miles from Cincinnati and St. Louis is even further, so the A-10 might want to pick a real neutral site next time.

The fans — During every game, not only could I hear myself think, but I could hear everyone else in the building think. I heard crickets during most of the games, and it made the atmosphere brutal. Also, anyone over the age of 22 should not be allowed to paint their face, yell at the players or sing the school cheers. These middle-aged people who can't let go of their college days need to relax. Have pride in your alma mater, but don't embarrass yourself.

The teams — Besides George Washington, the A-10 just isn't talented. Maybe there are one or two time that I had I spent at the arena because there wasn't anything to do in the city. And the weather was so bad that walking around wasn't an option. It's not the best place to host a tournament.

The referees — These guys were bad in almost every game. Most everyone complains about the refs, and I try to give them a fair shake, but the A-10 referees were just awful. Even good refs miss calls from time to time, but these crews missed blatant fouls and traveling violations that could have impacted the game if they were called correctly.

14 teams, not 10 — The Atlantic 10 has 14 teams in it. I know that this is happening in almost every conference, but it just doesn't seem right.

Cab drivers — The Cincinnati cab drivers are brutal. The arena was about six blocks from my hotel, but

Werner inks deal; Degon soon to follow

Yesterday proved to be a monumental day in the history of the Massachusetts hockey team, as two of its outgoing seniors — Stephen Werner and Marvin Degon — made big strides on their road to the National Hockey League.

According to a source within the Washington Capitals' organization, Werner signed an amateur tryout contract with the team for the remainder of this season and has inked a two-year deal with the club that starts next season. He is expected to be sent to the Hershey Bears, Washington's American Hockey League affiliate. Werner was selected by Washington in the third round (83rd overall) of the 2003 NHL Entry Draft.

"He's a real good person and a very mature kid," Washington general manager George McPhee said. "Clearly, we wanted to get him signed and get him to Hershey for the end of this season, much like we did with Jeff Halpern after his senior year.

"He has NHL legs, NHL strength, good size and a great shot. Those are great attributes to have, especially in the new NHL."

According to UMass coach Don Cahoon, Degon is close to signing a contract with the New York Rangers, and may have finalized the deal late last night. He is expected to practice with the Rangers this morning. If he is sent to New York's AHL affiliate, the Hartford Wolfpack, he would join former UMass defenseman Tommy Pöck on the blue line.

"They were the first edition of players of high caliber who were recruited by a lot of other Division 1 programs [and signed with UMass]," Cahoon said. "Their commitment to us gave us a foundation to be able to work from, not just from the framework of the team itself, but from a recruiting standpoint. Obviously, this is a confirmation of that.

"Everybody on the team is really happy to be associated with them."

Positional breakdown of the UMass nine

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

The weather is warming up, and the college baseball season is beginning to get into full swing. The Massachusetts baseball team opened its 2006 campaign last Friday in Tampa, where it dropped two of three to South Florida.

The Minutemen (1-2) will look to get back to .500 when they take on Northeastern (4-4, 1-2 CAA) at 3 p.m. this afternoon in Boston.

The road to success for the 2006 Minutemen looks a little bit brighter than last season, and UMass coach Mike Stone has a much better feeling going into this year than he did in 2005.

"We're just more solid this season," Stone said. "We know who is going to play where. We realize that some things change with injuries, but this season we're more shored up in both the infield and outfield."

After a disappointing season last year for UMass, Stone looked to improve on a number of aspects during the off-season. A few of those areas were that of the short-stop position, consistency in the pitching staff and a team-oriented offense, all of which Stone believes will better suit his team in 2006.

"We really worked [in the off-season] on focusing on preparation, attitude, team-first commitment and work ethic," Stone said. "Those were some areas last year that we thought we were lacking in, and needed to make some personnel changes to better ourselves in those areas. Skill-wise, of course, it's important to have Division 1 talent, but having the other ingredients are more important."

Nobody said it would be any easier, however, especially since UMass is going to have to deal with the loss of its two best players from last year. Pitcher Matt Torra and outfielder Jason Twomley were both drafted by Major League Baseball teams at the conclusion of last season and will leave the Minutemen with huge shoes to fill in those areas.

Here is how the team will look on paper this season:

Infield

UMass will have a much-improved infield this season, thanks to the additions of freshman second baseman Adam Tempesta and junior shortstop Lou Proietti.

"Our infield appears to be stronger than last year," Stone said. "The guy who ended up being our best shortstop is playing first base [this season]. And so we feel we're better at short. We got a chance to be better at second and third, all the way around, just because of experience. When you have a chance to move a shortstop to first base, you have to be better at first, automatically."

Proietti is a junior college transfer who comes to UMass from Potomac State College, where he led the Catamounts to the Division I JUCO World Series in 2005.

Proietti brings a left-handed bat into the Minuteman lineup, and Stone hopes that his love for the game will rub off on his teammates.

"He's an outstanding leader," Stone said of his new shortstop. "He loves to win, and that is contagious."

With the acquisition of Proietti, junior Bryan Adamski will make the switch from short to first base. Adamski finished fourth on the team in hitting last season with a .263 average, including four home runs and 27 RBI, and will be batting cleanup for most of the year.

Bolduc returns home to the Dome

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

When she stepped off the bus in Syracuse, NY early yesterday afternoon, for what must have felt like the umpteenth time, memories of her playing days came back to mind.

One that jumps out specifically for Massachusetts women's lacrosse coach Carrie Bolduc, a 1999 graduate of Syracuse who was part of the Orange's first two women's lacrosse teams, is her last goal in her last game at the Carrier Dome, back in that '99 season.

But as far as tonight is concerned, when the Minutewomen (2-3) take on No. 13 Syracuse (3-2), Bolduc will be looking to add another page to her history with Cuse, the program's first win ever over the Orange, and her first win against her former coach, Lisa Miller.

"It doesn't feel like home, but it's familiar," Bolduc said. "We get to see the Orange and Blue, and it's good to be back in the dome. We're going to feel the Cuse power, but we're going to bring the UMass power."

Just what kind of power they bring to the table is still debatable. Draw controls are certainly one of the more consistent aspects of the Minutewomen's game, but blowout losses to ranked opponents (16-6 to No. 11 Boston University on March 1, and 16-7 to No. 9 Dartmouth on March 8) have shown that they are not perfect.

Syracuse will be the third opponent in 15 days to be ranked No. 13 or higher in the latest STX/IWLCA Women's Coaches Lacrosse Poll — and when you're a youth-laden team, that can be downright frightening.

With BU and Dartmouth, however, they had to go off of what they saw last year and what they generally know

UMass senior midfielder Kerry Connerty is third on the team with five goals, first with six assists and second with 11 points. The 2-3 Minutewomen will take on Syracuse in the Carrier Dome today.

Scoping out the future of UM women's hoops

The 2005-06 campaign for the Massachusetts women's basketball team has come to an end, and like most collegiate sports teams, preparation for the next season has already begun.

Danny Picard

It was a wild ride for the Minutewomen this year, losing 13 of their first 16 games, only to close out the regular season winning eight of their last 11. The post-season looked bright after their brilliant stretch run, but as the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament showed, everything that happens in the regular season is thrown out the window come playoff time.

UMass ended the regular season with an 11-16 overall record and an 8-8 record in the conference, finishing the year in seventh place in the A-10.

Although they were knocked out of the A-10 tournament in the first round, the Minutewomen showed the type of spirit towards the end of the regular season that is textbook for other teams following the "never give up" motto.

A week-and-a-half after its disappointing loss to Duquesne in Philadelphia, UMass is preparing for next year. The coaches and returning players are already looking forward to next season, and are

SGA election results are in

Senate meeting is business as usual

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

As election commissioners toiled, counting ballots to determine the new leaders of the Student Government Association, the current senate held their weekly meeting as usual.

SGA senators yesterday revisited the problems encompassing the campus's Parking Services.

According to SGA Chairwoman Mallary Kohlmeyer, nearly 40 cars were towed from the Purple Lot last week after students parked near signs that read "No Parking Mon-Fri 7 a.m.-5 p.m."

Kohlmeyer said the parking signs, which originally meant that parking is allowed in any lot for anyone after 5 p.m., were changed by Parking Services after students complained they couldn't find parking spots. Now, the signs mean that cars are not allowed to park in the purple lot from 7 a.m., Monday, to 5 p.m., Friday.

Kohlmeyer explained that the students, who were towed at night and had not to be informed of the change by Parking Services, were misled by the sign.

"They could have sent out an email warning students of the change," said Kohlmeyer. "Or asked someone from our Public Policy commission to put up fliers."

Kohlmeyer sympathized with the numerous students who had been towed.

"Those students are now forced to pay not only the $40 ticket, but the $110 towing charge as well," said Kohlmeyer.

The Senate approved a motion that would ask Parking Services to update the signs in the Purple lot in a 'clear, timely manner.'

The motion even asks for Parking Services to return the cost of the $40 ticket to the towed students.

"We've all been towed and know what a hassle it is," said Kohlmeyer. "I had my car towed once and I was upset."

The senate also approved motions to allot $1,000 to the group, "UMass Students For Fair Trade," $2,000 to the Registered Student Organization, African Student Association, and $1,500 to the Rugby Club to go towards new uniforms needed by the team after several members last year became inflicted with staph infections.

Mishy Leiblum and Elvis Mendez

Election Commissioners count the SGA ballots late into the night. As of 4 a.m., initial results of the election show that the projected winners are Mishy Leiblum as student trustee and Elvis Mendez as president, pending final confirmations.

By Hannah Drake
Collegian Staff

Following a "hell week" of midterm exams and papers, freezing wind and bouts of snow, University of Massachusetts students are preparing for their Spring Break. For some that means a week at home, but for many it means traveling to exotic college hotspots, drinking too much alcohol and having some crazy times that students might not remember. Where are UMass students heading next week? All over, they say.

Paige Cram, a senior English and Italian Studies major, is revisiting Italy with one of her friends. "I did a semester abroad there and it was awesome, so we're going back," she says.

"I'm just going home, hanging out with my sister, chilling in Boston for part of the week," says Emily Morse, a senior English major.

Chelsea Le Beau, a senior art major, is going to Florida with her boyfriend and visiting a friend on the way down. "I can't wait," she says.

Grant Barton, senior communication and political science major, is going to Pennsylvania and then back to his hometown of Hopkinton, Massachusetts. "I'll be living sleazy," he says. "I'm going to drink every 'Natty Ice' in sight. Then it'll be back to 'hip-Hopkinton' for me, hitting up the exciting Hopkinton-Milford bar scene. But more importantly, I'll be playing ball with the 'hopkinz' gang. Frank, Zach, Rich — yeah, pretty much the dream team. I don't care. I'm not afraid of stiff competition."

But Barton won't simply going to drink the week away. "Hopefully I'll get some job interviews, too."

Rob Dement, senior chemistry and molecular biology major was excited for spring break up until Tuesday.

"My plans fell through, it sucks," he says. "We were going to go to Montreal, but one kid bailed. Now the prices are higher and I wanted to keep it cheap. I was so excited to go, too."

Students lounge on a beach in Florida during Spring Break 2005. The beach is expected to once again be a popular student destination this year.

Junior civil engineering major Brent Richard is traveling to Charleston, S.C., with four of his housemates from Saturday to Saturday. "We're going to go to the beach if it's nice enough, explore Charleston, watch college basketball at sports bars, and drink. A lot," he says.

As for the more typical spring break hot spots? According to Facebook, at least 100 UMass students are traveling to Acapulco, Mexico.

"Get ready for the craziest seven days of your life!"

SAT errors may affect college applicants

By Mr[illegible]
Collegian Staff

College admissions officers in Massachusetts and across the country have recently had to scramble to review applications following reports that more than 4,000 SATs were scored incorrectly.

Officials at the College Board, the organization that gives national tests such as the SATs, the GREs and the Advanced Placement tests, admitted last week that they had miscalculated thousands of high school students scores from the SAT given in October.

The scores have now been recalculated and admissions officials from colleges and universities who received applications from the affected students have been contacted and informed of the mistake. However, some officials believe that this action was not enough because, although the mistake was found earlier this year, admissions offices were not informed until the middle of last week, a time when most colleges are sending out acceptance letters.

Law makers look to increase victims' rights

BOSTON — Adult victims who suffered sex abuse as children joined with support organizations to rally outside the Statehouse steps Tuesday morning, hours before the Joint Committee on the Judiciary held a hearing on bills that would eliminate the statute of limitations on sex crimes committ against minors.

The Coalition to Reform Sex Abuse Laws in Massachusetts urged the Joint Judiciary Committee to send three bills to the legislature that would end the statute of limitations on childhood sex abuse crimes, in which states victims of sexual abuse cannot raise charges against their attackers six to 15 years — depending on the nature of the crime — after the victim's 18th birthday.

"Sexual predators are able to hide their crimes for years with guilt and intimidation," Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey said before the committee. "Sexual offenders remain active for many years and most are never caught."

Healey added that Massachusetts has made great progress in closing loopholes in sexual abuse laws in Massachusetts and gave her support for the bills co-sponsored by Sen. Stephen Tolman (D-Boston) and Rep. Ronald

Woman awarded for finding slain children

BOSTON — Stephanie Dietrich searched day, night and sometimes overnight for the bodies of two New Hampshire children who had been shot to death and buried by their father just off a remote stretch of highway in rural Ohio.

But the mother of two said it was just natural human concern that led her to search for hours on end for children she didn't even know to help a family she had never met.

"Even if I didn't have kids I would have done it," she said at a ceremony held Wednesday in her honor. "Isn't that what we're supposed to do for each other?"

The Boston office of the FBI gave Dietrich a plaque, a check for $10,000 and an "official FBI collar" for her dog, Ricco, who joined her for months of searches and, eventually led her to the bodies of 14-year old Sarah and 11-year-old Philip Gehring.

Their father, Manuel Gehring, told investigators that he killed his children in New Hampshire then drove several hours and buried the bodies somewhere along Interstate 80. His description of the make-shift burial site was vague, and he killed himself in prison before the bodies were found.

The Boston FBI, which also has jurisdiction in New Hampshire, coordinated with local law enforcement along a 700-mile stretch of the highway, but were unable to find the children's bodies.

They posted a transcript of Gehring's description of the burial site on the Internet and asked for help from residents of northeast Ohio, where authorities thought the bodies had been buried.

Dietrich said she was going through a rough period in her marriage and wanted to keep busy.

"I just picked up the transcript and ran with it," she said.

Sarah and Philip Gehring were murdered by their father and buried along Interstate 80. The bodies were later found by Stephanie Dietrich and her dog.

Abuse victims seek new bill

Mariano (D-Quincy).

"Predators of child abuse should not have rights," Tolman said. "The Judiciary Committee will vote to protect the interest of children or it will vote to protect pedophiles."

The Coalition to Reform Sex Abuse Laws was formed in 2004 to push for legislation that would end the statute of limitations on sexual abuse committed against children.

The three bills are expected to be voted on by the Joint Judiciary Committee today.

If Massachusetts passes the bills, it will join a number of other states, including Maine, Virginia and New Jersey, that will have abolished the statute of limitations in sex abuse crimes against minors.

"Massachusetts is known as being the first people to pass bills," said Ursula White, the mother of a sexually abused son. "Guess what? We're not. Other states have passed the bill and we're not one of them."

Speakers at the press conference before the hearing said Massachusetts should eliminate the statute of limitations because sexual abuse causes long-term psychological effects on childhood victims well into adulthood.

Jetta Bernier, the executive director of Massachusetts Citizens for Children, said 80 percent of sex abuse crimes committed against children are never reported.

Psychologists who testified at the committee said sexually abused children often think they are to blame for the crime because they are usually assaulted by a trusted authority figure.

"The perpetrator is good, and that means I must be bad," said psychologist Ann Hagen Webb, who was sexually abused as a child. "Logic doesn't help the shame go away."

Former NFL player Roy Simmons spoke candidly at the press conference about his own experiences of being sexually abused by a neighbor when he was 11 years old.

"I remember it as though it happened yesterday," Simmons said. "I will never forget the pain and paranoia. I felt that is was my fault."

Although Simmons was able to recall his experience, Rep. Mary Grant (D-Beverly) said it is usually difficult for victims to retrieve memories due to the "serious and complex nature of the trauma."

"Research has shown the only effective intervention is involvement of the criminal system," Grant said.

Statistics gathered by members of the Massachusetts Child Sexual Abuse Prevention Partnership found that 90 percent of Massachusetts residents think sexual abuse is a serious problem in the state. A federal study conducted by the Centers for Disease Control found that one out of four women and one out of six men report some kind of sexual abuse by their 18th birthday.

Grant testified that long-term psychological effects for sexually abused children include repressed memories, depression, suicidal thoughts and drug or alcohol dependency.

David Clohessy, a sexual abuse survivor and the National Director of the Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, said the statute of limitations has been sexual abusers' best defense because children are usually unable to come forward about the abuse.

"In one simple word, prevention is the reason we are here today," Clohessy said. "This is about protecting children, period."

Last week, University of Massachusetts Admissions Director Kevin Kelly was given a 13-page roster of applicants to UMass whose scores had been incorrectly reported.

"On March 7, to get this packet of information is a little startling. Most of my immediate reaction is not printable," Kelly told the Associated Press.

Kelly's reaction was common among others in the admissions field, who criticized the College Board for not informing them of the mistake as soon as they discovered the problem.

Dennis Trotter, the dean of admission at Franklin & Marshall College in Pennsylvania, wrote a letter to one of the College Board officials saying, "As the party who screwed up, you have the responsibility to fess up to the problem and provide a clear explanation."

Another issue that has caused concern among test takers and officials alike is the fact that the error may never have been caught had not one of the affected students asked for a rescoring of his exam when he found his score to be much lower than expected.

The error has been attributed to excessive moisture in the scoring machines by the Pearson Educational Movement, the extension of the College Board responsible for grading the exams.

This recent problem with the SATs is also not the only scoring error that has occurred in the last few years. In 2003 and 2004, thousands of teachers received incorrect scores on their licensing exams. A group of these teachers subsequently sued the Educational Testing Service (ETS) for damages resulting from the incorrectly scored exams.

The lawsuit claims that those affected by the mistake suffered humiliation, lost earnings, and even caused some teachers to seek different career paths.

On Tuesday, the ETS stated its intention to set up a fund of more than $1 million for these teachers.

Students make travel plans for Spring Break

Non-stop drinkin', dancing with the devil, hot bodies and the sickest clubs you've ever seen — including the number three club in the world: Palladium — All starting March 18 — ladies leave your men at home; fellas leave your girl with a friend," reads the group's description.

The Legionnaire's disease scare has faded into the past, and some students are cruising through spring break this year with a variety of different cruise lines. Some UMass students are cruising with Carnival — "the fun ship" — to Nassau, St. Thomas, and St. Marten.

Cruises are a popular choice for students — they can be cheap, bars are available on the ship and there are usually a few different clubs onboard. Travelers also get to see different places. Longer cruises will dock at night, allowing cruisers to explore popular bars at port like the infamous Senor Frogs. During the day, numerous excursions are available for a price. Students can go snorkeling or for a beach break.

Not all students are using the break to drink. The UMass Civic Interfaith Alliance Alternative Spring Break program is the oldest alternative spring break program at UMass, and this year the organization has several trips planned. According to the program's Web site (www.umass.edu/protestant/asb), their alternative trips count as a two-credit class through the history department. Limited to groups of 10, each trip costs the student about $200 for travel expenses, food, and class readings.

In Birmingham, Ala., students will help build homes and work in after-school programs.

In Cherokee, N.C., students will learn about Cherokee culture, history and beliefs while helping the community with whatever it needs.

Students traveling to the Mississippi Delta will study how the blues are connected to social justice issues and spirituality.

The group traveling to New York City will learn about community outreach programs in the area, specifically those that help poorer children explore their artistic side.

In New Orleans, students will stay in church halls around the area and volunteer daily to help clean up the city.

As UMass students leave the college town of Amherst for a week and spread out over the U.S. and the world, school officials urge them to remember to stay safe.

Long transition likely for Iraq

By Anne Gearan
Associated Press

SYDNEY, Australia — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that Iraq's political transition will take a "couple years," acknowledging the process that is currently stalled will not move swiftly.

"I think that there is a very good chance that the Iraqi people, with the support of their coalition partners, will build a good foundation, a political foundation, for a stable and secure Iraq over the next couple years," Rice said. "This is a difficult task."

She added, "We should express confidence in them because every time they have been confronted with a challenge," Iraqis have risen to the occasion.

On Wednesday, the Pentagon announced it was sending up to 800 more troops to Iraq and repositioning thousands of others in response to increased violence in the country and fears of more fighting prompted by a Shiite holiday.

Rice spoke after meeting with Australian Foreign Minister Alexander Downer for talks that also covered Iran's nuclear program, Indonesia's development and the recent nuclear deal between Washington and India.

She urged Iran to resume negotiations over its nuclear program, while also calling the country the "central banker of terrorism."

She said she was "quite certain the (U.N.) Security Council will find an appropriate vehicle for expressing again ... the desire of the international community ... that Iran return to negotiations."

Rice's remarks echoed President Bush's defense of U.S. policy in Iraq this week, as the third anniversary of the U.S. invasion approaches.

A day before Rice arrived, Australia said it will keep troops in Iraq at least well into next year and announced a larger mission for about 450 troops now stationed in southern Iraq. Iraq will be the focus of remarks Rice plans to make to university students in Sydney later this week.

She also will join three-way security talks with Japanese and Australian officials. Those sessions will include discussions about China's growing military might and its influence in the Asia-Pacific region, said Downer.

"The challenge is to make sure that the growing power of China — its economic power in particular — is harnessed to the advantage of the region," Downer told Sky News.

Downer said the ministers would be looking not at containing China, but at ensuring it works with the region.

"That depends on China itself making sure it acts responsibly, and I think China is acting responsibly — they've been doing a good job, for example, on North Korea — but also, ensuring that the region itself understands the growing role of China."

Downer added, "The rise of China can become a real positive, but it has to be managed."

Last week, Rice said the three countries must "make sure that we're looking at a Chinese military buildup that is not outsized for China's regional ambitions and interests."

That policy has drawn sharp criticism from some analysts.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice says that Iraq is likely in for a long period of transition to political stability.

New era in UMass dining

Jon Brandt

There is a new phenomenon going on throughout Southwest this semester. While it's something that we've been living with for a while now, changes have been made for the better, and students have never been happier. I am talking about the new Grab-n-Go in the Southwest Café. With later hours and more choices than ever, Grab-n-Go has revitalized the students who have to wake up to the noises of construction going on at the Berkshire Dining Commons every morning.

It was not long ago that students who wanted a quick meal on the go around lunchtime would have to rush over to Berkshire or Hampshire dining commons. Unless you had arrived in the first few minutes, you would often find that you were left with a few sad looking sandwiches that no one else had wanted.

The worst of it all was the fact that if you had gotten out of class around 2:30 and just wanted a sandwich to take up to your room, you would find that you were too late, and would need to sit down to eat. It was a dark age in the DC business. However, thanks to the construction on Berkshire, food services has converted the Southwest Café into a make shift Grab-n-Go headquarters, where students can grab their meals and even sit down if they choose to.

The new Grab-n-Go is one that everyone can enjoy. Remember how bad it was eating the same water-logged turkey sandwiches every day? Now there are actually options. If you want to eat a chicken patty, go for it. Cheeseburger? Sure. Grab a grilled cheese while you're at it. Or if you are a purist, just go for a good, old-fashioned sandwich that's located in the side room.

Remember how bad it was eating the same water-logged turkey sandwiches every day? Now there are actually options.

As always, drinks are on the house, and you can fill up on some soup and crackers before heading out. These are golden times we are living in, where a man and woman can bite into their food and not have to listen to their taste buds yelling back at them. I just feel bad for those poor suckers who never got a chance to enjoy the Grab-n-Go we now take for granted.

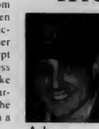
It is not only the food that has completely changed the face of lunch throughout Southwest. The convenience is part of what is creating such a buzz in the dorms. Any time of day is a good time for a quick meal now.

Grab-n-Go runs from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m., allowing much more freedom to the students coming back from classes. In the old days if you wanted a sandwich and it was almost closing time, you would either have to hurry over to the DC or you were out of luck.

Now students can simply go to the Café whenever they want to get some food or drinks. Best of all, the Southwest Café is still functional and opens up at 8:30 p.m., serving the same food they have always offered.

While many students, especially those living in Southwest South, have had complaints about the closing of Berkshire for the spring semester, I think it is actually for the better. While I obviously would want it open and running next year, I can't help but think the current situation is not all that bad in the first place.

To alleviate the traffic from Hampshire, Hampden has been opened up with tremendous success. What used to be the Kosher DC is now one of the best kept secrets of the campus. With less space, the cooks are able to take more time and effort into preparing the food, not to mention the friendlier service that comes in a more intimate environment.



Even though the other DC's are much larger, they all pale in comparison. Though it is mainly frequented by students living in Southwest South, anyone is welcome to come down and try it out. Some of the best meals served there are chicken Ceasar salad, pad Thai and BBQ spare ribs.

As Southwest resident Danny Weiner put it, "I never realized they knew how to make food that well down here. You can find me at the DC all day long now."

Clearly, the change has impacted everyone. As you all head home or on vacation for Spring Break, enjoy the meals you eat while you are away. However, do not feel like you need to stock up on soups or Ramen in order to survive. There is a gold mine of food at the Southwest Café and Hampden DC just waiting for you when you come back.

Modest proposal for incline commute

Adam McGillen

It is a melancholy object for those who walk through this great campus to have to climb up Orchard Hill. Its presence is a great additional grievance to those students who live at the apex of UMass. Those dorms found atop the earthen mountain that towers over our beautiful campus would certainly be considered among the best, if it were not for that one repugnant attribute of the daunting commute home.

Whoever could find a fair, cheap and easy method of getting around this hefty burden would deserve to have his statue set up as a preserver of the student body. I will now therefore humbly offer to the public opinion a modern proposal for a simple and effective solution: a full-fledged chair lift scaling the slopes of Orchard Hill, accompanied by a water slide, complete with highly durable tubes large enough to accommodate a party of four. I have turned my thoughts to this subject for many months and have found that the benefits of this proposal are boundless.

No longer will residents of the four Orchard Hill dormitories be plagued by burning muscles, deflated self-esteems, bad grades and hill-related injuries.

Perhaps the most obvious benefit is the simplified commute. No longer will residents of the four Orchard Hill dormitories be plagued by burning muscles, deflated self-esteems, bad grades and hill-related injuries. There is perhaps nothing more degrading to a person's character than the loss of motivation due to having just completed a near vertical climb up the steep face of the hill.

It is not uncommon to hear the sound of text books set aflame or tossed in the circular file as students give up their drive for success after exerting so much effort just to get back from class. The climb itself is the most overwhelming part of the daily grind of homework, leaving actual work to be done for class in the dust. With the construction of a chair lift, this hindrance upon the abilities of great UMass students will be removed and grades will soar to new heights.

There is likewise a second great advantage to this proposal. Not only will grades improve, but those living atop the hill will have new incentive to go to the free gyms around campus, improving their lifestyle further. Many students justify their inactive and indolent afternoons by lamenting about that redundant struggle they must deal with every day. It is a detriment to their health, and without the hill tearing down their motivation, students will find it easier to get to a gym, where they can work out more than just their legs for free.

Health benefits do not end there, though. Hill-related injuries have caused bodily harm to many students over the years, whether it simply is associated with excessive physical activity while inebriated, or the result of dangerous ice patches stretching across the entire slope. Having spoken with several Orchard Hill residents, there is an all too common trend.

"My back always kills me after climbing the hill," stated Norman Earnest of Dickinson Hall.

"I was walking up the hill one day, and I got a rock in my shoe. Now I have gangrene," claims Gregory Kleciak of Field Hall.

The chair lift will reduce these dangers when climbing up the hill, and the water slide will allow for a controlled decent down the steep slopes. In the winter, the slide can be converted to a bobsleigh-like course using the very same tubes as will be used in the summer.

It will no longer be necessary for students to feel the shame and embarrassment of falling while navigating the tricky slopes of Orchard Hill, a fall that will no doubt end in a 30-foot downward slide with friends laughing at your back. Injuries and illnesses that occur atop the hill will no longer be an issue either, as a trip to Health Services will be expedited by the slide.

As I mentioned, the benefits of this proposal are boundless, and they go beyond O-Hill residents. The rising cost of attending the University is no mystery, but the chair lift and accompanying water slide can help curb this problem. It will not only open the door for students to make use of the free gyms, but it will create jobs on campus, reduce the usage of cars (thus decreasing gas and maintenance expenses for students who have vehicles) and attract visitors to campus which will create revenue.

To put this proposal into effect would cost approximately $1.5 million (a chair lift built for the hill at $1.3 million, a water slide at $100,000 and an industrial snow maker at $5,000). A measly amount considering UMass is the fifth most expensive public university in the nation, according to a recent survey done by USA Today. If students must pay so much to attend a public university, why should they not reap luxurious benefits?

Oh, and don't forget the cup holders, or the climate controlled seats. And flat panel HDTVs installed into the back of each chair would be a nice touch.

What I learned in high school

Caroline Moss

The last words in my high school principal's commencement speech were, "Everyone is in your life to teach you something." Sweet cliché I thought. When I finished high school, I went to graduation, and I cried. So did a lot of people, and by people I mean girls, but it happened. People actually cried.

At the time, I didn't think much of the wailing cries of, "Oh my God, I'll never see you again," and, "This is the end of everything we've ever known." To me, it was natural to make iPod playlists entitled "Leaving Home (insert sad face)" and include songs by Vitamin C, and then drive around with your girl friends, singing along and crying.

And then I found my tenth grade journal. It's the biggest piece of evidence of why I shouldn't have even showed up to graduation in the first place.

As human beings, we tend to look back on the past and think it was much better than it actually was. We romanticize and think nothing will be better than high school, because these are my best friends.

But seriously, according to my 10th grade journal, I had the 79 worst days of my life, fell in love about seven times and wanted to disown myself from my family on countless occasions. Healthy? Clearly.

I was like every normal 15-year-old girl; self-absorbed and obnoxious. I constantly dwelled on the fact that I made out with the guy I liked, but now he had a girlfriend (but didn't he like me? I mean, we kissed). I constantly put up away messages with horribly obvious quotes by Something Corporate in subtle attempts to catch his attention.

So why, then, was I crying at graduation? According to the 15-year-old prophet that was my former self, I hated high school with every fiber of my being. It wasn't until now that I realized that everyone I had ripped apart as well as worshipped in the little Bible I call my journal really did teach me something.

The guy you're obsessed with but pretend otherwise: Mind games, when used over their initial quota, or when you're over the age of 10, are not the best way to score a boyfriend, because guys won't ever think that you're playing mind games. Like, when you say don't get me a birthday present, you really mean, if you don't get me a present I will kill you, and they hear it as, "Sick, I can order from Wings tonight." And then they get a girlfriend, and that girlfriend is not named you. That girlfriend hates you, and you never got your birthday present, either.

You wore something defined as sort of risky, but you decided to wear it anyway, and then threw a fit when she told you to put on a sweater.

His girlfriend: Though she is two years older and scary, and tells people she wants to run you over with her car, she dislikes you for a reason. She still views you as a threat to her boyfriend, who she obviously doesn't trust all that much. People will only bring you down if you let them, and you can always be the bigger person, even if you aren't always the older one.

The Dean of Students is no reprimanded you for your choice of outfit at the Winter Formal. You wore something defined as sort of risky, but you decided to wear it anyway, and then threw a fit when she told you to put on a sweater. Then she followed you around to make sure you kept the sweater on all night.

OK ... maybe this was just my high school? Yes? No? Uh ... and then I found five dollars? Bottom line: you could be wearing a snow suit or you could be naked and that formal still would have sucked.

Your stupid parents: One day, you're going to have kids, and they're going to write all about how you didn't let them go online for the whole weekend and how they ruined your life indefinitely because you missed like, three vital days of away message checking. Give them a break. They could be really horrible and not let you have a screen name in the first place, and God only knows what that would do for your social life.

But now you're in college, and you tell people everywhere you go that you're so happy to be out of the high school drama, even though you probably created some of it yourself. But aren't you glad you did? There's a reason that we find humor in the acts we committed as 14-year-olds and cried over. I urge you to look back on your journals, your yearbooks and think seriously about what you've done ... and how you've learned.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

STUDENT REACTS TO VICE CHANCELLOR

There is a diversity problem on this campus, but it has nothing to do with the so-called self-segregated dormitories. It is the fact that students of color and our own multicultural organizations have been constantly marginalized by the University's administration and its failure to recognize the importance of our heritage and self-preservation.

I hate the fact that Gargano is putting this pressure on us (the students of color on this campus), and suggesting that this diversity problem is our own fault. It is absolutely not our problem, nor is it our fault. Rather it is our University's problem.

Gargano claimed in the Boston Globe that these special interest halls are "... allowing students to shut themselves off, and then they are missing out." He completely ignored and disregarded the diversity that already exists in these living and learning communities.

It is so often the case that he and the administration lump people of color together without any thought that these communities are foundations of diversity. He fails to acknowledge that within the Asian/Asian-American and African-American communities there is already a vast array of very different religions, languages, cultures and life experiences.

I have lived in the Asian/Asian-American special interest floor on this campus, and I can tell you that never did I feel I was "shutting myself out" or "missing out."

On the contrary, my experience on the floor has broadened my outlook on life. I am a Vietnamese American who lived side by side on this floor with people from all walks of life. These fellow students were of Korean, Chinese, Pakistani, Japanese and Indian heritages from which I was able to learn and grow.

I was indeed exposed to the "different opinions and ideas" that Gargano spoke of in the article. His comments just reinforce old racial stereotypes. However, these communities are not segregated, there were also many Caucasian students and students of all backgrounds that lived on these floors.

As an Asian-American student in a school with an 80 percent population of white students, it is impossible for me to "shut myself off," as Gargano has stated. I am usually the only person of color in many of my classes, and throughout my academic career at UMass, most of my social interactions were with students of Caucasian heritages.

However, when I was a freshmen coming here from a racially diverse city to an almost all-white town, I felt comforted in the fact that I was able to choose to live in a floor that had some diversity of people of all backgrounds. I was living with peers who could relate to my experiences.

He also fails to see that many dorms throughout this campus are mostly white, and he made no mention of how that is a segregation problem. Does he think that our diversity problems will be solved by spreading the people of color thin so that every dormitory floor will have their token minority person?

It is a problem that in his mindset a floor with mostly white students is considered normal, but a floor with a congregation of people of color becomes a problem to him.

Do not direct the blame of the diversity problem at UMass on the students of color, Gargano. We do not segregate ourselves from the University. We have instilled bright communities that add diversity in this school. We have organized together as the broader ALANA community that gives this school the different opinions and ideas that make UMass what it is. Your attack on the living and learning communities is an attack on diversity.

Bids for tickets: a pricy trend

By Jim Farber
New York Daily News

Concert promoters used to sell tickets at set-in-stone prices, even if those prices went up every year.

But a new trend has artists and promoters forcing fans to bid on the best seats in the house, something they only experienced before from rogue Internet entrepreneurs or scalpers.

Frustrated by the astronomical prices some Internet companies get for resold ducats, America's largest ticketing agency, Ticketmaster, has convinced top artists from Coldplay to Bon Jovi to use what they call "dynamic pricing."

In this system, the most desirable seats are offered in timed auctions, with bids often opening above the face value of the ticket, then shooting north, based on demand.

Last weekend, for instance, Ticketmaster was auctioning the best seats for the Faith Hill/Tim McGraw tour, which hits Madison Square Garden June 23. (Minimum bid: $120, up from the normal top ticket fee of $99.50.)

"This helps keep tickets out of the unauthorized, secondary markets where [another company] determines how much the consumer is going to pay," explains Ticketmaster spokeswoman Bonnie Poindexter. "This way, fans decide."

Yet the fans' bidding process can result in prices that rival even the greediest secondary sellers. The peak price for a single seat during Bon Jovi's last tour via auction was $1,200.

"Dynamic pricing" began in June 2003 for a Lewis Johnson fight in Los Angeles. But it has only started to catch on in the concert industry in the last year. Ticketmaster claims the number of authorized auctions has risen 237 percent in 2005. The average number of tickets per show sold this way jumped from 17 to 61 last year. But, according to Poindexter, artists and fans have reacted so eagerly that soon Ticketmaster may put as much as half the house on sale by auction for certain shows.

Because this might raise prices overall, observers like Gary Bongiovanni, editor of the concert trade magazine Pollstar, believe some artists are "gun shy that the public will perceive this as gross profiteering."

Yet the industry feels it's more fair for the money to go to those involved in the show than to outsiders. And Poindexter argues that "dynamic pricing" at the top end can lead to a corresponding reduction in prices at the bottom, with people bidding down the nosebleed seats.

Regardless, Bongiovanni believes fans will get over whatever negative perceptions they have, the same way they did with corporate sponsorship at concerts. "People used to be wary," he says. "Now, no one's concerned."

New TV crime drama fails to thrill

By Ed Bark
The Dallas Morning News

When in doubt, reload with crime dramas. That's the law of the network jungle, but available shooting ranges are getting scarce. Sometimes you have to fight firepower with firepower, even if it means assaulting viewers with a wall-to-wall barrage of bullets, bad men and banter.

NBC and ABC are the latest offenders, respectively adding "Heist" and "The Evidence" on Wednesdays at 10 p.m. EST, where CBS already has "CSI: NY" in place.

"Heist," which should be stuffed in a trunk and sunk to new depths, is supplanting "Law & Order" for at least the next few weeks. "The Evidence," a marginally better cop caper, is replacing "Invasion" for a while.

NBC brags that "Heist" is "unlike anything else." Except that it's almost exactly like "Ocean's Eleven" and its sequel, absent any style or overall coherence.

Heistmeister Mickey O'Neil (Dougray Scott) is a George Clooney sound-alike with four career criminals under his thumb. Specializing in knocking off Southern California's finest banks and jewelry stores, they're more or less pitted against a hatch of detectives commandeered by the curt Amy Sykes (Michele Hicks).

None of them can stop wisecracking, even for a minute. As when Mickey's right-hand man, James Johnson (Steve Harris), spits out, "Sid Vicious. Otis Redding. Tim Buckley. Karen Carpenter."

And Mickey just as quickly rejoins: "Overdose. Plane Crash. Overdose and underdose."

Over on the good-guy side of the fence, heavyset dick Billy O'Brien (Billy Gardell) is either feeding his face or spewing vitriol. His reluctant new partner, black detective Tyrese Evans, sees Billy as fat, obnoxious and racist, not necessarily in that order.

Billy, of course, has a comeback: "This is just like 'Lethal Weapon.' Except I actually do hate you."

No, this actually is more like having a boil drained, only not as much fun. Contrived, distasteful and altogether reprehensible, "Heist" even aims its two-by-four humor at the remains of an innocent pizza delivery kid who's been wired with explosives and then blown to bits when a bank job goes bad.

"Remaining eye, unresponsive," says detective Billy, who then wants to break for lunch.

Hard to believe that this is directed by accomplished feature film dude Doug Liman ("Mr. & Mrs. Smith," "The Bourne Identity"), who must have compromising pictures of NBC execs in a dossier somewhere. "Heist" has less direction than a shopping cart with a wobbly front wheel. It fills its time with disjointed crimes and cursory crime-planning, all accompanied by far more badinage than the law should allow.

"I can actually hear you getting fatter," big Billy O'Brien is informed.

Keep "Heist" out of sight, out of mind, and you won't have that problem.

Over on ABC, "The Evidence" begins with somber descriptions of "Item" this and "Item" that. Wednesday's premiere concerns the murder of pharmacist Laura Green, whose case will be solved with help from a bloody cell phone, a gold locket bearing her picture, a flower arrangement and "human finger, severed, with attached compass ring."

On the trail are San Francisco inspectors Sean Cole (Rob Estes) and Cayman Bishop (Orlando Jones), who banter to better effect than the dopes on "Heist." Still, does wizened forensics specialist Sol Goldman (Martin Landau) really have to call his young charges "hamburgers and cheeseburgers?" Get outside the bun.

Inspector Cole has a back story. He's still grieving the murder of his wife, whom he found shot through the head a year ago. The killer remains at large, giving Cole good reason to brood while still resisting some heavy eye-batting from a comely uniformed cop.

Wednesday's premiere does have a surprise development near the end. And Estes' character likely will sop up some viewer sympathy before the closing credits roll.

sive zones. UMass has had a tendency to be careless with the ball in this section of the field, resulting in numerous unforced turnovers — errors that Cannella feels are the results of mental lapses.

"We need to be a little bit more disciplined out there on the field," Cannella said. "We've played well offensively and defensively, but we haven't played well between the lines."

While this week's schedule — three games in seven days — is less than ideal, the short layoff means that the Minutemen won't be able to spend much time dwelling on the loss to Albany. Cannella is not one to look back, and has already moved on.

"You have to [put the loss behind you]," Cannella said. "It's consistent with what we talk about, you have to put every play behind you whether it was good or bad. If you don't, you'll struggle, and if you do, you have a better chance [of being successful]."

Following the Brown game, UMass will have a busy spring break, playing two more games next week. The first opponent will be Sacred Heart (0-4) on Tuesday at 3 p.m. at Garber Field.

The Pioneers are off to a slow start, but have lost three of their four games by less than two goals. And with only two days separating the Brown and Sacred Heart games, Cannella expects a tough test.

"That's a Tuesday game coming off of a Saturday game, so we're going to have to be ready regardless of who we're playing," Cannella said. "Sacred Heart is a very formidable group."

The Minutemen will finish up spring break with their first ECAC contest of the season, a home clash with Loyola (2-2) at noon next Saturday.

Loyola has dominated the all-time series, winning all nine of the previous meetings. This game could prove to be critical, as UMass takes to the road for three of its next four games against ECAC foes after hosting the Greyhounds.

Senior defenseman Jack Reid and UMass will have a busy spring break playing three games. The Minutemen head to Brown on Saturday and then host Sacred Heart on Tuesday and Loyola next Saturday.

completely changed the face of that game. In fact, that's a perfect phrase to describe him. Redick is a game-changer.

That's all the case I'm going to make here because that's simply all I have to say, J.J. Redick.

Would you just shut up?

I don't know about you, but I am completely sick of the word "bracketology." Who gave ESPN and CBS the literary license? Seriously, I would really like to know.

Just let me get this straight. There is a word given to the process by which fat slobs fill out their illegal office pool brackets? All that stuff doesn't matter anyways. The guys that always win those things are the ones who pin the bracket up on a dart board and pick their teams by which ones they hit.

You know what? I'm going to force the boys in Bristol to make Bracketology 101 a course. It could be given exclusively in the spring and maybe Chancellor Lombardi could get Vitale to teach it along with Andy Katz as a TA. I'm sure that final exam would put a certain former Georgia assistant coach's final to shame.

Well now I'm starting to ramble, so I guess all that there's left to say is: Let the madness begin.

Final Four, but the Zags aren't deep enough to make that happen.

In the Washington D.C. region, if UConn actually shows up to play they shouldn't have any problem setting up a regional final matchup with North Carolina. As much as I'd like to see the Huskies fall on their face in the tourney, they are too talented to not make it to Indianapolis.

In the Minneapolis region, I'm less worried about Allan Ray's eye injury than most and I think Villanova is this year's team of destiny. I think they'll be tested along the way by BC and then Florida in the regional final, but I see the 'Cats winning the region, and then cutting down the nets in Indy on April 3.

Rob Greenfield, Assistant Sports Editor
Final Four: UCLA over West Virginia, Villanova over Illinois.
Championship: Villanova over UCLA.

Bracket Breakdown: UCLA is everyone's hot pick this year, and I'm conforming by sending them to my Final Four. I don't think Gonzaga is for real and I just plain don't like John Calipari. So UCLA comes out of that bracket. Duke is going to lose because it has no depth. UConn is the obvious pick because of its overwhelming talent, but that would be too easy. Villanova will win the whole thing. It has the easiest set of teams to go through — Tennessee is the No. 2 seed — and has beaten the best teams in the nation. UConn trounced the Wildcats in the second matchup of the season, but the only way Villanova matches up with UConn is in the Final Four, which is unlikely. Then again, I usually end up with a bunch of red X's across my bracket, and my champion usually goes down in the first couple of rounds. So choosing something different than what you see above is probably the safe bet.

Eric Athas, Managing Editor
Final Four: Memphis over Duke, Connecticut over Villanova.
Championship: Memphis over Connecticut.

Bracket Breakdown: There really is no telling what will happen during this year's March Madness, and there is obviously no way of predicting the outcome — that's the point. Now I could be a wild and crazy managing editor, show some audacity and pick Southern, Oral Roberts, Albany and Monmouth to make it to Indy — but I'm not going to. Instead I'm going with the four powerhouses and betting that Cinderella won't make it home in time, and in some sense, will return to peasantry.

Sometimes there aren't any surprises in the Final Four, and I think this will be one of those years.

There are certainly surprises throughout the tourney, however, and that is what is so great about this game. Everyone has been talking about Syracuse, but I don't see the Orange making it past the second round. I see Gonzaga making it to the Elite Eight, and I have BC getting knocked out on March 16.

Brendan Hall, Sports Writer
Final Four: Duke over Memphis, Villanova over Illinois.
Championship: Villanova over Duke.

Bracket Breakdown: My sleeper picks are UAB and Wisconsin-Milwaukee. Sure, the Blazers didn't have the greatest non-conference schedule for a Conference USA team, and sure, Bruce Pearl isn't coaching the Panthers anymore. But UAB is arguably the fastest team in the nation, and they will sneak up and take you down from behind when you least expect it — that means you, UConn. Just ask John Calipari how he feels after his then-No. 3 Memphis Tigers went scoreless for eight minutes down the stretch in a six-point season finale loss. As for UWM, Pearl left the cupboard full, and the hot Panthers are just starting to get comfortable in the adjustment from a 1-2-1-1 to a half-court — but not like anyone will take notice.

Everyone talks about how good the Big East and ACC are, and for the most part there is substance to the argument. However, I don't think I've seen this level of a playing field in a while — I'm even counting the Pac-10 in this — which is why I had an incredibly hard time filling out this year's bracket. Missouri Valley be damned, heads will roll by the handful before you can even say "Erin Go Brah."

Jon Pelland, Sports Writer
Final Four: Duke over Kansas, Connecticut over Boston College.
Championship: Duke over Connecticut.

Bracket Breakdown: The 2006 NCAA Tournament could be the most wide open it has been for a long time. Earlier in the season people were saying Duke was a shoo-in for the National Championship, but that has all changed with the struggles the Blue Devils and top-scorer J.J. Redick have had as of late. UConn will almost certainly come out of a weak D.C. bracket, but even they may lack the go-to shooter that is needed to make it to Indianapolis. Sure Rudy Gay is a terrific all-around player, but do you really want him to take the pressure shot with the game on the line?

Oakland and Minneapolis are the two toughest brackets to judge. UCLA might be overrated with a No. 2 seed in Oakland, and Adam Morrison's Gonzaga team faced some tough adversity in their conference tournament. I like Kansas to make it to Indianapolis from the Bay Area. Question marks surrounding Allan Ray's eye injury and Ohio State being a year away surround the Minneapolis bracket. Look for BC to continue their run that started in the ACC tournament. Although they didn't win the title they still showed they can hang with the best of the best in a tough conference.

Danny Picard, Sports Writer
Final Four: Duke over Gonzaga, Connecticut over Florida.
Championship: Duke over Connecticut.

Bracket Breakdown: It's that time of year again, and I must admit, I am a bracket groupie, and I love to choose high seeds to make it deep. This year is no different, with my Final Four including Duke, Gonzaga, Connecticut and Florida.

I don't see too many upsets in this year's tournament, but the Washington, D.C. region should look out for Michigan State. Look for Tom Izzo's Spartans too upset North Carolina early and advance to the Elite Eight, where the best game of the tournament will be played between Connecticut and Michigan State.

Florida is my surprise pick for the group of four heading to Indianapolis, but look for them to get run over by UConn. Also, Gonzaga does not stand a chance against Duke in the semi-finals. The Blue Devils and Huskies are the two best teams in the nation and are destined to face each other in the National Championship game. Expect J.J. Redick will shoot the lights out in this one.

Jeremy Rice, Sports Writer
Final Four: Duke over Kansas, Connecticut over Villanova.
Championship: Duke over Connecticut.

Bracket Breakdown: Since UMass isn't even in the tournament, I really have no one to root for in particular, so I'm going with experience on this one. UConn has won it a couple times recently, so I expect their coach can do it again with a new group of students.

J.J. Redick will fall just short of bringing a National Championship home for those crazy Duke fans. I really wish Coach K had taken the L.A. Lakers coaching job instead, anyway.

Kansas is the only team I see making it to the Final Four who isn't a No. 1 seed, but it's also the pick I'm the least sure about. UCLA has a strong case in that region as well, but the "East Coast Bias" prevents me from picking them.

Villanova is in a pretty tough region, but I think they will outlast Boston College, Florida and Ohio State.

A sleeper to look out for is BC. The Eagles took Duke to the final seconds in the ACC championship game, and it nearly convinced me that they have what it takes to go deeper into the tournament than most people think.

Domenic Poli, Sports Writer
Final Four: Duke over San Diego State, Georgetown over North Carolina.
Championship: Duke over Georgetown.

Bracket Breakdown: As yet another season of March Madness begins to take the nation by storm, analysts left and right are putting in their two cents on how they think it will all pan out. Not wanting to be left out of the fun, I've decided to throw my hat into the ring.

Let's start with the Atlanta region.

Duke University is No. 1 for a reason. Take its talented roster, coach K's expertise, stir well and you have a recipe for success.

The Blue Devils will beat the champs of the Oakland region, San Diego State (that's right, San Diego State), in the semifinals, sending the Aztecs home just short of the crown.

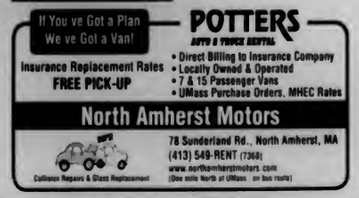
On the flip side of the bracket chart, Air Jordan's alma mater, the North Carolina Tar Heels, will triumph in the Washington D.C. region, but will be upset by Minneapolis' No. 7 Georgetown University in the semis.

Then on April 3 in Indianapolis, the Blue Devils and the Georgetown Hoyas will battle it out for the grand prize. J.J. Redick, arguably the best free-thrower shooter in basketball history, is red-hot right now and seems to thrive when the pressure's on. Georgetown will make a game of it, but Redick, with a little help from his friends, will help Duke University win its fourth NCAA Championship.

Joey White, Sports Writer
Final Four: Duke over UCLA, North Carolina over Boston College
Championship: Duke over North Carolina.

Bracket Breakdown: I fought every fiber of my being to pick Duke, but I'm not too worried about their path to the final four being in the Atlanta bracket, which does not impress me at all. UNC upsets UConn in the Elite Eight and slips by BC to reach the championship game, but Duke wants its revenge from its loss on senior night to the Tar Heels and the Blue Devils get it after fighting off a second half surge. Duke wins 91-87 to become the 2006 NCAA Division I champions.

Eli Rosenswaike, Sports Writer
Final Four: Connecticut over Villanova, Duke over Memphis.
Championship: Connecticut over Duke.



Bracket Breakdown: Yes, I know ... never have all four No. 1 seeds reached the Final Four. It probably won't happen this year, either, but these are the four safest picks and it's almost a guarantee that I will get at least two of these right, which is nothing to scoff at. Who knows, maybe three will be right or maybe this is the year they all make it.

Maybe I am a wuss for making these picks but I just didn't quite have the gall to pick some of the other teams. This is a weak field and I don't have a lot of faith in any team in the whole tournament. A couple teams to look out for that aren't seeded No. 1 are Iowa, Texas, Pitt, Indiana, Michigan State, Boston College and Georgetown. I could see some of these teams going further that what many people predict.

Indiana will give Gonzaga a real tough time in Round 2 and could definitely win the game. Marco Killingsworth is one of the best players in the country and Gonzaga has lost in the second round three years in a row.

UM looks to rebound

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

If there's one drawback to reaching elite status in athletics, it's that every opponent raises their game a notch to try and knock you off. The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has experienced this first-hand this year, as the No. 7 Minutemen (3-1) have been tested all season by inspired challengers, including Albany, the team that handed UMass its first loss of the season on Tuesday.

UMass coach Greg Cannella knows that opponents get hyped up to play his squad and he says that consistently meeting the opposition's intensity level is a challenge for all premier teams.

"The hardest thing for our guys, and for any team, is it's really hard to stay on top because you have those people really gunning for you and they are going to give you their best," Cannella said. "You have to be able to match that, and that's a hard thing to do."

Cannella expects UMass's next opponent, Brown (2-2), to bring its top game when the Maroon and White travel to Providence to face the Bears on Saturday at 1 p.m.

"They'll be fired up to play us, like everybody else is," Cannella said. "They're a very well-coached team and they have some great experience on the attack side. It's going to be a battle."

Heading into Saturday's matchup on the heels of a loss is something new to this year's squad, but Cannella expects that after making some small adjustments the Minutemen will be able to get back on track.

"Any time you lose you reevaluate everything you do, particularly as a coach," Cannella said. "But we're confident in our guys these are our guys. We're not going to change anything. We just need to tighten up and understand how important every opportunity to play is and go out there and give it our all."

Senior attacker Sean Morris and the Minutemen will be looking to get back on the winning track Saturday when they face Brown at 1 p.m. on the road. UMass lost for the first time on Tuesday to Albany.

One area that Cannella would like to see tightened up is the play in the middle of the field between the offensive and defen-

Plenty of questions in March Madness

Jon Pelland

Comedian Dane Cook once did a spoof on those girls who love to go out to the clubs and dance the night away. He said you would never see a guy turn to his friends and say, "Tonight, I just gotta dance," the way the ladies do. I'm going to prove Dane wrong and make it known right now that as of today, all I want to do is dance.

I am of course talking about the Big Dance, the NCAA Basketball Tournament, and not the act of putting gel in my hair and wearing skin tight shirts to go shake my moneymaker. That will be saved for a later date (just kidding). Right now, I just can't wait for the Tournament to begin.

This year's madness could quite possibly be the most "mad" I've ever seen it. The field seems like it is open to anybody who catches a hot streak and rides it all the way to the Final Four on April 1. Breaking down the brackets this year seems a little harder than in March's gone by. Here I'm going to dive into the bracket and answer some of the questions that surround this year's tournament.

ANOTHER PIECE OF CAKE, MR. CALHOUN?

The honor of being deemed the easiest region goes to Washington, D.C. Sure the nation's capital sports the likes of UConn and North Carolina, but besides those two there isn't too much more competition. The only way the selection committee could have made it easier on UConn was if they gave the Huskies a bye all the way to Indianapolis.

What about second seeded Tennessee, you ask? Sure, the Volunteers look like a legitimate contender at first glance, but if you look closer they aren't all that much to get excited about. First of all, they lost to non-dancer South Carolina in the SEC conference tournament, in the quarter finals no less. Also, I don't see anyone on the team effectively defending the likes of Rudy Gay and Tyler Hansbrough.

Just yesterday someone tried to argue with me that D.C. was not the weakest region by giving George Mason as evidence. Give me a break. The Patriots play in the Colonial Athletic Conference and will be without guard Tony Skinn, who was suspended one game by the team. The kid tried to punch a Hofstra player in the face during a game and you want me to give them respect? I don't think so.

JUDGE JUDY'S GUESS IS AS GOOD AS MINE

The toughest region to judge, in terms of who is going to make it to Indianapolis, is Oakland. So far I've seen experts pick four different teams to come out of the Bay Area (Memphis, UCLA, Gonzaga and Kansas). This region definitely has the most teams who are capable of making the Final Four, but whether or not they do is still to be determined.

I personally don't see the Bruins getting past the Sweet 16 and Gonzaga also isn't a lock. Although the Bulldogs won their conference tournament, they were put through dogfights in the last two games, one of which they easily could have lost.

Memphis is also another team that is up in the air. Working against them is the fact that they played in a disgustingly weak Conference USA this season. Although they rolled through their league play, they struggled when faced with the likes of Duke and Texas.

THEY'LL STILL BE DANCING AFTER MIDNIGHT

Each and every year there is one team that shocks us all and they are labeled as the Cinderella of the tournament. Last year the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee became the nation's darling when they crashed the tournament and made it all the way to the Sweet 16. My pick for this year's "Cinderfella" (yes, that is stolen from ESPN) might surprise you. I think the team that shocks us all is going to be Kansas.

It's OK read it again to make sure your eyes are deceiving you, but they're not. The Jayhawks are going to be the team that surprises everybody in 2006. I know what you're thinking: "There is no way a No. 4 seed can be a Cinderella." Just hear me out. Entering this season, the expectations for KU weren't very high at all. Actually, since they made to the National Championship game a couple of years ago they haven't been expected to do much of anything.

As soon as you calm down, consider this. Coming into this year the Jayhawks weren't even ranked in the top 25 and weren't supposed to do squat in a pretty strong Big 12 conference. This young team caught fire during the second half of the season that included a big win over Oklahoma on Feb. 2 and a blow-out of Texas in the conference tournament. Don't get me wrong, the Jayhawks won't be cutting down any nets come April 3, but they will go deep into the tournament.

A BUST IN A NO. 2'S CLOTHING

I feel sorry for all of you out there in bracketland that picked the Bruins of UCLA to go any farther than the Sweet 16. Actually check that, you're tempting fate if you advanced the Bruins past the second round. My bracket has them losing to Marquette just two songs into the dance.

Unless we're talking about softball, the Pac-10 is never really an extremely competitive conference. The league does sport four teams, but at least two of them will be watching from home by the time the second round rolls around.

Also, if you play in a weak conference, I'm big on having a tough non-league schedule. That's one of my knocks on BC this year; they've played virtually no one outside of the ACC. The Bruins actually had a pretty good non-conference schedule, but they didn't fare too well against those teams. They took on four tournament teams during the regular season but were only able to defeat Albany, who is a No. 16 seed, and Nevada. They were beaten by the likes of Memphis and West Virginia.

WHICH TEAM WILL SHOW UP?

The play of Syracuse in the regular season and the Big East Tournament is a classic example of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. The Orange struggled all season long and before last week weren't even supposed to be playing today. Then they went on their now famous run with senior guard Gerry McNamara at the helm.

Granted they won the Big East tournament, I still found it hard to believe that 'Cuse could be given a No. 5 seed. I see them down more around the six-to-eighth seed region. The right team needs to show up these next few weeks in order for Jim Boeheim's crew to go deep into March Madness. If the team that got embarrassed by DePaul rolls into this weekend, then kiss the Orange goodbye, but they'll be flying high if they can keep the magic that got them through the conference playoffs.

Obviously the biggest key will be the play of the "overrated" McNamara (please, that assistant coach should be fired on the spot). McNamara comes from the shoot-first-pass-second school of point guards. He can't think that way during the tournament. He needs to blend playmaking and scoring a la Steve Nash. The conference tournament is the best proof of this. Last week McNamara's scoring was down and his assists were up and look what happened: four straight wins and an automatic bid for the tournament.

SURELY YOU'RE NOT SURPRISED

In the words of Dick Vitale, he's awesome, baby! That's right, your tournament MVP is going to be none other than Mr. Redick from the Blue Devils. Coming down to the wire, I wouldn't want to have anybody else taking a clutch 3-pointer but number four. Look what he did to BC in the ACC championship game. That span when he hit three 3-pointers in a row

Breaking down the NCAA's

It's the most wonderful time of the year. No, it's not Christmas season – even though it snowed in Amherst yesterday.

It's Tourney Time. Bubbles have already burst, and brackets are about to bust. Someone is about to slide on a Cinderella slipper, while others will do their best to avoid the void of a victory.

Can Carolina capture consecutive crowns after seeing a change to its roster a la "That '70s Show"? Can Duke ride Redick all the way to Indy, or will McNamara's magic be too much for the Atlanta regional to overcome?

And what about Memphis and Villanova? Despite both programs rolling through the regular season on their way to No. 1 seeds, no one wants to give 'em their props.

Hampton has already headed home to watch the tourney on the tube like the rest of us, and 32 more teams will join them in just four days.

Without further ado, here is how the Collegian sports staff breaks down the brackets.

JEFF HOWE, SPORTS EDITOR

Final Four: Duke over UCLA, North Carolina over Florida

Championship: North Carolina over Duke.

Bracket Breakdown: Roy Williams is about to embark on the greatest six-game coaching display in NCAA Tournament history, and the Tar Heels will take the crown back home to Chapel Hill behind tourney MVP Tyler Hansbrough.

Interestingly enough, it will be a Final Four consisting of a quartet that would have been just as suited to make it to the national semifinals in 1996 as they are in 2006.

If UCLA does in fact survive in Oakland and earns a date with Duke, the Bruins may be able to play enough defense to shut down J.J. Redick and Duke's outstanding perimeter play, and that would be a matchup the Blue Devils really would hope to avoid. Redick hasn't done well against teams that stay in his face throughout the game. It has been a game plan that UNC has used almost to perfection for four years now.

On the right side of the bracket, keep an eye on Nevada and star big man Nick Fazekas. The Wolf Pack will cause a huge matchup problem for Boston College in the second round. They probably don't have enough around Fazekas to beat BC over the course of the whole game, but this game will come down to perimeter play, which is as much of a wild card in March basketball as anything.

Viva Chapel Hill.

DAN DUGGAN,
ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR

Final Four: Duke over Pittsburgh, Villanova over Connecticut.

Championship: Villanova over Duke.

Bracket Breakdown: I'll come right out and say that I have very little confidence in my picks this year, but that's what makes the NCAA Tournament the best sporting event there is — no one knows what's going to happen. So while I make no guarantees that these predictions have any chance of happening, here's my take on how this tournament will shake out.

In the Atlanta region, my sleeper team is sleeper team from a year ago: West Virginia. I see them making a run back to the Elite Eight, before falling to Duke.

I'll admit I have no clue about the Oakland region so I'm going with my sleeper Final Four team here: Pittsburgh. It would be nice if Gonzaga could make a run and set up a Morrison-Redick matchup in the Clockwise from top left: Duke's J.J. Redick, Villanova's Kyle Lowry, Memphis's Rodney Carney (10) and Connecticut's Rudy Gay will all look to lead their No. 1 seeded teams to the Final Four. The Collegian sports staff makes its predictions above on who will make it to Indianapolis.

Gay adoption rift widens gap of church, state

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — Massachusetts, one of the most Catholic states in the country, is witnessing an ever-widening rift between church and state on a raft of social issues, from gay marriage and abortion "buffer zones" to stem cell research and emergency contraception.

The schisms reveal the once mighty political clout of the Catholic Church in Massachusetts is in a state of flux. Large numbers of state lawmakers still identify themselves as Catholic but are picking and choosing when to side with the church, and when to break with it.

The recent decision of Catholic Charities, the Boston Archdiocese's social service agency, to end its century-old adoption program rather than comply with state law barring discrimination against gays is just the latest fissure.

Part of the church's declining clout may be the clash between its strict moral views and the messy business of politics, observers say.

"When the church has a position, it tends to be categorical," said Tufts University political science professor Jeffrey Berry. "Lawmakers want their interest groups to take half a loaf and the church isn't eager to bargain. They want it their way."

The church is already resisting a new law requiring all hospitals to distribute emergency contraception to rape victims upon demand and church leaders are backing a proposed ballot initiative that would rewrite the state constitution to overturn the historic state Supreme Judicial Court ruling that legalized same-sex marriages in 2004.

The erosion of the church's political influence came into stark relief when leaders of the Massachusetts House and Senate, both Catholics, vowed to fight efforts by the state's four Catholic bishops to win an exemption to the anti-discrimination law which they said would let them continue adoptions without violating church teaching.

The only top politician to side with Boston Archbishop Sean O'Malley and other Catholic leaders was Republican Gov. Mitt Romney, a Mormon and possible 2008 presidential candidate.

Senate President Robert Travaglini, a Catholic, opposes the exemption. He said he treats the church as he would any other constituent, giving church leaders "no more or less influence on the deliberations in this building than anybody else."

"I'm very comfortable with my relationship with my creator. The teachings of the church have founded me and established a position in life for me both politically, both professionally and spiritually," said Travaglini. "I'm very comfortable whenever there's a difference."

Opponents of the exemption, including Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey, a Republican candidate for governor in this fall's elections, said they didn't want to set a bad precedent.

While the church has found itself at odds with state lawmakers on issues like abortion, gay marriage and stem cell research, it hasn't always faced a roadblock in the Legislature.

For example, Massachusetts remains one of about a dozen states in the country without a death penalty, which the Roman Catholic church opposes.

UMass professor to address domestic spying

By Matt Belliveau

The American Civil Liberties Union of Massachusetts will host a Regional Town Meeting on the Bush Administration's Domestic Spying Program featuring University of Massachusetts professor and United States Congressman Richard Neal and former Republican Congressman Bob Barr on Thursday, March 23 from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. at Elms College in Chicopee.

The event is taking place just days after Congress voted to reauthorize many of the most controversial provisions of the USA Patriot Act and in the midst of public debate over the legality of government wiretapping without a warrant, as well as U.S. practices at Guantánamo Bay and other detention facilities.

"The impetus for this meeting is the growing evidence that our Government is spying on ordinary Americans," said Carol Rose, Executive Director of the ACLU of Massachusetts. "But we face an even larger question of how we will preserve and defend the rule of law in the face of a President who asserts that he is above it."

The ACLU and a coalition of organizations and individuals are suing the NSA to stop what supporters claim a "warrant less" government eavesdropping on Americans.

In addition, the ACLU has filed suit against top-level administration officials seeking to hold them accountable for torture practices.

"The prohibition against government eavesdropping on American citizens is well-established and crystal clear, as is Congressional legislation against torture," said Rose. "President Bush's claim that he is not bound by the law on either of these issues is simply astounding. It's time to debunk the myth that the President has the power to set aside laws passed by Congress whenever he sees fit."

In addition to Ms. Rose, the program will feature Congressman Neal; former Republican Congressman Bob Barr, who currently is chairman of Patriots to Restore Checks and Balances, a national coalition; William Newman, staff attorney in the Western Massachusetts office of the ACLU of Massachusetts; and Michael Bissonnette, Mayor of Chicopee.

The event is part of a statewide campaign named "Restore the Rule of Law" that oppose government policies of unlawful domestic surveillance, kidnapping, rendition, torture, secret prisons and "ghost detainees."

Congressman Neal has represented the Second Congressional District of Massachusetts since 1988. He began his public service career in 1973 as an Assistant to Springfield Mayor William Sullivan, was elected to the Springfield City Council in 1978, and served as Mayor of the City of Springfield from 1984 until 1989. He is a member of the powerful Ways and Means Committee, where he continues to play an active role in public policy debates relating to tax, trade, health care, welfare, Medicare and Social Security. Congressman Neal is the lead sponsor of legislation to prevent American companies from moving offshore to avoid paying U.S. taxes. He is a member of the Social Security Subcommittee, where he has successfully combated efforts to privatize Social Security. Congressman Neal is an At-Large Whip for the House Democrats.

Bob Barr is a former Member of Congress, representing the Seventh Congressional District of Georgia from 1995 to 2003, serving as a senior member of the Judiciary Committee and as Vice-Chairman of the Government Reform Committee. He was appointed by President Reagan to serve as the United States Attorney for the Northern District of Georgia (1986-90), and served as President of Southeastern Legal Foundation (1990-91). He was an official with the CIA (1971-78), and practiced law for many years. He continues to serve on the Board of Directors of the National Rifle Association and works with such groups as Harvard University, the American Conservative Union Foundation, and the ACLU on issues related to privacy and national security, and also serves as the Chairman of Patriots to Restore Checks and Balances.

Hanging up on talkative drivers

Mark Riggs tries to handle steering, shifting and watching the road, all while talking on his cell phone.

By Zola Coleman & Jason Millman
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

BOSTON — Massachusetts's drivers may not be able to have one hand on their cell phone and one hand on the wheel if a new bill passes through the state legislature.

Following the example of other states, the Joint Committee on Transportation met Wednesday to discuss a bill that would prohibit the use of certain "handheld electronic devices," notably cell phones, while driving. Citing safety concerns, the bill would require drivers to use headsets while talking on the phone.

Rep. Joseph Wagner (D-Chicopee) requested that the committee to push a vote back until April 4, asking for more time to consider issues he called "matters of great interest to the public."

Wagner said in a Feb. 21 article in The Republican that the growing number of drivers on the road combined with the widespread use of cell phones spell danger for state motorists.

"Every year, the number of licensed drivers is increasing more and more," Wagner said. "Yet, the capacity of roadways is not increasing. If you add the distraction of cell phones, then it makes sense that our roads are not getting safer."

Sen. Steven Baddour (D-Haverhill), who expressed the greatest opposition to the bill at Wednesday's event, said banning hand-held cell phones alone would not make drivers safer on the road because there are many factors that contribute to reckless driving.

Baddour added that some studies have shown that most accidents are caused by people who do not pay attention to the road, and cell phones are not necessarily the cause of this phenomenon.

"People are too comfortable while driving," Baddour said. "Cars have become an extension of their homes."

A 2001 study conducted by the Harvard Center for Risk Analysis estimated motorists talk on their cell phones anywhere between 300 and 1,200 minutes per year. The study also that estimated chatty motorists cause 2,600 deaths and 330,000 injuries in America per year.

The state's consideration of a cell phone ban will be expected to follow the guidelines other states have established in banning hand-held cell phones while driving.

New York was the first state to ban hand-held cell phones in November 2001, but recent studies have shown that the law has not prevented people from using their cell phones in their vehicles.

According to a Feb. 4, 2004 Associated Press article, 2.3 percent of New York drivers used hand-held cell phones before the law went into effect. That rate fell to 1.1 percent in the first few months after the law was passed, but by March 2003, 2.1 percent of New York drivers were back to talking on their cell phones.

In July 2004, New Jersey implemented a law that made talking on hand-held cell phones a secondary offense, meaning a driver could only be fined for talking on a cell phone if a cop had pulled over the driver for another offense. New Jersey amended that law earlier this month to make hand-held cell phones a primary offense.

Cell phone ban proponents point to the large amounts of revenue traffic violations generate for state governments. In a one-year period before August 2004 and August 2005, New Jersey police wrote 11,000 tickets for cell phone violations and New York police wrote 100,000 tickets, according to a Feb. 27 WPI-TV Philadelphia report.

Romney funds pet project

CHELSEA — Gov. Mitt Romney bid farewell on Thursday to Doug Foy, secretary of the Office of Commonwealth Development, by providing $517 million in funding for his pet project: smart growth.

The bulk of the money — $501 million — will be low-interest loans to cities and towns that are trying to boost development around transit hubs or that have changed their zoning to encourage housing development.

The remaining $15.5 million will be in direct grants to communities such as Chelsea, which is receiving $500,000 for a pedestrian walkway that will be included in a larger housing development on Gerrish Avenue.

"I think this is going to be the most lasting, visual effect of this administration, perhaps, that we can imagine," the governor said as he stood in a metal fabricating shop that will be torn down and replaced with 18 units of affordable housing. In all, 120 homes will be built along the street, near City Hall.

"We found a way to stop what was the prior path, which was just cutting down trees and sprawling the development of our commonwealth further and further away from our city centers," the governor added.

Foy, whom Romney named the first appointee in an office he created to improve efficiency between government development agencies, announced recently he was resigning, effective Thursday.

Once the former president of the Conservation Law Foundation, Foy had been a proponent of so-called smart growth, including the construction of housing near commuter hubs and the redevelopment of industrial sites as dwellings.

IPods substitute lecturers for some colleges

By Andrew Maurer
The Independent Collegian (U. Toledo)

TOLEDO, Ohio — Everyone had one – that teacher in high school who made computers a mandatory tool for every project when it seemed as if poster board and markers were just as adequate.

Like that teacher, a new service from the Web site pickaprof.com adds another technological step to the learning process.

This semester, the scheduling and professor review site has introduced CourseCasting, which allows professors to post recordings of their class lectures online for students to download to mp3 players or computers.

According to Karen Bragg, director of university relations for pickaprof.com, CourseCasting allows students the chance to review lectures and reinforce the information presented in class.

However, few, if any, University of Toledo professors are participating in the service, she said.

"Because the service was just introduced, not many professors have had a chance to adopt it for their classes," Bragg said. "We tried the service as a test at the University of Texas and at Texas A&M in fall of 2005, and it was very successful. This is why we chose to extend the service to the rest of the 138 campuses served by Pick-A-Prof."

Bragg said she anticipates a more widespread use of the technology in coming semesters.

Caroline Shipley, a junior majoring in philosophy, said she thinks such technological advances are positive.

"If I had the technology available, I'd definitely listen over and over," Shipley said. "Sign me up."

On the whole, though, students are not optimistic about the potential of the service.

"CourseCasting would be helpful for filling in information I may have missed, but at home there are too many comforts and distractions for me to pay attention to a whole lecture anyway," said Evan Jordan, a senior majoring in art.

For some students, the service seems to undermine the reasons people attend classes.

"Honestly, I probably wouldn't use it," said Logan Sheehan, a senior majoring in English. "With a lecture class it might work but not with a seminar, where the idea is that we all come together and teach each other."

Rachel Chapman, a junior majoring in sociology and Spanish, said she would only use CourseCasting if she missed class due to illness.

Students might also take advantage of the service and perhaps cease attending class at all, she added.

"Students wouldn't get the classroom experience and the opportunity to learn from classmates," Chapman said.

Paul Sell, a junior majoring in physics, wondered why students would bother going to class at all.

Bill gives Bush funds for wars, hurricanes

By Liz Sidoti
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush gets much of what he requested in a $92 billion House measure for wars and hurricane cleanup, despite a newfound willingness by GOP leaders to challenge the president. President Bush gets much of what he requested in a $92 billion House measure for wars and hurricane cleanup, despite a newfound willingness by GOP leaders to challenge the president.

The bill the House is expected to approve Thursday would bring the overall price tag for Iraq and Afghanistan operations since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to nearly $400 billion and total Hurricane Katrina-related spending to more than $100 billion.

In a flurry of morning votes, the House added to the bill $50 million for peacekeeping in Darfur, $26.3 million for Colombian efforts to fight narcotics trafficking and $55.9 million to rebuild parts of two hurricane-damaged military bases in south Mississippi.

Defying the president, the House last week inserted into the supplemental spending bill a provision that blocks Dubai-owned DP World from running or managing terminals at U.S. ports.

The president supported the company and initially threatened to veto any legislation delaying or killing DP World's effort to manage terminals at six major U.S. ports.

But the White House backed off that position after the company promised to sell its American operations under fierce bipartisan pressure from Congress. And, talk of a veto is absent from a Bush administration statement about its views on the bill.

On a 377-38 vote Wednesday, the House rejected an effort to strip the DP World provision from the bill. Because DP World plans to sell its U.S. operations, the vote was largely symbolic and the provision is likely to be eliminated from the final bill when House and Senate negotiators meet later this spring to compromise differences between their versions. The Senate has not yet completed its work.

Rep. Jerry Lewis (news, bio, voting record), R-Calif., chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, said Wednesday's vote sends "a strong and unmistakable message that the Congress and the American people stand united on the critical national security issue that involves the ports."

But some lawmakers derided the vote as purely for show.

"This is like making everybody feel good that they can thump their chests and say we're doing something really tough here. But it has no effect," Rep. Jim Kolbe (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., said.

The weeks' long conflict over port security has overshadowed the bulk of the spending measure, which provides $67.6 billion to pay for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and $19.1 billion in new money for hurricane recovery along the Gulf Coast.

Bush had requested $92.2 billion, but the House trimmed some of the hurricane-relief money.

The House is expected to overwhelmingly approve the bill. Voting against it would invite election-year criticism for Republicans and Democrats alike that they were shortchanging U.S. troops at war or abandoning Gulf Coast hurricane victims.

Because of that, Republicans have little choice but to back the measure even though some fear the impact of the spending on soaring federal deficits in a congressional election year.

The bill has been particularly difficult to swallow for conservatives, who agree that troops and the Gulf Coast need the money but object to how the administration and Congress are providing the dollars without cutting the budget elsewhere.

"We have to put our fiscal house in order," Rep. Mike Pence (news, bio, voting record), R-Ind., implored colleagues on the House floor.

Conservatives were expected to try — and fail — to get the GOP leadership to split the measure in two so that the lawmakers can soften the impact on the deficit by cutting money from other programs to offset the hurricane-recovery money.

Lewis said both the troops and hurricane victims need the money urgently.

A large number of Democrats also are expected to vote in favor of the bill, even though many object to how the Bush administration is handling the Iraq war.

"I'm not convinced that providing more money for Iraq will cure the problems in that country," Rep. Nita Lowey (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y., said. But, she added, "I think we owe our men and women in uniform in Iraq every tool to achieve success."

More kids taking Anti-Psychotic drugs

By Lindsey Tanner
Associated Press

CHICAGO — Soaring numbers of American children are being prescribed anti-psychotic drugs — in many cases, for attention deficit disorder or other behavioral problems for which these medications have not been proven to work, a study found.

The annual number of children prescribed anti-psychotic drugs jumped fivefold between 1995 and 2002, to an estimated 2.5 million, the study said. That is an increase from 8.6 out of every 1,000 children in the mid-1990s to nearly 40 out of 1,000.

But more than half of the prescriptions were for attention deficit and other non-psychotic conditions, the researchers said.

The findings are worrisome "because it looks like these medications are being used for large numbers of children in a setting where we don't know if they work," said lead author Dr. William Cooper, a pediatrician at Vanderbilt Children's Hospital.

The increasing use of anti-psychotics since the mid-1990s corresponds with the introduction of costly and heavily marketed medications such as Zyprexa and Risperdal. The packaging information for both says their safety and effectiveness in children have not been established.

Anti-psychotics are intended for use against schizophrenia and other psychotic illnesses.

However, attention deficit disorder is sometimes accompanied by temper outbursts and other disruptive behavior. As a result, some doctors prescribe anti-psychotics to these children to calm them down — a strategy some doctors and parents say works.

The drugs, which typically cost several dollars per pill, are considered safer than older anti-psychotics — at least in adults — but they still can have serious side effects, including weight gain, elevated cholesterol and diabetes.

Anecdotal evidence suggests similar side effects occur in children, but large-scale studies of youngsters are needed, Cooper said.

The researchers analyzed data on youngsters age 13 on average who were involved in annual national health surveys. The surveys involved prescriptions given during 119,752 doctor visits. The researchers used that data to come up with national estimates.

Cooper said some of the increases might reflect repeat prescriptions given to the same child, but he said that is unlikely and noted that his findings echo results from smaller studies.

The study appears in the March-April edition of the journal Ambulatory Pediatrics.

Heavy marketing by drug companies probably contributed to the increase in the use of anti-psychotic drugs among children, said Dr. Daniel Safer, a psychiatrist affiliated with Johns Hopkins University, who called the potential side effects a concern.

Saint Plastered Day

Duncan Devlin

Today is Saint Patrick's Day. That means three things. First of all, everyone is a little bit Irish. Secondly, if you are not wearing some sort of green clothing you should get beat up at some point today. And finally, this is the best day of the year to get drunk. Alcohol consumption is a large part of the UMass culture. Some people love to drink, and some people are a little too uptight for it. For this group, I would like to rant a little bit about why we lower folk are so happy poisoning our bodies.

Let me begin with barley and hops, the forbidden fruits. Growing up in America, it is nearly impossible not to know the legal drinking age is 21. This means that for the first 21 years of our lives, we are told that we are too young to drink. Of course, being kids, this leads to one major desire: drinking. Alcohol does its best to dominate the high school and college party scenes, and without it many people would realize just how crappy their music is.

There are a number of people who can cite all kinds of evidence as to why drinking is unhealthy. It causes liver damage, impairs your ability to drive and damages your heart. My response to this is pretty akin to that of the smoker: a really sarcastic "like we don't know that." The point of drinking beer is not to get all of your daily vitamins (well, unless you're Irish). The point of alcohol is to get drunk.

That brings up another big concern of mine. Have you ever been hanging out with a group of friends, and there is that one girl who states arrogantly, "I don't drink." She will then go on to tell you how evil drinking is, and how she will never do it, because she does not want to stumble around and act like a buffoon.

Well, I've got news for her and any of you reading this who are thinking the same thing: when we drink, we want to act like that. In drinking, we get dizzy, let our inhibitions down, slur our speech and do things we would never do in daylight. That's pretty much why we opened the bottle in the first place.

Oh, and for those of you who warn that alcohol removes your inhibitions,

The point of drinking beer is not to get all of your daily vitamins (well, unless you're Irish). The point of alcohol is to get drunk.

here's some advice: drop your inhibitions. Society tells you something is wrong, like, say, having sex with three guys and two girls in one night. Odds are, if a girl gets herself drunk and does that, it was her choice, and it was also probably the result of some deep seeded desire that she could never express with clear speech. Alcohol leads to fun; plain and simple.

What's up with all these "sober sex is good sex" posters around the campus? I will agree sober sex is a good thing. On the other hand, when Yoda is telling me, "sober sex, good it is," the first thing I want to do before a loving night with my girlfriend, the girl I just met, or a hooker I bought for a case of Budweiser, is down enough Jack Daniels to forget the advice of a Muppet on sex.

While I'm on the subject of sex, let me talk about some accusations. Men usually get a bad rap for being the initiators. It seems that one of the main goals of men is to find completely unsuspecting 18-year-old girls, get them drunk and then have sex with them. Nowhere in this whole scheme is it mentioned that the girl was fully willing to consume the alcohol, knowing the reputations of most men, and we seem to always forget that no matter how much alcohol a person consumes, she is still responsible for her own actions.

A final word on alcohol and sex: especially for those of you graduating soon. When you get older, you will realize that for many couples, alcohol is the last and only resort to actually having sex. As a marriage breaks down due to years of bickering over football games, raising kids and taxes, the excitement completely leaves the marriage. Thankfully, alcohol never loses its age old ability to turn even the most unsavory face into a warm and loving place to get some action.

So, this Saint Patrick's Day, whether you are a full blown alcoholic, or you have never touched a drop in your life, get out there and get plastered. You only live once, so make sure you pass the keys, and spend the extra gas money on another round of drinks. Personally, I am looking forward to my standard Irish seven course meal, but I really hope my dog runs off with the potato before I throw it at someone telling me all the reasons why I should put the drink down.

Bye-Bye Britney

Katelyn Harding

If Kelly Clarkson can survive the movie "From Justin to Kelly" and still win a Grammy, pop music can't be that bad, can it? The answer to that question might be a little more complicated than you think. Who can say what good music actually is anymore? We are inundated with talented musicians and then we tend to associate them in the same group with legendary artists. This clumping together of musicians is not right, and the distinction needs to be made, now.

In a recent issue of Rolling Stone, it discussed how music today pretty much stinks, so kids are listening to timeless bands such as Led Zeppelin, Jimi Hendrix and the Beatles. It was interesting to see 11-and 14-year-olds saying that Led Zeppelin is one of the greatest bands of all time.

Then you have another group of kids who think that Britney Spears is one of the greatest artists of all time. The difference between these two groups confuses me. How can people compare the song "Over the Hills and Far Away" to "Drive Me Crazy" on the radio?

Britney's music does just that and it should. It should infuriate the talented musicians who do not get the credit they deserve, because they don't sell out and over sex themselves. Just have more babies and buy some houses, Britney. You've made your millions, so enjoy it and please stop making us suffer with your terrible music.

Another thing about pop music that I absolutely hate is how they are inclined to make re-makes of songs that were perfectly fine to begin with. For example, Sheryl Crow's rendition of "Sweet Child of Mine." I'm pretty sure Axl had that song taken care of Ms. Crow, no need to ruin it. Can't people just acknowledge a good thing when they see it, and leave it alone?

Another thing about pop music that I absolutely hate is how they are inclined to make re-makes of songs that were perfectly fine to begin with: For example, Sheryl Crow's rendition of "Sweet Child of Mine." I'm pretty sure Axl had that song taken care of Ms. Crow, no need to ruin it.

In the movie "High Fidelity," John Cusack asks a very important question: "Was I miserable because I listened to pop music, or did I listen to pop music because I was miserable?"

Well John, I'd say both. If a music aficionado gets sucked into the pop world, they will most likely become miserable. Or, if they are already feeling down on themselves, they figure that listening to crappy music cannot make them feel any worse. Bad music is certainly not going anywhere. Now we have horrible groups such as the Pussycat Dolls that we have to force ourselves to endure.

Let me set the record straight, Led Zeppelin is probably one of the best bands that we will ever see, ever. Their music is timeless. I cannot even describe or put into words the emotions that arise when listening to their music; it is an amazing thing, and something that artists today will never be able to achieve. Maybe you only know "Tangerine" or "Stairway to Heaven" but you shouldn't feel bad. Those songs are better than any song playing on the radio today, and they always will be.

Led Zeppelin, Jimi Hendrix and the Beatles will still be here for us when we smarten up and realize that theirs is the only music that truly matters. They will never fade away or disappear, because their music is too strong. At the moment, we are immersed with horrible music that we can't help but just listen to. But we forget about it the minute it's over.

That's not good music. It's a mere distraction, something to occupy your brain for three minutes, but Led Zeppelin leaves lasting impressions that are hard to forget. Until people realize the unbelievable music they are missing out on, we'll just have to "stickwitchu" ...er... listen to bad pop music.

Saturn moon to get Iraq fate

Kevin Dooley

It was reported last week that NASA scientists discovered evidence that one of Saturn's moons, Enceladus, has Yellowstone-like geysers of water. The surprising discovery by NASA is putting Enceladus on the top of the list for potential life in our solar system. All the requirements for life could exist right underneath Enceladus' surface. News of this breakthrough discovery though has gotten the Bush administration thinking: Hey, if there is the possibility of life in our solar system we need to be out there to colonize them immediately. We need to spread democracy to the potential life from the water of Enceladus.

The Bush administration is currently working on a plan to send all of our astronauts to the planet immediately to colonize the geysers. The Bush administration has completely avoided dealing with NASA officials in this matter and is prepared to go it alone in their mission to defeat gravity, once and for all, and allow the potential life on Enceladus to be free. President Bush has explained that the potential life of Enceladus is currently under an oppressive regime, that being Saturn's gravitational pull.

The thought that we could ever invade Iraq and think that we could shove democracy, a secular idea at its roots, down their throats is as conceivable as being able to colonize Enceladus and transporting democracy there.

The people of Enceladus need to be a free people who under Saturn's rule, have been forced to follow the same orbit around the planet for billions of years, said Bush. The American people are a friend to potential life on Enceladus and we are here to free them of their attraction through gravity being forced upon them by the brutal dictatorship of Saturn.

You may think this plan is stupid, and would cost way too much of the taxpayer's money for a cause they would never benefit from. Most importantly, the astronauts would never be able to come back, or at least, not be able to come back for a long time. However, the thought that we could ever invade Iraq and think that we could shove democracy, a secular idea at its roots, down their throats is as conceivable as being able to colonize Enceladus and transporting democracy there. If Saturn had no gravitational pull on Enceladus, the moon would go flying off into space. It would be absolutely chaotic. It would upset the natural order of things. In short, it wouldn't be a good idea.

When you look at the current mess Iraq is in right now, there isn't much difference between Saturn's moon and that country. For democracy to flourish, as it has in the U.S. and in other European countries, there needs to be first a foundation of rational, enlightened thought. Its no coincidence that France and the United States experienced democratic upheavals just as the Enlightenment movement was taking shape in Europe.

To be sure, these experiments did not work right away. In the United States you had the miserable Articles of Confederation that left the national government hopelessly weak. In France you had the reign of terror. However, what is different about the formation of democracy in the United States and France and that of Iraq is that democracy occurred naturally in the latter two countries.

When you look at Iraq, the concept of democracy is not occurring naturally. For democracy to ever take shape in Iraq, or any Middle Eastern country for that matter, there needs to be an evolution away from thinking that emphasizes religion as the source for all truth in the world. Shiites and Sunni Muslims in Iraq are in a religious civil war, bombing mosques and killing innocent people, over a dispute which stems back to who the right successor to the Prophet Muhammad was over a millennium ago. This thinking my friends is not rational, not enlightened and not based on any reason. In short, the water coming out of geysers on Enceladus is more ready to accept democracy than Iraq.

Democracy has never worked where it is forced upon people. In the more than 1000 years that Islam has been in the Middle East, democracy has never flourished anywhere. Just like Enceladus will always be attracted to Saturn because of the strong gravitational pull Saturn has on it, Islam works in the same way.

Islam and its teachings have the same power as gravity does to Enceladus. You remove gravity or Islam and try to impose democracy on a people who are still fragmented on religious lines and who will never accept a government that does not represent their sect of Islam; the scene will quickly turn to a chaotic mess that has no direction, no future. Just think of Enceladus floating off into space. That's what Iraq is doing right now.

We have tried to remove their gravity and its not working. Surprise, surprise.

Reverse Discrimination at UMass

I am writing in response to the article in the Collegian and Boston Sunday Globe. In the articles, you, Michael Gargano, say coming to this University, students need to be exposed to different opinions and ideas. By separating the residential halls, you say students "shut themselves off, and then they are missing out." Let me pose a few questions, dear Vice Chancellor.

Have you ever spent a day in one of the Learning and Living Communities here on campus, also known as the "self-segregated living quarters at the University of Massachusetts Amherst?" How can you say that there is a lack of diversity amongst the students? Can you tell me what your definition of diversity is?

If diversity means that students of color should forcefully integrate themselves with the white students, I do not agree with your definition. In fact, students of color already integrate themselves on a daily basis with white students. We have to be in classes with the majority of the students everyday. To say that we, as students of color, are shutting ourselves off – you are wrong. I am not sure if you are aware of the fact that there is diversity among the students of color.

Take the Asian/Asian American students for example. One of the biggest misconceptions of Asian/Asian Americans is that all Asian/Asian Americans are the same. This is not true. You place a Vietnamese American student with a student of Japanese heritage and tell me that their cultures are the same. They are not the same at all.

So, how is it that we are "shutting" ourselves off to diversity? How is it that I am not being "exposed to different opinions and ideas?" There already is diversity in the Asian/Asian American community as well as the African/African American communities. A person from Nigeria would not necessarily have the same experiences as an African American born and raised in the United States.

As for the Northeast residential area being criticized as "Chinatown," I find it ironic given the history of the Chinese immigration to the United States. These immigrants created their own communities (i.e. Chinatown) because they were not allowed to live in predominately white neighborhoods. For those who labeled Northeast as "Chinatown," take a walk through it and tell me what is the ratio of white students to Asian/Asian American students. You will find that there is still a larger percentage of white students that reside in Northeast.

"There's nothing healthy about segregation" and that is true. However, this is not segregation. This is a chance for students of all backgrounds to learn about different cultures. Before it was changed to the Learning and Living Communities, the LLC was called the Special Interest Residential Program (SIRP).

These communities were here so that students of color had a chance to meet other people with similar backgrounds. It, however, did not exclude white students from living there. I put the blame on the so-called segregation on students who are not willing to join these residential programs. By eliminating these programs, you will be removing an integral part of campus that has a deep impact on student diversity.

By discouraging students from choosing to live with whomever they want, you, Vice Chancellor Gargano, are shutting us off and allowing us to miss out on other cultures. If you say that these LLC, which is only one floor of the building, are "self-segregating" then I think you should look at the residential areas that are predominately white, such as Orchard Hill, and try to spread diversity there.

Is there anything being done to create diversity in these areas on campus? Or do you believe that there is no problem? To me, I believe that is reverse discrimination. By eliminating the LLC, you are not allowing the people of color on this campus to live where they want. The students of color chose to live at these residential programs and were not placed there intentionally. When I lived on the LLC in Dwight, there were white students that chose to live there and learn about different cultures.

So, if the school is planning to "offer living quarters that bring together people with the same interests," there already is such a thing and it is called the Learning and Living Communities. Please remember that "if it isn't broken, don't fix it."

College students bypass beaches for service-oriented Spring Break

BY MARA ROSE WILLIAMS
KNIGHT RIDDER NEWSPAPERS

This spring break, thousands of students are trading white sand for Mississippi mud, bikinis for work boots and hotels for tents.

College students such as Brandon Dunklau, a 21-year-old University of Kansas student from Olathe, Kan., will help Hurricane Katrina victims struggling to recover along the Gulf Coast.

Dunklau originally considered "hanging out with some friends" in Jacksonville, Fla. He changed his mind when he learned that about 40 other student members of Navigators, a Christian organization on the Lawrence campus, were going to New Orleans to clean mud-soaked and mold-laden houses.

"I decided this is a much more worthy cause," said Dunklau, a junior studying social welfare.

A student network that coordinates alternative spring breaks estimates that more than 7,500 college students will converge on Gulf Coast cities over the next six weeks to help in the Katrina recovery effort. Although the students are well intentioned, strained communities are concerned about this flood of do-gooders.

"One of the big challenges is housing all the college volunteers," said Hamilton Simons-Jones, director of community service for Tulane University in New Orleans.

He said students would sleep in tents or on church floors. They will wash in portable showers and eat from Red Cross mobile kitchens.

Still, by the carloads these students — including hundreds from Missouri and Kansas — plan to rally on the Gulf Coast. Many have arrived, representing fraternities, sororities, athletic teams, student clubs, religious groups and churches. For most, the only cost is getting there. Spring break runs from early March to early April, depending on the school.

College and high school students have signed up for everything from wading calf-deep into stinky mud to remove unsalvageable items from homes to calling on social-service agencies as brokers seeking aid for hurricane victims.

The alternative spring break movement has been gaining interest. Students make mission trips to Mexico and South America, tutor migrant farm workers in Florida, build homes in Appalachia, register voters in rural Mississippi and work with the homeless in Washington, D.C.

"The traditional spring break now seems more like a waste because now there is this higher need they are being called to respond to," said Jill Piacitelli, director of Break Away, a student-run network for alternative spring breaks.

So powerful is the calling that grassroot student groups such as Katrina on the Ground have formed and are mobilizing students online.

MTV joined with United Way of America to follow 100 students as they clean homes, build houses and repair roofs in Biloxi, Miss., and Foley, Ala. As an alternative to the MTV "Spring Break" beach party, the efforts of these students will be broadcast March 20 in a documentary, "The Amazing Break."

Jon Holder, 19, a University of Missouri-Kansas City student from Lee's Summit, Mo., will be one of the 100 in MTV's storm corps.

Holder canceled a Colorado ski trip to head south for the effort. He will sleep in a tent and said he expected to remove a lot of debris and mold.

"When I get down there and put my hands on a house and really help someone, and see the outcome of the effort ... I will feel good about that," he said.

University of Missouri-Kansas City student Christopher Hughey, 22, left for New Orleans on March 4 to join about a half-dozen other students in an urban-planning course. For a week they surveyed neighborhoods for sites they will target for recovery. Their effort is being funded by a $300,000 federal grant to the university.

Students will design projects that promote tourism in neighborhoods outside the French Quarter.

"It is a lot of work and a lot of long hours," Hughey said. "But I think it is worthwhile to be able to help these people who have seen a lot of destruction and have been working very hard to try and rebuild their homes and bring their city back to its great status."

Joshua Holmes, 29, a University of Missouri-Columbia law student, spent his winter break in New Orleans, hunting by telephone for a disabled, elderly woman who was plucked by helicopter from a flooding highway days after Katrina. Her family hasn't seen or heard from her.

For his spring break, he is going back to join about 700 other law students who are members of the Student Hurricane Network. The first thing he'll do is see whether the woman has been found.

Then he will connect with other law students and interview some of the 5,000 people in New Orleans Parish who have not had access to a public defender and some of the thousands who were displaced or evicted from government-sponsored hotel rooms. Other students will photograph damaged property and guide homeowners through insurance and legal paperwork.

"We do a lot of research, a lot of grunt work," Holmes said. "We are trying to do all the things lawyers would have to do but that don't require a law license. I think we really have had an impact and filled a need the community has."

FCC to further indecency fines

BY JENNIFER C. KERR
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The government is renewing its crackdown on indecent television, proposing a total of $3.9 million in new fines while upholding its $550,000 fine against CBS stations for the Janet Jackson breast exposure at the Super Bowl.

The biggest proposed fine issued Wednesday by the Federal Communications Commission was for $3.6 million — a record — against dozens of CBS stations and affiliates. The FCC said an episode of the CBS crime drama "Without a Trace" that aired in December 2004 was indecent, citing the graphic depiction of "teenage boys and girls participating in a sexual orgy."

CBS objected, saying the program "featured an important and socially relevant storyline warning parents to exercise greater supervision of their teenage children."

The network can appeal. The company has 30 days to ask the FCC for reconsideration and explain why the 111 CBS stations and affiliates should not be held liable. The maximum indecency fine is $32,500 per incident.

The proposed fine was among a batch of decisions from the agency stemming from more than 300,000 complaints it received concerning nearly 50 TV shows broadcast between 2002 and 2005.

The FCC also affirmed its previous $550,000 fine against 20 of the network's stations for the Janet Jackson "wardrobe malfunction" two years ago — rejecting an appeal by CBS.

Additional fines totaling about $300,000 were proposed for several other broadcasts, including an episode of "The Surreal Life 2" on The WB and an episode of a Spanish-language talk show, "The Fernando Hidalgo Show," on a Miami station.

These were the first fines issued under FCC Chairman Kevin Martin, clearing a backlog of investigations into indecency complaints. The commission issued no fines last year.

"These decisions, taken both individually and as a whole, demonstrate the commission's continued commitment to enforcing the law prohibiting the airing of obscene, indecent and profane material," Martin said in a statement.

Responding to other complaints, the commission found that Fox Television Network had violated decency standards during the 2003 Billboard Music Awards. During the broadcast, reality-show star Nicole Richie uttered the "F" word and a common vulgarity for excrement.

But the FCC declined to issue a fine for the program because at the time of the broadcast existing precedent indicated the commission would not take action against isolated use of expletives, the decision said.

While in the past it may have been unclear what would result in a fine, the ruling from the FCC appears to put broadcasters on notice that they could indeed face fines for the "S" word.

A 2004 decision from the FCC regarding the "F" word — uttered by rock star Bono during a Golden Globe Awards ceremony — made clear that virtually any use of that expletive was inappropriate.

The commission dismissed complaints against a number of shows, including "The Oprah Winfrey Show," "Family Guy" and "The Simpsons."

Federal law and FCC rules ban radio and over-the-air television stations from airing obscene material, such as describing sexual conduct in a patently offensive way, at any time. The rules also bar stations from broadcasting indecent material — references to sex or excretions — between 6 a.m. and 10 p.m., when children might be more likely to be in the audience.

While the current maximum fine is $32,500 per incident, some congressional lawmakers have called for boosting the penalty to as high as $500,000. The rules do not apply to cable or satellite.

The agency's proposed fine for "Without a Trace" covers broadcasts aired at 9 p.m. in the Central and Mountain time zones.

behalf: transition. While Bolduc comments about the improvements of the Minutewomen defense, the stats say something different. Syracuse, for one, took 35 shots against the Minutewomen, including out-shooting them 15-6 in the second half. Opponents are averaging five more shots per game than UMass, 29-24.

However, players and Bolduc alike hint that it's turnovers and transition that need improvement.

"Turnovers have been an issue for us," Bolduc said. "We've got to make a change with that if we're going to win the big games. We're working hard to clean that up."

Part of that effort includes their effort at practice, where the focus was on ballhandling and improving stick skill.

"Sometimes opposing teams, they clash on us, and we end up making stupid passes in the middle," Anderson said. "I think with patience, we'll come around."

When the Minutewomen resume play this Wednesday in Hempstead, N.Y. against Hofstra University—literally, five minutes from Anderson's home in nearby Baldwin—they'll have had a week to prepare against what should be a pretty evenly-played game.

Kimberly Hillier leads the Pride as the lone scorer in double-digits for points, with 15 on 10 goals and five assists, while Casey McGrath comes in with nine points and two more (Lauren Whitcomb and Catherine Guerriere) have seven.

Like the Minutewomen, the Pride currently post a losing record at 1-4. Their first win last Wednesday, though, just happened to come against the very same team that crushed UMass—BU.

Hillier gave HU the initial 2-0 lead with two unassisted scores less than two minutes into the first half, and finished the Terriers off with a goal midway through the second to put the Pride ahead for good. Hofstra won the contest, which was played at their home Stuart Stadium, 11-8.

Momentum will certainly play a factor in this one, but Bolduc is more concerned with playing her team playing its own style of game.

"Both of us have had a lot to accomplish, and we're both tough teams. This is going to be a good, evenly-played game," Bolduc said. "We need to stop their fast break, shut that down, but it's about us. We know their tendencies, we're prepared for this game, but we need to play UMass lacrosse."

After that, it's back home—finally—on March 25 where the Minutewomen will faceoff against the always-tough New Hampshire Wildcats. Recent history says that the tough task will be beating UNH on UMass' home turf, which they haven't done since 2000.

The Minutewomen are currently led in points by speedy sophomore attack Kathleen Typadis. The Medfield native currently has 16 points on a team-high 15 points and one assist. Senior Kerri Connerty is right behind her with 14 on seven goals and assists each. Jeanette Villapiano has been hot as of late, making herself the other double-digit point-getter with six goals and four assists for 10 points.

BC survives upset bid

By Eddie Pells
Associated Press

SALT LAKE CITY – A frantic comeback. A few clutch free throws. A couple of overtimes. The only thing missing was an upset, though it was hard to argue with Boston College's formula for revving up the madness in this year's NCAA tournament.

Baldheaded BC got the first tournament thriller out of the way in an early game Thursday, a double-overtime 88-76 victory that derailed scrappy Pacific and the Maraker Express.

"People look forward to having the underdog come up and win," BC guard Louis Hinnant said. "Fortunately, we didn't allow that to happen."

Not for lack of trying.

The final overtime was anticlimactic, but the fourth-seeded Eagles (27-7) made this one very interesting for the first 45 minutes against the 13th-seeded Tigers and their star, Christian Maraker.

The Eagles trailed by six early in the first overtime. They rallied and needed a pair of free throws from Craig Smith, a 66 percent shooter, with 4.3 seconds left to tie it.

Earlier, with 9 seconds left in regulation, Maraker took advantage of a defensive breakdown and hit an open 3-pointer to tie the game at 65 – a shot the Pacific fans were cheering even before it left his hands. That capped a Pacific comeback from 13 points down.

"I thought we have a veteran club and we made a very big mistake there," coach Al Skinner said. "We were fortunate to overcome that."

On Saturday, Boston College will play Montana in the second round of the Minneapolis regional.

The Eagles advanced by holding Maraker (30 points, nine rebounds) scoreless in the two overtimes, preventing the Tigers (24-8) from advancing to the second round for the third straight year.

"I thought this was the first game all year we deserved to win and didn't," Pacific coach Bob Thomason said.

It certainly wasn't hard to see the Eagles sweat their way through this one.

Their heads were glistening, due to Hinnant's suggestion – made in jest – that the Eagles shave their heads before the game. Surprisingly, the idea caught on.

"I really love my hair, but I had to do it," Hinnant said. "The rest of the team did it and I can't let my teammates down."

Next, the Eagles will work on Dudley, the dreadlocked forward who was the only teammate not to submit to the razor.

"Him putting so many years into grooming that style, I don't think he's going to cut it," Hinnant said.

Dudley had 23 points, including a 3-pointer that, umm, shaved BC's deficit to 74-72 in the first overtime.

Smith led the Eagles with 25 points and 13 rebounds. Tyrese Rice opened the second overtime with an alley-oop pass to Sean Williams for a dunk, then followed with a 3-pointer – his only bucket of the game – to help Boston College start pulling away.

"We were fortunate to have a number of individuals on this team who want the ball, and when they get the ball in their area, they're going to take it," Skinner said.

Pacific had a couple nice looks early in the second overtime, but Maraker and Johnny Gray each had 3-pointers rim out. By the time the Big West Conference champs scored, they were trailing by nine with 1:45 left – playing out the string in an otherwise taut, exciting game.

The Eagles were none too pleased about being sent on a 2,300-mile trek to Utah to play a game that started at 10:40 a.m. local time against a team that had knocked off Pitt and Providence in the opening round of the last two tournaments.

And for a few moments, it looked like the runners-up in last weekend's Atlantic Coast Conference tourney were headed for a long trip home.

Mike Webb opened the first overtime with a pair of 3-pointers to put Pacific ahead 71-65. BC pulled within two, but Gray (16 points) answered with another 3 to make it 74-69. After Dudley's 3, Michael White barely grazed the rim on Pacific's next possession. Then, the Eagles worked it to Smith, who drew some minor contact inside against Maraker and went to the line for the tying free throws.

Thomason hated to see the game decided like that.

"I don't want to get fined or anything, but it's a call you don't see much in college basketball," he said.

As the second overtime wore on and it became clear this would be Maraker's last college game, the small Pacific fan base got its point across – yelling "overrated" to the BC players who had to work hard against the team from Stockton, Calif.

Dudley just looked over and laughed, though the point had been made. The Eagles failed to take control of the game until the very end against a team that was physically outmatched.

"I think collectively, we got together and understood this could be our last few minutes," Hinnant said. "We just tried to give whatever we had left."

Boston College forward Craig Smith had 25 points and 13 rebounds in an 88-76 double-overtime win over Pacific yesterday in the first round of the NCAA tournament. The Eagles will play Montana on Saturday.

Lofton's shot saves Tennessee

By Keith Parsons
Associated Press

GREENSBORO, N.C. – Chris Lofton's remarkable shot allowed Tennessee to avoid a major upset and sent the Volunteers into the NCAA tournament's second round for the first time in six years.

The sophomore guard took an inbound pass with 2.9 seconds left and rattled home a fallaway jumper from just inside the 3-point line to help the second-seeded Volunteers beat Winthrop 63-61 Thursday in the first round of the Washington Regional.

Craig Bradshaw missed a shot right before the buzzer that would have tied it for the Eagles (23-8), who remained winless in six trips to the tournament. They were trying to become the fifth 15th seed to record an upset in the first round, and the first since 2001. Instead the Volunteers advance to face seventh-seeded Wichita State.

The frantic finish capped a heart-pounding game that featured nine ties and eight lead changes, the final one coming on Lofton's shot. His were the only points in the final 2:42 as both teams squandered chances to advance to the second round.

The Volunteers (22-7) had a couple of opportunities in the final seconds. C.J. Watson missed a 3, but they retained possession when Dane Bradshaw chased down a long rebound on the other end of the court. Coach Bruce Pearl – who led underdog Wisconsin-Milwaukee to two victories in last season's tournament – called a timeout to set up the play for Lofton, and Bradshaw fed him the pass.

After the shot went in with four-tenths of a second on the clock, the Tennessee players mobbed Lofton. Winthrop coach Gregg Marshall used his final timeout, and James Shuler's long pass bounced off the backboard to Bradshaw. Replays also showed that the ball had hit off a Tennessee player, which should have started the clock, before it got to Bradshaw.

It was a moot point since Bradshaw's hurried shot clanged off the rim, allowing the Volunteers to hang on.

Major Wingate led Tennessee with 15 points, and Torrell Martin finished with 14 points and a career-high 13 rebounds for the Eagles.

Perhaps all those who questioned Tennessee's No. 2 seed were right – after all, the Volunteers limped into the tournament with four losses in its previous six games. Pearl pointed to a fabulous regular season that ended with a Southeastern Conference East Division title, as well as a sweep of the season series with Florida.

Quiet spring for heated rivalry

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. – The Yankees are just two hours up the road but nowhere in sight.

Neither are commemorative pins selling for $5.67 or T-shirts reading, "Hey Yankees. Who's Your Daddy now?" Those were visible the last two years during much-hyped exhibition games at the Red Sox spring training home field.

This spring training, the rivals don't meet there at all and only face each other once: next Wednesday in Tampa.

Once the regular season starts, though, the intensity should pick up, at least by May 1 when they meet for the first time, at Fenway Park. Last year, New York and Boston already had faced each other six times by April 14.

"I think it'd be nice to have kind of a calm, easy introduction to the season and let us get our feet wet for a month," Boston pitcher Bronson Arroyo said, "and then once we hit that rivalry, I know it's going to be right back to where it was."

It is the biggest rivalry in baseball – the team that bought Babe Ruth from the Red Sox versus the team that won its first World Series in 86 years after beating the Yankees in the AL championship series in 2004.

Before that season, the Yankees obtained Alex Rodriguez from Texas after the Red Sox tried to trade for him. The pins were sold at A-Rod's first exhibition game in Fort Myers. Before this season, the Yankees struck again, signing former Red Sox center fielder and fan favorite Johnny Damon.

If fans are lucky, they should be able to see Damon in pinstripes. He's had a spot of tendonitis in his shoulder, so it's not known if he'll play, but he is due to return in time for Wednesday's game after playing for the United States in the World Baseball Classic.

"If I make the trip it'll just be the same," Boston right fielder Trot Nixon said. "I'll go up and give him a hug if he's there and say 'hello' to him and see how he's doing, but then just get what I need done on the field."

Last year, the Yankees and Red Sox were both 95-67, but New York won the AL East in a tiebreaker. Boston got the wild-card berth then was swept in a three-game AL division series by the Chicago White Sox.

The Yankees also lost in the division series to the Los Angeles Angels and the vastly improved White Sox went on to win the World Series.

Now an AL East team has made some moves to get better. The Toronto Blue Jays could even turn the division into a three-team race and, perhaps, diminish the rivalry.

Hofstra next up for UMass

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Through the first six games of the season, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (2-4) has taken its tough non-conference schedule head-on and came away with scores that were more or less expected.

Then again, there aren't too many Division I teams in the country right now that have played three Top 15 opponents in 15 days. And while the Minutewomen's first two losses to ranked opponents—a 16-6 rout by No. 9 Boston University on March 1 and a 16-7 loss to No. 7 9 Dartmouth on March 8—were some forgettable contests, coach Carrie Bolduc saw light in their most recent loss, a 15-9 defeat by No. 13 Syracuse on Wednesday night in the Carrier Dome.

For one, she gave sophomore Krissy Anderson the nod for her first career start in goal, and Anderson returned the favor by recording a season-high 16 saves.

"I almost had a heart attack before the game," Anderson laughed yesterday afternoon following practice at Garber Field. "When they were announcing the starting lineups, I was shaking, a little bit overwhelmed. I mean, that was my first time playing in the Dome."

Anderson says she calmed down after the first few shots were fired at her, and despite giving up 15 goals on 35 shots—including two goals by five different scorers—the effervescent Long Islander was impressive enough to convince Bolduc to keep her in net on a regular basis.

UMass led early in Wednesday night's contest, going up 3-1 with 23 minutes to go in the first half on a Kerri Connerty goal and then tying it 6-6 with seven left in the stanza on a Jeanette Villapiano free position shot. But suddenly—we've seen this before—the Orange snapped into gear and rallied off five straight goals to take an 11-6 lead and cruise to victory.

The game itself brings up another aspect of the game that could use some tweaking on UMass'

UM heads to Florida for top competition

By Eli Rosenswaike

While much of the student body will be relaxing during Spring Break, the Massachusetts tennis team (4-3) will be going back to work as it begins a difficult stretch during its charge for the Atlantic 10 Championship.

The Minutewomen will travel to Florida for three matches against some stiff competition. They will get only two days of practice before playing three matches in a row from Sunday, March 19 through Tuesday, March 21.

The three day stint begins with a match against Nova Southeastern, (9-2, 3-1 Sunshine Conference) a team UMass has never faced in tennis. The Sunshine Conference is highly talented as NSU stands in fourth place despite a solid overall record. Nova Southeastern is a Division II school but their national ranking of No. 12 indicates how good of a team they are.

The following day the Minutewomen face a Lynn team (8-0, 4-0 Sunshine Conference) that they have failed to beat in six career matches. Lynn has prevailed in every match they have played this season and are ranked even higher than NSU, pulling in at No. 5 nationally. UMass coach Judy Dixon views this match as a big challenge and a learning experience.

"It's not necessarily about beating them, it's about good competition and getting practice playing outdoors," Dixon said.

The Minutewomen wrap up their three game trip in Florida when they face Broward Community College, which has won five consecutive Florida Community College Activities Association Championships. They have also captured two out of the last three National Championships among community colleges. Despite not being a Division I or II school, the astounding success of Broward C.C. can not be taken lightly and they should prove to be a formidable opponent.

The ladies in maroon return home and have one final match before classes resume. It will be another extremely tough match as they face Yale (13-7, 3-4 Ivy League) whom they've failed to beat in nine career matches. Unlike the three matches in Florida, this match will be played indoors, which will be an adjustment.

"We get used to playing matches outdoors in Florida and then we have to adjust by playing Yale indoors," Dixon said. "This is what makes tennis so hard in New England."

Despite the struggles against Yale in the past, Dixon remains optimistic about the Minutewomen's chances.

"Yale is a match we could win," Dixon said. "For us to beat Yale on their home courts we first need the belief that we can do it."

If this year's team does what no former team ever has, it would go a long way in giving the Minutewomen the confidence to accomplish their goal of finishing first or second in the A-10.

Innocence lost in sports world

Rob Greenfield

Participation in sports is American. Leisure time for today's youth provides ample opportunity – if the interest is there – to take to the athletic fields and compete in some friendly competition.

Maybe tomorrow a kid will pick up a basketball and decide that he wants to play the game for the rest of his life. Maybe some kid in the fields of Iowa will pick up a baseball for the first time and plant a fastball in his dad's stomach – the first step towards a major league career. Sports are used in many different ways: some use it as a vehicle to improve conditioning, some as a distraction from the daily grind, others to socialize and solidify friendships.

Aside from overbearing parents and vociferous coaches, sports are a generally enjoyable experience, and sometimes an athlete might stumble into a situation with teammates he respects and loves, and the team experience will turn into an indelible memory.

That is what sports was built on. Long before athletics turned into a win-at-all-costs affair, it was a way for kids to pass time while their parents were off being the breadwinners. There were no TV's, no cameras, no coaches and no specialization – nothing except the unadulterated joy of being somewhere besides work.

Now all of that has changed. Money is the prime motivation now. Corporate America is more and more involved. Coaches cheat to bring better players in to inflate their paychecks. Fans are belligerent and ignorant.

J.J. Redick knows about ruthless fans. He is the anti-hero of college basketball – the best player, playing for the best team in the best basketball atmosphere on the planet. Of course, fans won't like him, like baseball fans won't like the Yankees. Americans love to shoot their stars down as much as they like to build up their underdogs, and Redick has experienced almost every imaginable form of verbal abuse during his tenure at Duke.

Duke guard J.J. Redick has led the Blue Devils to a No. 1 seed in the NCAA tournament despite constant harassment from opposing fans.

When the Blue Devils are on the road, all bets are off. Security follows him in and ushers him out. Fans scream unconscionable obscenities at the Duke star, the kind of stuff reserved for hate crimes and hate riots.

Redick's little sister and his mother have been a few of the targets. Some signs have drawings depicting sexual acts being done to the women in his family. Fans scream at him from behind the Duke bench with a fire that resembles pure hatred. Everyone forgets that basketball is just a game, that there are far more evil people in this world than J.J. Redick, who is berated to the extreme because he makes 3-pointers and wears blue and white.

Linda Orlando, a writer for the website Buzzle.com, wrote a sidebar on Redick and interviewed some of his passionate haters. One Maryland fan spilled all when Orlando asked her about Redick.

"Just looking at him makes me sick, and I'm not the only one who feels that way," Terrapins fan Liz Mercer told Orlando in her article entitled 'Duke's J.J. Redick: Great Shooter, Great Player'. "My whole life, every fiber of my being, is dedicated to distracting and tormenting J.J. Redick. I don't even sleep anymore. If I have a free night I spend it devising new ways to make his life miserable. It's a difficult calling, but a noble one. If I don't do it, then J.J. will never know that he's an [expletive] and we hate him."

Mercer isn't a basketball fan. She goes to games for a single purpose: to make sure that J.J. Redick knows that he is hated at the University of Maryland. Apparently, she thinks that the other 20,000 screaming fans didn't get that message across, so she continues to go to games, not to watch basketball, but to try and get inside Redick's head.

Of course, it doesn't work, because the Duke superstar gets that treatment everywhere he goes. He sees pictures of his mother and sister in the hands of slimy fans who just want to hurt him.

Fans have stooped to a new low. Respect is out the window. Hatred is the new respect. Reality has subsided in favor of blind ignorance. J.J. Redick is a human being playing a sport, but fans seem to have forgotten that. They treat him like a TV character, something that can be relentlessly ridden but can't hear a word of the tirade.

This type of abuse travels all the way down to the high school levels. Applauding the visitors' effort is an extinct ritual, replaced with comments that can only be muttered by those with no conscience who feel the need to get personal when it's all just a game.

J.J. Redick is not a saint. He's shouldn't be free from criticism or adulation. He deserves respect. And if fans can't have the courtesy to leave the vulgarities at home, then sports are no longer sacred, and the real fans have to live with that.

Minutewomen face tough teams

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Since the start of the 2006 season on Feb. 10, the Massachusetts softball team has covered a vast amount of ground. In an attempt to locate any and all softball-playable climates, the team hopped on a plane three times, traveling to San Diego, Calif., Columbus, Ga. and Tampa, Fla. in a span of over a month.

This weekend the Minutewomen (7-8) will complete their road trip in Boca Raton, Fla., as they participate in the Florida Atlantic University Parents' Weekend Tournament.

The tourney begins today at 4 p.m., as UMass faces No. 24/25 North Carolina, followed by a night clash against Florida Atlantic at 8 p.m. The Minutewomen have two opponents on hand tomorrow, and will face Michigan State at 11 a.m. and Tennessee-Chattanooga at 1 p.m.

The matchup against Chattanooga will come exactly one week after the two teams battled for 10 innings at the USF-Adidas Spring Break Invitational last weekend in Tampa, Fla. In that contest, freshman sensation pitcher Brandice Balschmiter surrendered just three hits and two walks, while not allowing a single earned run in the game. Sophomore Lauren Proctor gave UMass the 3-2 edge when she drove a single to the right side of the field, which brought in the game-winning run in the bottom of the 10th inning.

While UMass fell in the championship round of the USF-Adidas tournament, several Minutewomen were honored once again by the Atlantic-10 for their performances.

Junior Amanda Acampora earned A-10 Player of the Week after she posted a .417 batting average last week, while registering two homers, two doubles and six RBIs. Balschmiter nabbed the Pitcher of the Week Award after posting unheard-of stats during the tournament last weekend. The freshman went 5-0 with one save, and kept her ERA at 0.33. Balschmiter has now received an A-10 honor three weeks in a row.

The final Minutewoman to be recognized for her efforts was fellow freshman Whitney Mollica, who posted a .600 slugging percentage last weekend, while accumulating five runs scored, three doubles, seven RBIs and one home run.

UMass will have to put out similar performances if it has any hopes of upsetting the Tar Heels later today. UNC is holding a 21-7 overall record after sweeping the Florida State Seminoles in a doubleheader for the first time since 1989. Senior Crystal Cox currently holds an ERA of 0.76 and has amassed 110 strikeouts in 13 appearances.

Following this weekend's games, the Minutewomen will kick-off their A-10 schedule on March 24, when they take on George Washington in Washington, D.C. for a doubleheader. These contests mark the start of the regular season for UMass, as it will face mostly A-10 opponents, 'with the tentative home opener scheduled for March 29 in a doubleheader against Dartmouth. Whether or not this contest will even take place depends on field conditions by that date.

Junior first baseman Amanda Morin and UMass will play six games next week. Morin is third on the team with a .318 batting average.

Busy break for Crane's squad

The Massachusetts baseball team (1-2) began its season with a weekend series against South Florida last weekend, and it dropped two out of three games in the southern swing. Now, after the cancellation of UMass' scheduled matchup with the Northeastern Huskies Wednesday, the Minutemen head to Florida once again for games with Army, Ohio State, Illinois and Rollins College.

The Minutemen have eight games during Spring Break they play every day in the upcoming week except for Thursday, which will be spent traveling to New York for a weekend series with the Fordham Rams.

UMass began the spring season on the road and it won't see the Amherst diamond until the beginning of April when the team returns for its first home game of the season against Maine on April 5.

Until then, there will be playing and traveling for the Minutemen. They play Army on March 18, Ohio State on the 19th, Illinois on the 20th, Rollins College on the 21st and 22nd, and Fordham on the 24th, 25th and 26th before returning to the northeast to play Sacred Heart in Bridgeport, Conn., on the 28th.

The Minutemen dropped a 3-0 decision to Army in the two teams' lone matchup last season. UMass won the first meeting with the Fordham Rams in 2005, 13-1, but went on to drop two straight games and lose the 2-of-3 series.

Ohio State, Rollins College and Illinois are all new additions to the Minutemen's schedule this season.

Human trafficking too close for comfort

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON — Victims of human trafficking are everywhere, as close as your neighbor's house or your local coffee shop, but at the same time they are virtually invisible, outreach workers said Saturday.

"In the media, most of what we hear tends to be the sensationalized stories," said Carol Gomez, director of the Cambridge-based Trafficking Victims Outreach and Services Network.

Gomez was among the speakers at the In Our Backyards conference at Simmons College, an event to raise awareness and propose solutions, such as new laws to protect victims, who can be anyone from household domestic workers to prostitutes. Many are illegal immigrants who don't turn to authorities out of fear of arrest or deportation.

The Labor Department defines human trafficking as recruiting, transporting, providing or obtaining any person for forced labor, slavery or servitude in any industry.

Most of Gomez's cases, however, fall into a "very gray area." About 30 percent of her cases are domestic servants, while another 20 percent are mail-order brides. They also work in sweatshops, in construction and in the fishing industry.

Two years ago, a woman from India claimed she was held captive by a Brookline couple who brought her here as a nanny, held her passport and forced her to work for $3 per day. A neighbor helped her find a shelter. She sued the couple and settled out of court.

In January, a Connecticut businessman pleaded not guilty to charges of recruiting Portuguese immigrants to work long hours for low wages in his Dunkin' Donuts shops and home. Jose Calbelha, 46, faces up to 70 years in prison, if convicted.

Gomez said immigration laws should be relaxed to allow victims access to help without fear of prosecution or deportation.

"Fear will keep the sweatshop worker from even considering reporting to the police, or telling a social worker ... what they go through," Gomez said.

Young prostitutes also too often face prosecution, said Ra'shaun Nalls, a Boston outreach worker. One of his clients was arrested 17 times before her 19th birthday.

"Johns," meanwhile, get a slap on the wrist, he said. Men who seek out prostitutes need to face tougher penalties, but Nalls said he's pessimistic.

"They're influential. They're our teachers, they're our principals, they're our doctors," said Nalls, outreach worker for the Boston program called A Way Back, which steers teenage girls toward social service programs.

The average age of a girl entering prostitution is 13, he said. Most have been sexually abused and are from all racial and socio-economic backgrounds.

Most prostitution doesn't fit the Hollywood stereotype of street-walking girls handles by pimps wearing flashy clothes and driving oversized Cadillacs.

"It's more hidden. It's something that's happening in hotel parties," he said.

"The average pimp right now is about 19-20 years old, wearing a baseball hat, Timberlands and baggy jeans," Nalls said. "They're not these fly guys with expensive clothes."

Nalls' group works with referrals from the Department of Social Services, which has referred 83 girls in the past three years. There are many more, he said, but getting to them is difficult because pimps "trade" girls between cities.

"They trade these girls like they're cards," he said.

Courts reexamine marijuana issue

By David Kravets
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Each time the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled on medical marijuana, the justices have come down against allowing the sick and dying to use the drug to ease their symptoms and possibly prolong life. But the door has never been fully closed.

This week, a federal appeals court in California will hear arguments in the latest round of legal wrangling over the issue.

The case to be argued before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Monday narrows the matter to the so-called right-to-life theory that marijuana should be allowed if it is the only viable option to keep a patient alive or free of excruciating pain. It would apply only to the sickest patients and their suppliers, regardless of whether they live in one of the 11 states authorizing medical marijuana.

"A victory would affect people who are very seriously ill, facing death or great physical suffering," said Randy Barnett, a Boston University law school professor working on the case.

The case was brought by Angel Raich, a 40-year-old mother of two from Oakland who suffers from scoliosis, a brain tumor, chronic nausea and other ailments. She uses marijuana every couple of hours to ease her pain and bolster a nonexistent appetite.

"She'd probably be dead without marijuana," said her doctor, Frank Lucido, who has recommended its use for some 3,000 patients. "Nothing else

Tragedy on the race track

Racecar driver Paul Dana dies in accident

By Mike Harris
Associated Press

HOMESTEAD, Fla. — Driver Paul Dana died after a two-car crash Sunday during the warmup for the season-opening IRL IndyCar Series race at Homestead-Miami Speedway.

The other driver, Ed Carpenter, was awake and alert at a Miami hospital, IRL officials said.

Dana, 30, a former motorsports journalist with a degree from Northwestern, was a rookie who competed in three IRL races for Ethanol Hemelgarn Racing last year with a best finish of 10th in the race at Homestead.

The Toyota Indy 300 race was expected to be run as scheduled. Bobby Rahal, co-owner of Rahal Letterman Racing for which Dana was to race this season, said the team's other two cars — driven by Danica Patrick and Buddy Rice — will be pulled out of the race.

"Obviously, this is a very black day for us," Rahal said. "This is a great tragedy."

Carpenter spun and hit the wall moments after the practice began at 10 a.m. EST. As Carpenter's battered car slid to a stop, Dana slammed into it at almost full speed — about 200 mph.

Dana's car nearly split in half. The chassis flew about 6 feet off the ground and pieces were strewn down the track. It nearly turned over, but landed on its wheels before sliding to a halt.

It took track safety workers about 15 minutes to get both drivers out of their cars. The practice session did not resume.

Dana and Carpenter, the stepson of IRL founder Tony George, both were airlifted to Jackson Memorial Hospital in Miami. IRL officials said Dana died shortly before noon.

Vision Racing team general manager Larry Curry said he was told Carpenter "would be fine."

Dana is the first IRL driver killed since Tony Renna died in a crash during testing at the Indianapolis Motor Speedway in October 2003. The last NASCAR driver killed was Dale Earnhardt in February 2001, and the last driver to die in Formula One was Ayrton Senna in May 1994.

It is the third racing death at the Homestead track. John Nemechek was killed in a NASCAR truck race in February 1997 and Jeff Clinton died in a Grand Am sports car event at the track in March 2002.

Paramedics load racecar driver Paul Dana into a medivac helicopter yesterday morning after a serious car crash on a Homestead, Fla. racetrack. Dana was later pronounced dead at a Miami hospital.

Military raids, clashes kill dozens in Iraq

U.S. military keeps quiet

By Sinan Salaheddin
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Police and a top aide to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr said Sunday that 18 people were killed in a clash involving U.S. and Iraqi army forces at a mosque in eastern Baghdad. The U.S. military said it had no information on the reported violence.

The announcement came hours after a mortar round slammed to earth near al-Sadr's home in the Shiite holy city of Najaf. The popular anti-American cleric home but was not hurt, an aide said.

Iraqi authorities also said late Sunday that U.S. forces raided an Interior Ministry building and arrested 40 policemen after discovering 17 non-Iraqi prisoners in the facility.

Police 1st Lt. Dhayer Mahmoud said the arrested police were being held for investigation, but the reason was not known. Mahmoud said the U.S. forces remained at the building and were guarding the 17 foreigners.

Abdul-Zahra al-Suaidi, head of al-Sadr's office in Baghdad, said U.S. forces and Iraqi soldiers opened fire at the al-Moustafa Shiite mosque in the Ur neighborhood, killing 18 people in what he called an unprovoked attack.

Separately, Iraqi police Lt. Hassan Hmoud said 18 people were killed in the mosque. He said he had no other details.

U.S. Sgt. 1st Class Keith Robinson, a spokesman for the 4th Infantry Division that has responsibility for Baghdad, said late Sunday his office had no information on the reported mosque clash.

Greg Lazbo, a spokesman for the U.S. command, also said the press center had not received any "releasable information" about any incident in that area. "We're still trying to find out what is going on," he said.

A child and at least one guard were wounded in the mortar attack earlier Sunday that hit some 165 feet from al-Sadr's home according to police and al-Sadr aide Sheik Sahib al-Amin.

Iraqi troops sealed the area and the cleric's Mahdi Army militia surrounded the home after the attack, al-Amiri said. Al-Sadr lives near the Imam Ali shrine in Najaf, about 90 miles south of Baghdad.

Shortly after the attack, the cleric issued a statement calling for calm.

"I call upon all brothers to stay calm, and I call upon Iraqi army to protect the pilgrims as the Sawasib (militants) are aiming to attack Shiites everyday," he said ahead of Wednesday's commemoration marking the death of the Prophet Muhammad.

Najaf police chief called the assault a "cowardly attack" by those still loyal to Saddam Hussein aimed at dividing the Iraqi people.

"But this will not happen," Maj. Gen. Abbas Mi'adat told reporters near al-Sadr's home. "We are ready to confront any terrorist schemes and protect the pilgrims."

At least 10 Iraqis were killed in violence elsewhere, including a 13-year-old boy killed by a bomb as he walked to school in the southern city of Basra. Police also found 11 handcuffed and bullet-riddled bodies dumped in Baghdad and two in the city of Baqouba.

The Iraqi army said it also had dispatched troops to investigate a report of 30 beheaded corpses in a village north of Baghdad, but the soldiers turned back before reaching the site, apparently fearing an insurgent ambush.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meanwhile said the U.S. could withdraw a significant number of troops from Iraq this year if Iraqi forces are able to assume greater control of the country's security.

"I think it's entirely probable that we will see a significant drawdown of American forces over the next year.

It's all dependent on events on the ground," the chief American diplomat said Sunday, echoing military commanders.

Beheaded bodies found by Iraqi forces

By Steven Hurst
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Iraqi forces found 30 bodies, most beheaded, near a village north of Baghdad on Sunday, in one of the bloodiest episodes in a cycle of apparent sectarian killings.

Police said the bodies were found after police and soldiers were dispatched to respond to a report of killings in Mullah Eid, a village near the town of Buhriz, a former stronghold of ex-President Saddam Hussein's Baath Party about 35 miles north of Baghdad.

Authorities gave no immediate information on the identities of the victims or on who may have been responsible.

The dead were being transferred to a morgue in Baghdad, police 1st Lt. Thaer Mahmoud said.

Brig. Saman Talabani, an Iraqi army commander, said earlier that villagers had reported the corpses and he sent a battalion of soldiers to join a team from Diyala hospital to investigate.

A military officer, who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to speak, said later that soldiers turned back from the scene, fearing an ambush. The search team apparently did continue later, however, and discovered the bodies.

Iraq has seen an explosion of sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims, including such secretive killings, since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, a predominantly Sunni city, 60 miles north of Baghdad.

The Sunnis who dominate the area north of Baghdad were fervent supporters of Saddam, whose Sunni-led regime ruled Iraq for decades and brutally oppressed majority Shiite Muslims and minority Kurds.

Senate debates key immigration issue

By Nedra Pickler
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Founded by immigrants and praised as a haven for the oppressed, the United States now is struggling to decide the fate of as many as 12 million people living in the country illegally.

The Senate takes up the emotional debate on the heels of weekend rallies that drew hundreds of thousands of people protesting attempts to toughen laws against immigrants. Among the ideas that President Bush and members of Congress are considering:

—Erecting a fence on the Mexico border to deter illegal immigration.

—Treating people who sneak across the border as felons to be deported.

Allowing foreigners to stay in the country legally as custodians, dish washers, construction workers and other low-paid employees.

—Allowing those working in the U.S. a path to citizenship.

—Requiring them to get in line behind everyone else back in their home countries who want to become Americans.

On Monday, the Senate Judiciary Committee takes up the issue and Bush headlines a naturalization ceremony for 30 new citizens at Constitution Hall. Demonstrations are planned near the Capitol, including a prayer service with immigration advocates and clergy who plan to wear handcuffs to demonstrate.

'Class of Katrina' shares one last dance

By Kathy Hanrahan
Associated Press

PASS CHRISTIAN, Miss. — Wearing a canary yellow strapless evening gown, Jessica Jenkins walked across the remains of her home, raising her petticoat to keep it out of the red clay.

Prom season holds a special importance for Jenkins and other Gulf Coast students whose last year of high school was defined by Hurricane Katrina.

"The littlest things get to you now," said Jenkins, who was named the prom queen Saturday. "Things that you would never have thought would bother you before the storm, bother you now."

Next to the site of her old home, where their new house is under construction, Jenkins and older sister Leah share a trailer supplied by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Her parents and younger sister Brett live in an adjacent trailer. At one time, they all shared one trailer, with a white maltese and golden haired poodle.

"You have a lot of rough mornings trying to get ready in a FEMA trailer," she said.

Before Saturday's prom, she had to apply her makeup in the trailer's dim lighting while a bulldozer cleared debris from a nearby lot.

She and her classmates from Pass Christian High have been attending school in portable classrooms set up on the campus of the local elementary school. Enrollment was down from 600 students last year to 420.

Other senior classes from Pass Christian have had their proms at a venue in downtown Gulfport but it, too, was damaged by the storm, so Saturday's party for the Class of 2006 was moved to the Orange Grove Community Center off scenic U.S. 49, next to the Kangaroo Gas Station.

Senior Ryan Spear was shocked the school could hold a prom at all, much less have it ready on time.

"It isn't bittersweet. It's just sweet," fellow senior Heidi Knight said. "Having one just makes you feel normal."

Jessica Jenkins, dressed for her senior prom, steps on boards to avoid clay and sand between the two FEMA trailers she shares with her family.

UM heads to Florida for top competition

By Eli Rosenswaike

While much of the student body will be relaxing during Spring Break, the Massachusetts tennis team (4-3) will be going back to work as it begins a difficult stretch during its charge for the Atlantic 10 Championship.

The Minutewomen will travel to Florida for three matches against some stiff competition. They will get only two days of practice before playing three matches in a row from Sunday, March 19 through Tuesday, March 21.

The three day stint begins with a match against Nova Southeastern, (9-2, 3-1 Sunshine Conference) a team UMass has never faced in tennis. The Sunshine Conference is highly talented as NSU stands in fourth place despite a solid overall record. Nova Southeastern is a Division II school but their national ranking of No. 12 indicates how good of a team they are.

The following day the Minutewomen face a Lynn team (8-0, 4-0 Sunshine Conference) that they have failed to beat in six career matches. Lynn has prevailed in every match they have played this season and are ranked even higher than NSU, pulling in at No. 5 nationally. UMass coach Judy Dixon views this match as a big challenge and a learning experience.

"It's not necessarily about beating them, it's about good competition and getting practice playing outdoors," Dixon said.

The Minutewomen wrap up their three game trip in Florida when they face Broward Community College, which has won five consecutive Florida Community College Activities Association Championships. They have also captured two out of the last three National Championships among community colleges. Despite not being a Division I or II school, the astounding success of Broward C.C. can not be taken lightly and they should prove to be a formidable opponent.

The ladies in maroon return home and have one final match before classes resume. It will be another extremely tough match as they face Yale (13-7, 3-4 Ivy League) whom they've failed to beat in nine career matches. Unlike the three matches in Florida, this match will be played indoors, which will be an adjustment.

"We get used to playing matches outdoors in Florida and then we have to adjust by playing Yale indoors," Dixon said. "This is what makes tennis so hard in New England."

Despite the struggles against Yale in the past, Dixon remains optimistic about the Minutewomen's chances.

"Yale is a match we could win," Dixon said. "For us to beat Yale on their home courts we first need the belief that we can do it."

If this year's team does what no former team ever has, it would go a long way in giving the Minutewomen the confidence to accomplish their goal of finishing first or second in the A-10.

Innocence lost in sports world

Rob Greenfield

Participation in sports is American. Leisure time for today's youth provides ample opportunity – if the interest is there – to take to the athletic fields and compete in some friendly competition.

Maybe tomorrow a kid will pick up a basketball and decide that he wants to play the game for the rest of his life. Maybe some kid in the fields of Iowa will pick up a baseball for the first time and plant a fastball in his dad's stomach – the first step towards a major league career. Sports are used in many different ways: some use it as a vehicle to improve conditioning, some as a distraction from the daily grind, others to socialize and solidify friendships.

Aside from overbearing parents and vociferous coaches, sports are a generally enjoyable experience, and sometimes an athlete might stumble into a situation with teammates he respects and loves, and the team experience will turn into an indelible memory.

That is what sports was built on. Long before athletics turned into a win-at-all-costs affair, it was a way for kids to pass time while their parents were off being the breadwinners. There were no TV's, no cameras, no coaches and no specialization – nothing except the unadulterated joy of being somewhere besides work.

Now all of that has changed. Money is the prime motivation now. Corporate America is more and more involved. Coaches cheat to bring better players in to inflate their paychecks. Fans are belligerent and ignorant.

J.J. Redick knows about ruthless fans. He is the anti-hero of college basketball – the best player, playing for the best team in the best basketball atmosphere on the planet. Of course, fans won't like him, like baseball fans won't like the Yankees. Americans love to shoot their stars down as much as they like to build up their underdogs, and Redick has experienced almost every imaginable form of verbal abuse during his tenure at Duke.

When the Blue Devils are on the road, all bets are off. Security follows him in and ushers him out. Fans scream unconscionable obscenities at the Duke star, the kind of stuff reserved for hate crimes and hate riots.

Redick's little sister and his mother have been a few of the targets. Some signs have drawings depicting sexual acts being done to the women in his family. Fans scream at him from behind the Duke bench with a fire that resembles pure hatred. Everyone forgets that basketball is just a game, that there are far more evil people in this world than J.J. Redick, who is berated to the extreme because he makes 3-pointers and wears blue and white.

Linda Orlando, a writer for the website Buzzle.com, wrote a sidebar on Redick and interviewed some of his passionate haters. One Maryland fan spilled all when Orlando asked her about Redick.

"Just looking at him makes me sick, and I'm not the only one who feels that way," Terrapins fan Liz Mercer told Orlando in her article entitled 'Duke's J.J. Redick: Great Shooter, Great Player' "My whole life, every fiber of my being, is dedicated to distracting and tormenting J.J. Redick. I don't even sleep anymore. If I have a free night I spend it devising new ways to make his life miserable. It's a difficult calling, but a noble one. If I don't do it, then J.J. will never know that he's an [expletive] and we hate him."

Mercer isn't a basketball fan. She goes to games for a single purpose: to make sure that J.J. Redick knows that he is hated at the University of Maryland. Apparently, she thinks that the other 20,000 screaming fans didn't get that message across, so she continues to go to games, not to watch basketball, but to try and get inside Redick's head.

Of course, it doesn't work, because the Duke superstar gets that treatment everywhere he goes. He sees pictures of his mother and sister in the hands of slimy fans who just want to hurt him.

Fans have stooped to a new low. Respect is out the window. Hatred is the new respect. Reality has subsided in favor of blind ignorance. J.J. Redick is a human being playing a sport, but fans seem to have forgotten that. They treat him like a TV character, something that can be relentlessly ridden but can't hear a word of the tirade.

This type of abuse travels all the way down to the high school levels. Applauding the visitors' effort is an extinct ritual, replaced with comments that can only be muttered by those with no conscience who feel the need to get personal when it's all just a game.

J.J. Redick is not a saint. He's shouldn't be free from criticism or adulation. He deserves respect. And if fans can't have the courtesy to leave the vulgarities at home, then sports are no longer sacred, and the real fans have to live with that.

Minutewomen face tough teams

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Since the start of the 2006 season on Feb. 10, the Massachusetts softball team has covered a vast amount of ground. In an attempt to locate any and all softball-playable climates, the team hopped on a plane three times, traveling to San Diego, Calif., Columbus, Ga. and Tampa, Fla. in a span of over a month.

This weekend the Minutewomen (7-8) will complete their road trip in Boca Raton, Fla., as they participate in the Florida Atlantic University Parents' Weekend Tournament.

The tourney begins today at 4 p.m., as UMass faces No. 24/25 North Carolina, followed by a night clash against Florida Atlantic at 8 p.m. The Minutewomen have two opponents on hand tomorrow, and will face Michigan State at 11 a.m. and Tennessee-Chattanooga at 1 p.m.

The matchup against Chattanooga will come exactly one week after the two teams battled for 10 innings at the USF-Adidas Spring Break Invitational last weekend in Tampa, Fla. In that contest, freshman sensation pitcher Brandice Balschmiter surrendered just three hits and two walks, while not allowing a single earned run in the game. Sophomore Lauren Proctor gave UMass the 3-2 edge when she drove a single to the right side of the field, which brought in the game-winning run in the bottom of the 10th inning.

While UMass fell in the championship round of the USF-Adidas tournament, several Minutewomen were honored once again by the Atlantic-10 for their performances.

Junior Amanda Acampora earned A-10 Player of the Week after she posted a .417 batting average last week, while registering two homers, two doubles and six RBIs. Balschmiter nabbed the Pitcher of the Week Award after posting unheard-of stats during the tournament last weekend. The freshman went 5-0 with one save, and kept her ERA at 0.33. Balschmiter has now received an A-10 honor three weeks in a row.

The final Minutewoman to be recognized for her efforts was fellow freshman Whitney Mollica, who posted a .600 slugging percentage last weekend, while accumulating five runs scored, three doubles, seven RBIs and one home run.

UMass will have to put out similar performances if it has any hopes of upsetting the Tar Heels later today. UNC is holding a 21-7 overall record after sweeping the Florida State Seminoles in a doubleheader for the first time since 1989. Senior Crystal Cox currently holds an ERA of 0.76 and has amassed 110 strikeouts in 13 appearances.

Following this weekend's games, the Minutewomen will kick-off their A-10 schedule on March 24, when they take on George Washington in Washington, D.C. for a doubleheader. These contests mark the start of the regular season for UMass, as it will face mostly A-10 opponents, with the tentative home opener scheduled for March 29 in a doubleheader against Dartmouth. Whether or not this contest will even take place depends on field conditions by that date.

Busy break for Crane's squad

The Massachusetts baseball team (1-2) began its season with a weekend series against South Florida last weekend, and it dropped two out of three games in the southern swing. Now, after the cancellation of UMass' scheduled matchup with the Northeastern Huskies Wednesday, the Minutemen head to Florida once again for games with Army, Ohio State, Illinois and Rollins College.

The Minutemen have eight games during Spring Break they play every day in the upcoming week except for Thursday, which will be spent traveling to New York for a weekend series with the Fordham Rams.

UMass began the spring season on the road and it won't see the Amherst diamond until the beginning of April when the team returns for its first home game of the season against Maine on April 5.

Until then, there will be playing and traveling for the Minutemen. They play Army on March 18, Ohio State on the 19th, Illinois on the 20th, Rollins College on the 21st and 22nd, and Fordham on the 24th, 25th and 26th before returning to the northeast to play Sacred Heart in Bridgeport, Conn., on the 28th.

The Minutemen dropped a 3-0 decision to Army in the two teams' lone matchup last season. UMass won the first meeting with the Fordham Rams in 2005, 13-1, but went on to drop two straight games and lose the 2-of-3 series.

Ohio State, Rollins College and Illinois are all new additions to the Minutemen's schedule this season.

Human trafficking too close for comfort

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON — Victims of human trafficking are everywhere, as close as your neighbor's house or your local coffee shop, but at the same time they are virtually invisible, outreach workers said Saturday.

"In the media, most of what we hear tends to be the sensationalized stories," said Carol Gomez, director of the Cambridge-based Trafficking Victims Outreach and Services Network.

Gomez was among the speakers at the In Our Backyards conference at Simmons College, an event to raise awareness and propose solutions, such as new laws to protect victims, who can be anyone from household domestic workers to prostitutes. Many are illegal immigrants who don't turn to authorities out of fear of arrest or deportation.

The Labor Department defines human trafficking as recruiting, transporting, providing or obtaining any person for forced labor, slavery or servitude in any industry.

Most of Gomez's cases, however, fall into a "very gray area." About 30 percent of her cases are domestic servants, while another 20 percent are mail-order brides. They also work in sweatshops, in construction and in the fishing industry.

Two years ago, a woman from India claimed she was held captive by a Brookline couple who brought her here as a nanny, held her passport and forced her to work for $3 per day. A neighbor helped her find a shelter. She sued the couple and settled out of court.

In January, a Connecticut businessman pleaded not guilty to charges of recruiting Portuguese immigrants to work long hours for low wages in his Dunkin' Donuts shops and home. Jose Calhelha, 46, faces up to 70 years in prison, if convicted.

Gomez said immigration laws should be relaxed to allow victims access to help without fear of prosecution or deportation.

"Fear will keep the sweatshop worker from even considering reporting to the police, or telling a social worker ... what they go through," Gomez said.

Young prostitutes also too often face prosecution, said Ra'shaun Nalls, a Boston outreach worker. One of his clients was arrested 17 times before her 18th birthday.

"Johns," meanwhile, get a slap on the wrist, he said. Men who seek out prostitutes need to face tougher penalties, but Nalls said he's pessimistic.

"They're influential. They're our teachers, they're our principals, they're our doctors," said Nalls, outreach worker for the Boston program called A Way Back, which steers teenage girls toward social service programs.

The average age of a girl entering prostitution is 13, he said. Most have been sexually abused and are from all racial and socio-economic backgrounds.

Most prostitution doesn't fit the Hollywood stereotype of street-walking girls handles by pimps wearing flashy clothes and driving oversized Cadillacs.

"It's more hidden. It's something that's happening in hotel parties," he said.

"The average pimp right now is about 19-20 years old, wearing a baseball hat, Timberlands and baggy jeans," Nalls said. "They're not these fly guys with expensive clothes."

Nalls' group works with referrals from the Department of Social Services, which has referred 83 girls in the past three years. There are many more, he said, but getting to them is difficult because pimps "trade" girls between cities.

"They trade these girls like they're cards," he said.

Tragedy on the race track

Racecar driver Paul Dana dies in accident

By Mike Harris
Associated Press

HOMESTEAD, Fla. Driver Paul Dana died after a two-car crash Sunday during the warmup for the season-opening IRL IndyCar Series race at Homestead-Miami Speedway.

The other driver, Ed Carpenter, was awake and alert at a Miami hospital, IRL officials said.

Dana, 30, a former motorsports journalist with a degree from Northwestern, was a rookie who competed in three IRL races for Ethanol Hemelgarn Racing last year with a best finish of 10th in the race at Homestead.

The Toyota Indy 300 race was expected to be run as scheduled. Bobby Rahal, co-owner of Rahal Letterman Racing for which Dana was to race this season, said the team's other two cars — driven by Danica Patrick and Buddy Rice — will be pulled out of the race.

"Obviously, this is a very black day for us," Rahal said. "This is a great tragedy."

Carpenter spun and hit the wall moments after the practice began at 10 a.m. EST. As Carpenter's battered car slid to a stop, Dana slammed into it at almost full speed — about 200 mph.

Dana's car nearly split in half. The chassis flew about 6 feet off the ground and pieces were strewn down the track. It nearly turned over, but landed on its wheels before sliding to a halt.

It took track safety workers about 15 minutes to get both drivers out of their cars. The practice session did not resume.

Dana and Carpenter, the stepson of IRL founder Tony George, both were airlifted to Jackson Memorial Hospital in Miami. IRL officials said Dana died shortly before noon.

Vision Racing team general manager Larry Curry said he was told Carpenter "would be fine."

Dana is the first IRL driver killed since Tony Renna died in a crash during testing at the Indianapolis Motor Speedway in October 2003. The last NASCAR driver killed was Dale Earnhardt in February 2001, and the last driver to die in Formula One was Ayrton Senna in May 1994.

It is the third racing death at the Homestead track. John Nemechek was killed in a NASCAR truck race in February 1997 and Jeff Clinton died in a Grand Am sports car event at the track in March 2002.

Paramedics load racecar driver Paul Dana into a medivac helicopter yesterday morning after a serious car crash on a Homestead, Fla. racetrack. Dana was later pronounced dead at a Miami hospital.

Courts reexamine marijuana issue

By David Kravets
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Each time the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled on medical marijuana, the justices have come down against allowing the sick and dying to use the drug to ease their symptoms and possibly prolong life. But the door has never been fully closed.

This week, a federal appeals court in California will hear arguments in the latest round of legal wrangling over the issue.

The case to be argued before the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Monday narrows the matter to the so-called right-to-life theory: that marijuana should be allowed if it is the only viable option to keep a patient alive or free of excruciating pain. It would apply only to the sickest patients and their suppliers, regardless of whether they live in one of the 11 states authorizing medical marijuana.

"A victory would affect people who are very seriously ill, facing death or great physical suffering," said Randy Barnett, a Boston University law school professor working on the case.

The case was brought by Angel Raich, a 40-year-old mother of two from Oakland who suffers from scoliosis, a brain tumor, chronic nausea and other ailments. She uses marijuana every couple of hours to ease her pain and bolster a nonexistent appetite.

"She'd probably be dead without marijuana," said her doctor, Frank Lucido, who has recommended its use for some 3,000 patients. "Nothing else

Military raids, clashes kill dozens in Iraq

U.S. military keeps quiet

By Sinan Salaheddin
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Police and a top aide to radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr said Sunday that 18 people were killed in a clash involving U.S. and Iraqi army forces at a mosque in eastern Baghdad. The U.S. military said it had no information on the reported violence.

The announcement came hours after a mortar round slammed to earth near al-Sadr's home in the Shiite holy city of Najaf. The popular anti-American cleric home but was not hurt, an aide said.

Iraqi authorities also said late Sunday that U.S. forces raided an Interior Ministry building and arrested 40 policemen after discovering 17 non-Iraqi prisoners in the facility.

Police 1st Lt. Thayer Mahmoud said the arrested police were being held for investigation, but the reason was not known. Mahmoud said the U.S. forces remained at the building and were guarding the 17 foreigners.

Abdul-Zahra al-Suaidi, head of al-Sadr's office in Baghdad, said U.S. forces and Iraqi soldiers opened fire at the al-Mustafa Shiite mosque in the Ur neighborhood, killing 18 people in what he called an unprovoked attack.

Separately, Iraqi police Lt. Hassan Hmoud said 18 people were killed in the mosque. He said he had no other details.

U.S. Sgt. 1st Class Keith Robinson, a spokesman for the 4th Infantry Division that has responsibility for Baghdad, said late Sunday his office had no information on the reported mosque clash.

Greg Hazbo, a spokesman for the U.S. command, also said the press center had not received any "releasable information" about any incident in that area. "We're still trying to find out what is going on," he said.

A child and at least one guard were wounded in the mortar attack earlier Sunday that hit some 165 feet from al-Sadr's home, according to police and al-Sadr aide Sheik Sahib al-Amiri.

Iraqi troops sealed the area and the cleric's Mahdi Army militia surrounded the home after the attack, al-Amiri said. Al-Sadr lives near the Imam Ali shrine in Najaf, about 90 miles south of Baghdad.

Shortly after the attack, the cleric issued a statement calling for calm.

"I call upon all brothers to stay calm, and I call upon Iraqi army to protect the pilgrims as the 'Sawasih tmshtanyst' are aiming to attack Shiites everyday," he said ahead of Wednesday's commemoration marking the death of the Prophet Muhammad.

Najaf police chief called the assault a "cowardly attack" by those still loyal to Saddam Hussein aimed at dividing the Iraqi people.

"But this will not happen," Maj. Gen. Abbas Mi'adal told reporters near al-Sadr's home. "We are ready to confront any terrorist schemes and protect the pilgrims."

At least 10 Iraqis were killed in violence elsewhere, including a 13-year-old boy killed by a bomb as he walked to school in the southern city of Basra. Police also found 11 handcuffed and bullet-riddled bodies dumped in Baghdad and two in the city of Baqouba.

The Iraqi army said it also had dispatched troops to investigate a report of 30 beheaded corpses in a village north of Baghdad, but the soldiers turned back before reaching the site, apparently fearing an insurgent ambush.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, meanwhile, said the U.S. could withdraw a significant number of troops from Iraq this year if Iraqi forces are able to assume greater control of the country's security.

"I think it's entirely probable that we will see a significant drawdown of American forces over the next year.

It's all dependent on events on the ground," the chief American diplomat said Sunday, echoing military commanders.

Beheaded bodies found by Iraqi forces

By Steven Hurst
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Iraqi forces found 30 bodies, most beheaded, near a village north of Baghdad on Sunday, in one of the bloodiest episodes in a cycle of apparent sectarian killings.

Police said the bodies were found after police and soldiers were dispatched to respond to a report of killings in Mullah Eid, a village near the town of Buhriz, a former stronghold of ex-President Saddam Hussein's Baath Party about 35 miles north of Baghdad.

Authorities gave no immediate information on the identities of the victims or on who may have been responsible.

The dead were being transferred to a morgue in Baghdad, police 1st Lt. Thaer Mahmoud said.

Brig. Saman Talabani, an Iraqi army commander, said earlier that soldiers turned back from the scene, fearing an ambush. The search team apparently did continue later, however, and discovered the bodies.

Iraq has seen an explosion of sectarian violence between Sunni and Shiite Muslims, including such secretive killings, since the Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra, a predominantly Sunni city, 60 miles north of Baghdad.

The Sunnis who dominate the area north of Baghdad were fervent supporters of Saddam, whose Sunni-led regime ruled Iraq for decades and brutally oppressed majority Shiite Muslims and minority Kurds.

Senate debates key immigration issue

By Nedra Pickler
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Founded by immigrants and praised as a haven for the oppressed, the United States now is struggling to decide the fate of as many as 12 million people living in the country illegally.

The Senate takes up the emotional debate on the heels of weekend rallies that drew hundreds of thousands of people protesting attempts to toughen laws against immigrants. Among the ideas that President Bush and members of Congress are considering:

—Erecting a fence on the Mexico border to deter illegal immigration.

—Treating people who sneak across the border as felons to be deported.

—Allowing foreigners to stay in the country legally as custodians, dish washers, construction workers and other low-paid employees.

—Allowing those working in the U.S. a path to citizenship.

—Requiring them to get in line behind everyone else back in their home countries who want to become Americans.

On Monday, the Senate Judiciary Committee takes up the issue and Bush headlines a naturalization ceremony for 30 new citizens at Constitution Hall. Demonstrations are planned near the Capitol, including a prayer service with immigration advocates and clergy who plan to wear handcuffs to demonstrate.

'Class of Katrina' shares one last dance

By Kathy Hanrahan
Associated Press

PASS CHRISTIAN, Miss. Wearing a canary yellow strapless evening gown, Jessica Jenkins walked across the remains of her home, raising her petticoat to keep it out of the red clay.

Prom season holds a special importance for Jenkins and other Gulf Coast students whose last year of high school was defined by Hurricane Katrina.

"The littlest things get to you now," said Jenkins, who was named the prom queen Saturday. "Things that you would never have thought would bother you before the storm, bother you now."

Next to the site of her old home, where their new house is under construction, Jenkins and older sister Leah share a trailer supplied by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Her parents and younger sister Brett live in an adjacent trailer. At one time, they all shared one trailer, with a white maltese and golden haired poodle.

"You have a lot of rough mornings trying to get ready in a FEMA trailer," she said.

Before Saturday's prom, she had to apply her makeup in the trailer's dim lighting while a bulldozer cleared debris from a nearby lot.

She and her classmates from Pass Christian High have been attending school in portable classrooms set up on the campus of the local elementary school. Enrollment was down from 600 students last year to 420.

Other senior classes from Pass Christian have had their proms at a venue in downtown Gulfport but it, too, was damaged by the storm, so Saturday's party for the Class of 2006 was moved to the Orange Grove Community Center off scenic U.S. 49, next to the Kangaroo Gas Station.

Jessica Jenkins, dressed for her senior prom, steps on boards to avoid clay and sand between the two FEMA trailers she shares with her family.

Senior Ryan Spear was shocked the school could hold a prom at all, much less have it ready on time.

"It isn't bittersweet. It's just sweet," fellow senior Heidi Knight said. "Having one just makes you feel normal."

House fire kills 2 in Brockton; cigarette likely cause of blaze

BROCKTON (AP) — A man and a woman are dead after an early morning fire Saturday that likely started when a cigarette ignited a couch, fire officials said.

State Fire Marshal Stephen Coan said the couch was smoldering when three men and a woman who lived in a first floor apartment on Harvard Street tried to remove the couch from the building.

The couch then burst into flames, Coan said. Two of the men were able to escape, but the man and woman were not.

Fire fighters were able to rescue the woman from the building after they arrived at the fire at 3:37 a.m., said Brockton Deputy Fire Chief George Phillips. She died later at Brockton Hospital, he said. The male victim was later found dead inside the building, Phillips said.

Phillips declined to identify the victims or give their ages, referring the questions to the Plymouth County District Attorney's office. A message left at the office was not immediately returned Saturday and an after-hours number was not working.

No one else in the five-unit apartment building was injured.

Coan said that whenever there's a fire in a building "the most important thing to do is to leave the premises. ... Always, there is only a small window of opportunity."

2 die, 1 hurt in Sharon car crash

SHARON (AP) — A 4-year-old boy survived a car crash on Sunday morning that killed his parents, state police said.

Juanita Medina, 27, of Randolph, lost control of the Toyota Corolla on Interstate 95 north in Sharon at about 5:30 a.m. The car veered from the left lane to the right breakdown lane, where it began to roll. As it rolled, the roof of the car struck a tree, police said.

"We believe that speed was a factor," Trooper Thomas R. Ryan said.

Oswald Dominguez, 29, of Brockton, was pronounced dead at the scene. Medina, who was partially ejected, was pronounced dead at Norwood Hospital, police said. Police at the scene identified the victims as the boy's parents, according to broadcast reports.

The boy suffered only minor injuries, police said. There was no indication alcohol was involved.

Police chief sentenced

PITTSFIELD (AP) — The former police chief of Hinsdale was sentenced to three months in prison after pleading guilty to multiple charges of fraud and theft.

Mark A. Green Sr., 50, wept and said quick farewells to family members and friends Friday after he was sentenced to serve 90 days of a two year sentence.

Berkshire Superior Court Judge John A. Agostini also sentenced Green to three years probation and ordered him to pay $12,000 in restitution after Green pleaded guilty to charges including four counts of larceny over $250 and filing false entries into corporate books.

Prosecutors said that between June 1999 and February 2003 Green misappropriated DARE and community policing funds and told police officers to submit false payroll slips for hours they didn't work, among other offenses.

Inmates skip meals in protest

DARTMOUTH (AP) — About 300 of the 1,000 inmates at the Bristol County House of Correction are skipping meals to protest a decision by Sheriff Thomas Hodgson to reduce meal portions.

The smaller portions, which went into effect about a week ago, are better for the prisoners' health and the county's finances, Hodgson said.

Some inmates have thrown trays at meal times and roughed up one prisoner for eating, he said. About six inmates have been put on disciplinary status and two who broke a sprinkler will face criminal charges and have to pay for its repair, Hodgson said.

"This is a small segment of the population," Hodgson told The Standard-Times of New Bedford. "Some inmates will look for any excuse to stir up trouble. ... This is not a hunger strike. The majority of inmates are eating their meals."

The new meal policy was instituted with input from a staff nutritionist and cuts anything above the basic nutrition inmates need to stay healthy.

Some of the changes include a maximum of two hot dogs instead of three at a meal and one piece of bread instead of three, the sheriff said.

Shortly after Hodgson took over as sheriff, he cut fried foods and potato chips from the jail's menu. Additionally, coffee isn't available to inmates with meals.

Police officers defend shooting of Plymouth teen

PLYMOUTH (AP) — The police officers who shot and killed a Plymouth teenager early this year felt they had no choice but to open fire because they feared their lives were in danger as the teen's car sped toward them, according to newly released reports.

"I observed the operator look directly at me as I approached," Officer Richard Tavares wrote in a report about the Jan. 10 incident in which 16-year-old Anthony McGrath was fatally shot. "The Camry then accelerated towards me. Unsure of an escape route, and my ability to avoid being struck by the Camry a second time, I felt my life was again in danger."

Tavares fired four shots at the vehicle, according to the report he filed 17 days later. Officer Edwin Almeida fired seven shots before McGrath's car came to rest in a nearby yard.

A state police investigation determined that Tavares, 39, and Almeida, 50, were justified in shooting at McGrath, who had ignored repeated orders to stop.

The office of Plymouth District Attorney Timothy Cruz released Tavares' report and other documents in response to a public records request by The Patriot Ledger of Quincy.

The incident began when Tavares and Almeida responded to an alarm at a liquor store at about 3:18 a.m. Almeida followed McGrath's vehicle, which was coming from the direction of the store, and turned on his flashing lights, according to reports.

Instead of pulling over, McGrath led police on a pursuit that reached 60 to 70 mph and ended when he crashed into a stone wall.

Tavares and Almeida used their vehicles to box in McGrath's car. Almeida got out of his cruiser and ordered McGrath to show his hands, according to reports.

Instead, Almeida wrote in his report, McGrath put the car in reverse, striking his cruiser before hitting a utility pole.

It was then that the car allegedly accelerated toward Tavares.

"At this point, the Camry appeared to turn away from me, but towards Officer Almeida's location to my right," Tavares wrote.

Tavares fired and McGrath was killed by a bullet that punctured a lung and his heart.

Once Tavares stopped firing, Almeida began.

The officers then pulled McGrath from his vehicle and handcuffed him.

"As we handcuffed the operator, I continually asked "Are You Shot? ... Where Are You Shot?" Tavares wrote.

The officers administered first aid and applied pressure to McGrath's wounds until paramedics arrived.

McGrath was pronounced dead at Jordan Hospital. His relatives have questioned whether the shooting was justified.

Gulf Coast students begin prom season

They got some assistance from far away, as six students from Pennsylvania's State College High School came to help them decorate and others in the central Pennsylvania town donated 150 formal dresses for the Pass Christian seniors.

"I figured that most people wouldn't think of a prom for hurricane survivors, but it is something important to high school students," said Jony Rommel, a State College High student who put on a performing arts show to help raise money for Pass Christian's big night.

In November, another group of Pennsylvania students, from Lampeter-Strasburg High School in Lancaster, donated money and supplies for an elaborate homecoming gala for Pass Christian and Long Beach high schools.

Katrina's effects extend into the post-high school plans of some students. Spear will attend a community college in Tennessee, where his family evacuated during the hurricane. Jenkins has decided she will attend Mississippi Community College, where she expects to play softball.

Debate over pot lights up in U.S. courts

works."

The Bush administration says the lawsuit is without merit.

"There is no fundamental right to distribute, cultivate or possess marijuana," Assistant U.S. Attorney Mark Quinlivan, the government's lead medical marijuana attorney, wrote to the appeals court.

Voters in 1996 made California the first state to authorize patients to use marijuana with a doctor's recommendation. Ten other states have since followed suit, but the federal government says there is no medical value to the drug.

In 2001, the Supreme Court ruled that Raich's supplier, the Oakland Cannabis Buyer's Cooperative, could not lawfully dispense marijuana despite California voters approving its medical use.

Two years later, in a small victory for medical marijuana backers, the high court let stand a 9th Circuit decision saying doctors have a First Amendment right to discuss or recommend the drug to patients without the threat of federal sanctions.

But last June, the Supreme Court ruled the federal government could prosecute medical marijuana users and their suppliers.

In some states, federal agents have been sporadically arresting users and raiding so-called pot clubs that dole out the drug to patients.

Still, a footnote by Justice Clarence Thomas in his 2001 ruling left the legal questions surrounding medical marijuana unsettled and helped open the door to Monday's 9th Circuit hearing.

Thomas wrote that important underlying constitutional questions remain unresolved, such as Congress' ability to interfere with states experimenting with their own laws and whether Americans have a fundamental right to marijuana as a vehicle to stay alive and remain free of too much pain.

The justices answered the first part of that footnote in June, ruling in another case brought by Raich that patients living in states with medical marijuana laws could be prosecuted because Congress has classified marijuana as an illegal controlled substance.

A man lights a marijuana cigarette.

That prompted Reps. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., and Maurice Hinchey, D-N.Y., to propose legislation that would have blocked the Justice Department from prosecuting medical marijuana users in states where it is legal. The House balked at the measure 264-161. A Hinchey spokesman said the congressman will resurrect the proposal this summer.

Raich is back before the 9th Circuit, one step short of the Supreme Court, in a bid to settle the second part of Thomas' footnote.

Her lawyer, Barnett, is arguing the Constitution guarantees the gravely ill a right to available medication to keep them alive and relieve torturous pain. Even if it is successful, the case would be unlikely to stop the raids on pot clubs or protect most users and suppliers.

Raich herself was arrested last week for disorderly conduct after she demonstrated outside the Oakland federal courthouse over a recent raid on a medical marijuana dispensary.

Regardless of the outcome of her case, she said she will continue using marijuana to treat her symptoms, and will keep fighting to do so without the threat or fear of federal prosecution. She expects her case to go to the Supreme Court no matter the outcome.

"I am going to keep doing this until they stop me because this is not a medical cannabis case but a right to life case," she said. "The federal government can say who can live and who can die if I lose in the Supreme Court."

Immigration reform debated after weekend of protests

the criminalization of immigration violations.

Bush is going to Mexico this week for a meeting with the leaders of Mexico and Canada. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Sunday it's important that Mexico "recognize the importance of defense of the borders and of American laws."

Protests raged across the country over the weekend, led by more than 500,000 people who marched through downtown Los Angeles on Saturday in one of the largest demonstrations for any cause in recent U.S. history. Marchers also took to the streets in Phoenix, Milwaukee, Dallas and Columbus, Ohio.

The president, working hand-in-hand with the business community that relies on cheap labor, is pressuring Congress to allow immigrants to stay in the country legally if they take a job that Americans are unwilling to do.

Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., also supports the idea and has vowed that his committee will advance a bill to the full Senate on Monday, even if they have to work "very, very late into the night."

"If they're prepared to work to become American citizens in the long line traditionally of immigrants who have helped make this country, we can have both a nation of laws and a welcoming nation of workers who do some very, very important jobs for our economy," Specter said Sunday on ABC's "This Week."

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., has said that whether or not a bill gets out of the Judiciary Committee, he is opening two weeks of debate on the issue Tuesday. He has offered a plan that would tighten borders, add Border Patrol agents and punish employers who hire illegal immigrants because he says the most important concern is improving national security in an age of terrorism. His bill sidesteps the question of temporary work permits, but he has said he's open to the idea.

Democrats have said they will do everything they can to block Frist's bill. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said Sunday that legislation creating tougher enforcement does not do enough

Suspect pleads innocent to drunk driving

Thursday, March 16

A Granby man pleaded innocent in Hampshire Superior Court to driving drunk before slamming his pick-up truck into a car outside the gates of Hampshire College on Jan. 23.

Amherst police say Barry A. Bernier, 48, of 181 West State St. in Granby, was intoxicated around 12:15 a.m. the night his truck collided on Route 116 with a car driven by Stephanie A. Baril, 20, a Hampshire College student.

Last week, Baril, a Haverhill resident, was still attached to feeding tubes. The accident left her unconscious for a month.

Bernier was charged with driving under the influence of alcohol causing serious injury, driving negligently under the influence of alcohol causing serious injury and driving negligently.

Another Hampshire student, Lydia Brousard, 18, was with Baril at the time of the crash. Police said Bernier's truck crossed the center line and smashed into the side of the girl's car before flipping over. Bernier was traveling about 45 mph at the time, police said, but had been traveling about 90 mph just moments before the incident, according to witnesses.

Baril's case was continued to April 20.

Teens arrested for Boulders robbery

Wednesday, March 22

Two teenagers were arrested in connection with the robbery of two college-age men that occurred at The Boulders apartment complex on Tuesday, police said.

The two college-age men were outside apartment 127 around 12:30 a.m. when three teenage males approached them and demanded money, according to Amherst police. One youth allegedly showed a knife and another youth allegedly showed a pistol.

The victims got into a physical confrontation with the assailants before the robbers took a small amount of money from the victims, police said.

After a search of the area, police arrested a 14-year-old male and a 16-year-old male in connection with the robbery. A third suspect is still at large. No weapons have been recovered, police said.

Coin store closes for selling sex objects

Tuesday, March 21

The owners of the Coin Emporium in Hadley were forced to close its doors on Friday, March 17 after several fire code violations were found, but that's not what had them fuming.

On the pervious week, the store was issued a cease-and-desist order for allegedly operating an illegal sex shop, the Daily Hampshire Gazette reported.

The owners are filing emergency appeals with the fire marshal's office and the Hadley Zoning Board of Appeals to keep open the store, which is located at 206 Russell St.

Town officials claim the Coin Emporium was in violation of town by-laws, which designate sex shops to be located in an industrial complex near the University of Massachusetts football stadium.

Steve Alban, the corporate owner of the store, claims over 90 percent of his inventory consists of coins and comic books, and less than 10 percent of his stock includes sex magazines, toys and videos. He says the new by-law states that if less than 10 percent of the inventory consists of adult material that it would not qualify as a sex shop.

Bush: Don't 'cherry-pick' the laws we follow

Chris Eckel

Hey, welcome back from Spring Break. Let's hope the FBI or other governmental acronym-loving agencies weren't in California, Cancun, Aruba or wherever all you crazy kids went off to play. If they were, you sure won't be hearing about what sort of pictures and recordings they might have been taking of you and your friends.

For that matter, it's quite likely that your Congressman won't either. You see, when he authorized the renewal of the Patriot Act earlier in March, he included a little addendum noting that he didn't feel overly obligated to let Congress know how he and the FBI were using the additional powers granted to them under the Patriot Act.

If that bit of trickery sounds a little bit like the disclaimer at the bottom of the used car and cigarette ads, it's because George Bush, just like Honest Al or Joe Camel, has something to hide. Mainly, that he has completely torn up the Constitution in favor of national security. President Bush is showing about as much respect for federal law as he has shown for the intelligence of the American people.

Here's the problem with all that. The United States is a democratic republic. That means that, ideally, all citizens are involved with governing the country. For the great majority of us, that means that we cast a ballot for someone much richer and older than we are and then hope that he/she will do a solid job of serving as our appointed voice.

However, if those elected officials are not getting the information to which they are entitled, that's fairly impossible to expect. Ask your little sister to make you a Grateful Dead and it probably isn't going to turn out as well as it would if you went into Charlie's. That's because your sister is missing some critical information on how to perform her duties.

Now, say what you want about Messieurs Kennedy and Kerry, but they deserve to know what the United States is doing, even more so than average citizens. According to Boston.com, Bush defended his rationale by saying that he would withhold information from other elected officials if he felt that it would "impair foreign relations, national security, the deliberative process of the executive, or the performance of the executive's constitutional duties."

Now, I know that even as you read this article, terrorists are undoubtedly walking through the Blue Wall and down the sweet streets of Anytown, USA, trying to breach national security. But are they really walking down the corridors of the Capitol Building?

George Bush is using the premise of national security to slowly turn the world's longest running democracy into an unofficial monarchy. (Actually, considering the omnipresence of Dick Cheney, perhaps the more appropriate word is diarchy.)

I sincerely doubt it, and that's the problem. George Bush is using the premise of national security to slowly turn the world's longest running democracy into an unofficial monarchy. (Actually, considering the omnipresence of Dick Cheney, perhaps the more appropriate word is diarchy.) According to the Constitution, the duty of the legislature is to write the laws, and the duty of the executive branch is to "faithfully execute" those laws.

Now to be fair to President Bush, the only definition of "execute" he has ever heard is related to pumping an electrical current or a drug cocktail through a convicted criminal's body. I may be just a humble University of Massachusetts student, but I would imagine that "execute" refers to satisfactorily following through on the proposed laws, not altering them according to one's whims and fancies.

Apparently, at least some of those older, richer folks agree with me. According to the same Boston.com article, Patrick Leahy, a senator from our lovely neighbor to the north, Vermont, recently said: "The president's constitutional duty is to faithfully execute the laws as written by the Congress, not cherry-pick the laws he decides he wants to follow. It is our duty to ensure, by means of congressional oversight, that he does so."

Now that's the first good idea I've heard all day. At one time, the Senate felt obligated to spend countless man hours and upwards of $40,000,000 on independent investigate research to find out if Bill Clinton had engaged in adultery, an act which, although illegal in some states, may not even be grounds for prosecution.

Is it really that unreasonable to expect that the Senate might want to investigate a series of policies derived from what is, at best, misinterpreted intelligence? Considering the legacy of democracy in the United States is in peril, I would sincerely hope someone soon challenges the near absolute authority of King George.

Government out of control

Matt Giancola

The summer of 1787 was already blistering hot when 55 men got together in Philadelphia and wrote a document that was not longer than four large pieces of parchment. That document would go on to change the world and define how a people view their nation.

The Preamble of this document states in one sentence the aims of the writers: "We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

These founders were not perfect though; far from it. They allowed slavery to continue and gave no rights to women. But they also created a country where the people could decide how they wanted to be governed. It took a long time, but eventually, through the democratic process, these wrongs were righted. Today, the liberties that so many have struggled to attain are yet again in question.

The most important aspect of the Constitution is the right to vote. Our votes go on to create a government that represents the people, but when our democratic institutions and our liberties are threatened, we can rely on no one else but ourselves to take them back. Today the United States stands at a turning point. Do we turn our backs on the founders of this country, and to all those who have died for it in order to feel safer, or do we stand up for freedom and democracy?

The president has recently declared himself above the law by issuing statements with bills passed by the Congress stating which provisions he will and will not carry out. If the Congress passes a bill and he signs it, he must "faithfully execute" that law. To not do this subverts the democratic process and the will of the people.

For example, President Bush recently signed the renewal of the Patriot Act. He later issued a signing statement that says that he will not go along with the requirement that he inform Congress of how the Patriot Act's police powers are being carried out.

He made a similar statement when the ban on torture was passed. In that case, he declared that the military really didn't have to follow that law because it would threaten national security…as if national security depended on beating and murdering unarmed men in prison cells (some of whom were later found to be unconnected with terrorist activity).

The new motto of the military prisons, posted on the walls reads "No Blood, No Foul." White House memos say that torture is only death and "major organ failure." A lot has changed in these past few years.

In Vietnam, all American troops were given cards saying what they were to do when they captured prisoners. At the bottom of the card, in plain language, read "Always treat your prisoner humanely." The new motto of the military prisons, posted on the walls reads "No Blood, No Foul." White House memos say that torture is only death and "major organ failure." A lot has changed in these past few years. How can we sit idly by while our government does this?

Continuing with his trend, Bush has allowed the NSA to tap the phones of Americans without a warrrant. He in fact could easily get a warrant issued to him by the secret FISA court, or even get Congress to change the law, but his adminstration has decided not to because, as Attorney General Gonzalez has said, he does not think they would find it to be in line with the Constitution.

The administration obviously has no respect for the Constitution. The president believes that he is above the law. One simple thing that can be done is to formally censure him. Senator Russ Feingold has introduced a censure resolution within the last couple days doing just that. If it were to pass, the Senate would simply be saying that they do not approve of the job that the President is doing. Nothing substantive would come of it, but it is important symbolically. The president must realize that his behavior will not be tolerated, and that this nation is governed by laws, not kings.

The Korean War Memorial in Washington, D.C. has a stirring phrase etched into the black marble. It is a common saying, but taken with the gripping statues of the veterans, it becomes all the more true. "Freedom isn't free." It must continually be fought for and guarded against tyranny, injustice and oppression. Just because we have a Bill of Rights does not mean we can stop worrying about unjust governments.

The founders, 11 years before the Constitution was written, decided what was to be done in the event that a government turns its back on the rights of the people – "...Whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends [our rights], it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government."

We still have the power to alter our government, by voting for candidates who will protect our liberties. In 2009, we will be able to start over, and rectify the wrongs that are now being committed in the name of the United States. Until that time, the dangerous incompetence of Rumsfeld and Bush will go unchecked, and the wonderful blessings of liberty will be in constant peril.

Ben Duffy

I've found that insulting the exalted Noam Chomsky elicits reactions of rage from the left somewhat equivalent to insulting someone's God. Mocking Chomsky to a lefty is like mocking Jesus to a devout Baptist. My only explanation is that the left really believes that he is a God.

A few weeks ago, I was at a pro-victory rally at Ramstein Air Force Base in Germany. Before it ended, two anti-war, German leftists showed up to argue with us. One of the Germans was absolutely incensed, so encapsulated in his own rage and hate that he was hardly capable of making a coherent argument.

If I thought he couldn't get any angrier, I was wrong. When he began a sentence with "According to Noam Chomsky...," I started to laugh at him. "Chomsky? Chomsky's your source?" I thought he was going to have an aneurism. Foaming at the mouth, he shot back "Chomsky is a good American. Not like you. You are a bad American."

It was as if I had just insulted his God. But Chomsky is a man, not a deity. He can neither walk on water nor heal lepers. He puts his pants on one leg at a time, just like everyone else. If you think that sounds blasphemous, maybe you need to get your head checked.

Chomsky has failings. One of his failings is greed. Another is hypocrisy. According to the conservative Canadian National Post, Chomsky recently set up a nice tax shelter for himself. He had previously spoken out against the "massive use of tax havens to shift the burden to the general population and away from the rich."

Chomsky has a point; our tax code is so filled with loopholes it looks like Swiss cheese. But Chomsky really likes those loopholes when they benefit him.

When Chomsky is talking about the rich, he's actually talking about himself. Anti-Americanism, Chomsky's cheap hustle, has made him a very wealthy man with assets of about two million dollars. America's a great country, isn't it Professor Chomsky?

A few years ago, Chomsky and his tax attorney (funny, I thought only rich Republicans had those) opened the Diane Chomsky Irrevocable Trust (named after his daughter) with the venerable Palmer and Dodge law firm. That fund now serves to protect his income from taxation, or as Chomsky would say, it's one of those "tax havens to shift the burden to the general population and away from the rich."

"I don't apologize for putting aside money for my children and grandchildren," said Chomsky. When Chomsky exploits loopholes, he's just being a good father. When other people do it, they're trying to stick it to the poor.

Even more ironic, Chomsky rejects the idea of private property. Here's another Chomsky gem: "When property rights are granted to power and privilege, it can be expected to be harmful to most." Once again, Chomsky really should speak in the first person here; when he talks about the rich he means himself.

I have an idea for the good professor. Since he rejects private property when that private property belongs to the rich, he can relieve himself of the terrible burden of his riches by giving it all to me. I could use a cool two million.

I have an idea for the good professor. Since he rejects private property when that private property belongs to the rich, he can relieve himself of the terrible burden of his riches by giving it all to me. I could use a cool two million. I wouldn't have to worry about the Bursar's office ever again, and I wouldn't have to work two summer jobs just to keep my car on the road.

I rather like my private property rights, Noam, and I'm not a rich man, only smart enough to know that eliminating private property rights is the first step toward a totalitarian state. When the government can come and take your home for the public good you'd better watch out because Stalinism is lurking right around the corner.

You'd think that with two million dollars and a lifetime source of cash coming from his leftists books, he would be able to lecture at universities for free. You would be wrong. His speaking fee is $12,000 and he speaks at dozens of universities every year. In fact, after September 11th, Chomsky's lectures were in such high demand that he raised his speaking fee from $9,000 to $12,000. That's war profiteering at its best. I'm so glad that my university fees ended up in Chomsky's pocket, or should I say, in the Diane Chomsky Irrevocable Trust.

I have no respect for that man. His scholarship in the area of politics is a joke. He's like a dog who only knows one trick. He knows how to blame every sin in the world on the United States and those evil corporate elites. No matter how silly his line of reasoning is (we made Pol Pot kill 1.7 million of his own people), his books keep selling, his lectures keep overflowing and the cash keeps flowing into the Diane Chomsky Irrevocable Trust.

The New York Times once called Noam Chomsky "the most important intellectual alive." In 2005, Prospect Magazine called him the number one living public intellectual. I call him the world's leading intellectual fraud.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

SGA AND PARKING DILEMMA

At a recent Wednesday senate meeting, I asked the SGA to pass a motion to help alleviate some of the recent parking services issues on campus. The motion explained that many students are not clear on the actual meaning of the parking signs on campus that read "Permit Required Monday-Friday 7a.m. – 5p.m."

Recently, parking services has started enforcing towing after 5 p.m. during the week. Since then many students have begun complaining that despite the fact they have a parking permit, they were often unable to find spots. Many students are unclear that the parking services policy explains that a permit is required from 7 a.m. on Monday through 5p.m. on Friday, and 24 hours a day in between.

My motion to the SGA asked that parking services update their signs, so that it is unmistakable to students that if they park in a parking lot and they do not have a permit for overnight, they run the risk of being towed. The Daily Collegian article on March 16 states that parking services has recently changed their policy, and therefore the signs now have a new meaning.

This was not what I said at the meeting and it was not what my motion explained. I'd like to clarify that I never said "The parking signs, which originally meant that parking is allowed in any lot for anyone after 5 p.m., were changed by Parking Services after students complained they couldn't find parking spots." as I was quoted in the Collegian.

However, what I did explain was that parking services has begun enforcing a policy they have already had in place. So, beware to the students on campus who park overnight illegally. There is a good chance you might be towed. While I am sure that it was an accident, I hope that in addition the Daily Collegian will be sure to accurately report all SGA meetings, and all news on campus.

Winkler finds new ways to make 'Happy Days'

By Robert Philpot
Knight Ridder Newspapers

FORT WORTH — Hanging on an office wall at KTVT is a portrait of Michael Richards as Kramer, the hipster-doofus character the actor played on "Seinfeld." Sitting in front of this portrait on a recent morning is Henry Winkler, who played '50s hipster Fonzie on the classic sitcom "Happy Days," a TV icon underneath a TV icon.

But as he chats, Winkler, who now stars on the CBS sitcom "Out of Practice," could hardly seem less Fonz-like. It's not just that he's a handsome 60 now, or that he's traded in T-shirts and leather jackets for a sportcoat and a shouldn't-work-but-does combination of purple shirt and yellow tie.

No, the difference is in Winkler's demeanor. He's polite but serious, occasionally breaking into nervous habits such as fiddling with a pen or tearing at a piece of paper, at one point interrupting the interview to marvel at how some woman on a TV monitor playing "The Price is Right" could be so excited about being on TV. These are the habits of a shy person, not of the coolest guy in the neighborhood.

Don't get Winkler wrong. He loves the Fonz, but the Fonz ain't him.

"I was a nerd," Winkler says in near-perfect diction about his days before "Happy Days." "Being dyslexic, I was always in the bottom 3 percent in the country academically. I was in the bottom 3 percent in the class of high school. I went to an all-boys private school where your grades and your college were your calling card. I didn't have a calling card. ... I would call a girl in the middle of the summer in New York, sweltering heat, I would have to wear an overcoat because I was shaking. The Fonz was my alter-ego. He was everyone I wasn't, everything I wasn't, everything that I wanted to be and couldn't manage."

Winkler discovered his dyslexia in 1976, when he was narrating a documentary about children with learning disabilities and recognized his own problem. Since 2003, he has channeled his childhood struggles with the learning disability into a string of humorous kids' books. The Hank Zipzer series — nine titles in total (a 10th is due in August), with the latest, "The Secret Life of a Ping-Pong Wizard," published in September, is aimed at fourth-graders and is about "the world's greatest underachiever." Co-written with Lin Oliver, the books all take off from some struggle Winkler's dyslexia caused him in school.

"Kids write me from all over the country," says Winkler, who was in town to promote "Out of Practice's" move from Mondays to Wednesdays on CBS. "I guess hilarious must be a fourth-grade word, because they say, 'Your books are hilarious.' And they say, 'How did you know me so well? How did you know how I felt? I don't feel alone. Hank can't spell; I can't spell. I could be a writer.' My job is done. Just that one comment alone, that a child now believes that they could be a writer. I didn't know I could be a writer until 2003."

It's not that Winkler, who notes that one in five children suffer from some sort of learning disability, has conquered his dyslexia. It's just that he's learned to adapt.

"You don't overcome it," he says. "What you do is, you integrate it. You learn to live with it. You learn what's best for you. I can't spell; I don't use a computer. My assistant uses the computer and gets my e-mail. Over the weekend, I have no idea if I got an e-mail or not, because there's no way I'm opening that up to figure that out. I know what my limitations are, and it doesn't stop me from going for the gold."

Later in the day, at a reading for patients at Children's Medical Center in Dallas, Winkler will tell his audience the inspirations behind his books. In one of them, Hank's problems grasping math led him to seriously overspice a recipe for enchiladas, causing his humorless teacher to have a five-alarm case of firemouth — and an embarrassing bout of flatulence.

In another, Hank studies and studies for a spelling contest, only to get tripped up on the "I before e" rule in front of his laughing classmates. In still another, Hank, who has poor hand-to-eye coordination, is petrified when he's asked to pitch for a baseball team. (Winkler learned to play catch from his "Happy Days" co-star Ron Howard, who bought his co-star his first mitt.)

Winkler's message is that all children have greatness within themselves, whether they have a learning challenge or not. Despite his dyslexia, he found his gift in acting and clung to his childhood dream of being on TV until that dream came true. And he'll never dismiss that dream.

He could have turned his back on "Happy Days," but he's stayed close to many former co-stars. Winkler played a recurring role in the Ron Howard-produced series "Arrested Development." Marion "Mrs. C" Ross appeared on this week's "Out of Practice," which returned in a new time slot at 8 p.m. EST Wednesday. He spoke with Don "Ralph Malph" Most just this month. Some stars try to reject their TV past, but Winkler isn't that way.

"I think they're shortsighted," he says. "I think that it's going to be with you anyway. I had a really great time playing (the Fonz). I had a great time being with those people for 11 years. Why would I then, all of sudden — the one thing that shot me onto the world stage — why would I say, 'Well, it doesn't exist'?"

Winkler also could have turned into "Surreal Life" fodder, but he's made a point to branch out, playing a right-wing talk-show host in the short-lived Fox sitcom "Monty," taking bad-guy guest-star roles in several series, and appearing in such non-"Happy Days"-ish projects as the movies "Scream" and "The Waterboy." When acting opportunities dried up for a while after the 1982 Ron Howard film "Night Shift," Winkler stepped behind the camera, taking several movie- and TV directing projects and racking up nearly three dozen producing credits, including last year's "Happy Days: 30th Anniversary Reunion Special."

"Fear is a tremendous motiva-

'LOTR' stage version worth every penny

By Martin F. Kohn
Detroit Free Press

TORONTO — Attention, Ontario: Resume breathing.

That show you've been counting on to bring in tourists? It just might do the trick.

The most expensive stage show ever (more than $23 million U.S.), the musical version of "The Lord of the Rings" began its world premiere engagement at the Princess of Wales Theatre right on schedule.

Seven weeks ago, technical glitches made the first preview clock in at 5 hours. These days "LOTR" runs 3 hours and 50 minutes, with two intermissions and a song after the curtain call. It may not be the 3 hours, 30 minutes that producer Kevin Wallace envisioned, but it doesn't feel overlong.

The show will run only in Toronto until at least 2007; the next production would be in London. Any New York production won't take place until 2008.

Is it worth the trip, and tickets that top out at $107 (U.S.)?

It is.

There's more good news. The local tourism association and the province of Ontario are among the show's backers. Although some performances are sold out, under an agreement between the show and Tourism Toronto 200 tickets for each performance (the theater holds 2,000) are set aside for out-of-towners. If you call for tickets and they tell you none are available, ask for the Tourism Toronto seats. You may be in luck.

Frodo lives, as do Sam, Gandalf, Strider, Arwen, Gollum and a raft of orcs, ents, elves and hobbits in a show that's lavish, lively and, although not really for kids, the most family-friendly theatrical event since "The Lion King."

I crave children younger than 9 at home, though, unless they know J.R.R. Tolkien's epic and have long attention spans. There is even a 15-minute show before the show, a lovely scene of rustic hobbit life, with folks dancing, singing and catching fireflies (tiny points of light) that appear as if by magic.

The tranquility is short-lived. That's what happens when the future of the world is at stake. Frodo and his companions must journey far to destroy the titular ring that would make Sauron, the evil one, invincible if he had it.

At least three epic battles are fought. In one, Frodo and company face a dragon-like creature whose mighty breath blasts the audience and showers spectators with little strips of black paper. In another, the fellowship fights an army of orcs, actors on spring-loaded devices that send them somersaulting in midair. These scenes are spectacular.

By the third battle ... well, never mind. The production, directed and co written by Matthew Warchus, has two audiences to please: the legions who have read the books or seen the movies and might feel shortchanged if a major battle were left out; and the multitudes who enjoy musicals but know nothing of Middle-earth, where "LOTR" takes place.

The latter group is up against the opera factor — the urge to ask, "Who's he?" or "What's happening now." You'll have a better time if you know the story. At least read the synopsis in the playbill.

Visually, "LOTR" is stunning. Roots or branches seem to grow from the stage and along the walls of the theatre. Elevators and turntables makes the stage rise and fall and spin. Actors on stilts become convincing horses and riders; actors on higher stilts become the impossibly tall mythic herders of trees, and when characters fly, their wires really are invisible.

Musically, "The Lord of the Rings" is an improbable hybrid that works, composed by the folk band Varttina, from Finland, and A. R. Rahman, from India, known for movie scores and the Broadway musical "Bombay Dreams." Musical supervisor Christopher Nightingale put it all together.

The music is atmospheric and engaging, not necessarily at the same time. Among the more atmospheric is the haunting, healing lullaby that Arwen (Carly Street) sings to the injured Frodo (James Loye). Among the more engaging and hummable are "The Cat and the Moon," a kind of Hobbit hoedown, and "Now and For Always," a sweet and plaintive song that Frodo and his sidekick Sam (Peter Howe) sing about their home far away.

Holly's widow sells off memorabilia

By Katie Menzer
The Dallas Morning News

DALLAS — Feb. 3, 1959, was the day the music died for a nation and the hopes of one young bride fell to pieces.

Now, 47 years after the winter plane crash that killed rock 'n' roll pioneer Buddy Holly, his widow has begun to think again of the future, and about who will preserve her husband's legacy once she no longer can.

"I'm not getting any younger," said Maria Elena Holly, now in her 70s. "That's one thing I learned from Buddy's death. Once you go, you don't know what will happen."

That's why Holly said she's arrived at a difficult decision — selling some of Buddy's possessions.

"I want to make sure the fans have a chance to get them," she said. "Buddy's fans should have them."

Holly is keeping her most precious keepsakes, and many others will remain on display at the Buddy Holly Center in his hometown, Lubbock, Texas. But the upcoming sale, organized by Dallas' Heritage Auction Galleries, offers devotees an alluring opportunity to own a small piece of rock's roots.

Buddy's diamond and engraved watch, which was pulled from the plane wreckage, is one of the most valuable pieces at auction, and officials said it could sell for six figures.

Big fans with smaller pocketbooks will find chances at acetate recordings and handwritten letters. There's a shirt in Buddy's favorite color of blue, his passport signed with his birth name, Charles Holley, and black-and-white snapshots of Buddy as a youngster in Lubbock with his dog, Ralph.

Online bidding has begun, and the floor auction will take place at the auction house April 14 and 15.

"Forty-seven years later, Buddy's presence in music is still being felt," said Doug Norwine, Heritage Auction's director of music and entertainment memorabilia. "This isn't about his death. This auction is about celebrating his life."

Holly's life with Buddy began on a Friday morning in 1958 when the lanky musician in dark-rimmed glasses walked into the recording company where Maria Elena worked.

Part of her job, and natural talent, was to charm clients as they waited, and it worked well on Buddy.

He immediately began pestering Maria Elena, who was then training to be a professional dancer, for a date.

"My aunt told me not to get involved with the musicians. She said they're not all well in here," Holly said, tapping a diminutive finger against her temple. "They are unstable."

But Buddy, already famous for his songs "That'll Be the Day" and "Peggy Sue," got permission from her aunt, and Holly said she found herself out with the "very good-looking" young man as soon as the workday had ended.

She said their connection was instant, and explosive.

"It was some attraction that I can't explain," she said. "He said that he felt he had known me his whole life, and I felt like that, too."

And while still out on that first date, only hours after they had met in the office waiting room — Buddy asked her to marry him.

Holly said she didn't believe he was serious, that is, until he showed up on her doorstep the next morning to ask her aunt for permission.

"My aunt was speechless, shocked," Holly said. "She didn't know what to think."

To prove his good faith, Buddy asked to use the phone to call his mother in Lubbock and tell her his intention to marry while Maria Elena and her aunt listened.

"Apparently, the poor woman fainted on the other end," Holly said with a smile. "All you could hear was him saying 'Mother, Mother' over and over again."

The call, however, did the trick, and her aunt gave her blessing. Within two weeks, the two were married.

But the union was soon torn apart.

Buddy was killed six months later on tour. Musicians Ritchie Valens and J.P. "The Big Hopper" Richardson were also killed on the plane headed from Clear Lake, Iowa, to Fargo, N.D.

Holly had not gone on the tour because she was pregnant. She later miscarried.

The Buddy Holly Statue stands in Buddy Holly Plaza, near the Lubbock Memorial Civic Center in Lubbock, Texas.

For two decades, Holly did not speak publicly of Buddy. She remarried, had three children and closed a door on that part of her past.

But her family persuaded her to reopen it, telling her it was her duty to share those memories. Now she can talk of her life with Buddy for hours, although she said she still can't play his music.

He wrote the hit "True Love Ways" for her as promise of their future life together.

"It still gets very difficult at times. I'd exchange all this here," she said, motioning toward some of Buddy's possessions in the auction house, "just to have him back for a moment."

Other celebrity items that are up for auction are Kurt Cobain's Mosrite Gospel guitar, $75,000, Bela Lugosi funeral book and pallbearers card with leather case, $10,000, Oil painting of a clown by Frank Sinatra, $7,000, James Arness' Gunsmoke badge, $1,500, Woodstock ticket, $1,000, Raiders of the Lost Ark prop submachine gun, $600, and a Ukulele signed by Tiny Tim and James Taylor, $400

Actors passionate about Baumbach's 'Squid and the Whale'

Jennifer Jason Leigh and husband Noah Baumbach at the 78th Annual Academy Awards in Hollywood on March 5 2006.

By PHOEBE FLOWERS
SOUTH FLORIDA SUN-SENTINEL

Before "The Squid and the Whale," Noah Baumbach directed two well-received movies, "Kicking and Screaming" (1995) and "Mr. Jealousy: (1997). But last year's brilliant, semi-autobiographical tale of a literary family suffering through divorce in 1986 Brooklyn has the feel of a first film, in all the right ways.

Baumbach spent four years nailing down financing for his bittersweet third project, which tells the tale of Bernard (Jeff Daniels, in a Golden Globe-nominated role) and Joan (Laura Linney, who stuck with the movie for all the years of pre-production), writers on the verge of a breakup after nearly two decades of marriage. Suffering the fallout are their two sons, insecure teenage Walt (Jesse Eisenberg) and disaffected 12-year-old Frank (Owen Kline).

Baumbach himself was 14 when his parents, novelist Jonathan Baumbach and former Village Voice film critic Georgia Brown, split in 1984, and he grew up in the same neighborhood where the film was shot (sometimes without permits due to lack of funds and time). Fittingly, his real younger brother, Nico Baumbach, shot the 10-minute behind-the-scenes featurette that is lacking only in length.

In it, Linney and Daniels talk passionately about their characters on location after the sun has set ("We're all here for the script," Daniels says). Iconic filmmaker Wes Anderson ("The Royal Tenenbaums"), with whom Baumbach collaborated on the script for "The Life Aquatic With Steve Zissou" and who has a producer credit on "Squid," pops up in the background of filming a few key scenes.

And Owen Kline, who Baumbach seems to go out of his way to neglect to mention is the son of actors Kevin Kline and Phoebe Cates, expresses how equally charming and precocious he is off-camera. (All the filmmaker will throw you is an occasional "his mom, Phoebe," and "my wife, Jennifer," meaning Jennifer Jason Leigh, a friend of Cates' since they made "Fast Times at Ridgemont High." It's a calculated modesty that would be annoying in a less talented director.)

Baumbach declined, he says, to do a traditional commentary, because "if I really had any more to say about the movie, it would have been in the movie." (Unsurprisingly, then, there are no deleted scenes on the disc.) Instead, he talks for just under an hour over a series of stills, which, again, might be annoying if Baumbach hadn't made such a fine film.

Watching and listening to the director discuss his work, it quickly becomes apparent that Baumbach is far too articulate and — we'll just say it — attractive to be working behind the camera. But when you consider his ability to make a movie so sharply funny and sad all at once, so relatable to myriad generations, thank God he is.

Winkler's books inspires kids

tor, and I never wanted to be in a magazine with the title 'Whered are they now?'" he says. "I think that would have just sent me over the bend. ... People say, 'Give me one bit of advice about being in this business,' and I say, 'You have to write the word tenacity. You have to write it in red, and paste it on your mirror, so that you see it every day. You have to take your pick and your shovel, and you have to mine the system every day. Because nobody is going to do it for you."

"Out of Practice," which debuted in September, had a seemingly cherry time slot following "Two and a Half Men," CBS' top-performing sitcom. But the show, a traditional but raucous comedy about a family of doctors, was bounced to make room for Jenna Elfman's "Courting Alex" and now Julia Louis-Dreyfus' "The New Adventures of Old Christine."

With its new 8 p.m. Wednesday slot, "Out of Practice" has landed in a soft time period that CBS has treated as a dumping ground for sitcoms, but the show has improved since September, with the writing snappier and funnier, and the cast chemistry jelling.

Winkler knows the move is risky, but he believes that fans of the show will come back — as will people who checked it out once or twice last fall, then drifted away.

"The thing is, we were on the rise when they took us off," he says. "What we have to do is remind (viewers) that they had a good time. What I honestly say is, 'You give me a half-hour of your time, we will make you laugh out loud. And if we don't, I'll come to your house and make dinner.'"

Teacher sitcom to premier Tuesday

By HAL BOEDEKER
THE ORLANDO SENTINEL

Teachers juggle more than enough problems that could inspire a top-flight, topical comedy. Remember how the absurdities of local TV news jazzed up "The Mary Tyler Moore Show" and how the absurdities of war lifted "M*A*S*H"?

But NBC's "Teachers," debuting Tuesday night, settles for just being absurd. This disappointing sitcom reminds me of a saying that adorned the front hall at my school: The easy street never leads anywhere.

"Teachers" gives predictable routes in depicting an average to below-average New Jersey high school. The educators' sex lives command more time than education. The result is just another below-average sex farce, with jokes about cleavage, sexual identity and missed opportunities. The mere mention of a penal colony prompts one gag.

But darned if you won't learn about the state of television comedy from this series. The main actors, led by Justin Bartha of "Failure to Launch," are attractive and appealing. Veteran director James Burrows of "Cheers" and "Will & Grace" guides the opener with a sure hand.

The stumbling block is tepid writing. The students come off as nothing more than props. The secondary characters are annoying caricatures: the strident principal, the sarcastic veteran educator, the dimwitted teacher with sweaty hands. For all its acid moments, "Teachers" turns mushy with alarming frequency. (Matt Tarses developed the half-hour comedy and says it has only a slight connection to the BBC hour series with the same title.)

The main assets are the three leads. Bartha plays Jeff, an English teacher who masks his love of teaching with wisecracks. Jeff is smitten with Alice (Sarah Alexander of "Coupling"), a teacher from Britain, but she dislikes his irreverence. History teacher Tina (Sarah Shahi of "The L Word") responds more quickly to Jeff's jokey jabs.

How ABC managed to bungle 'Commander in Chief' show

By HAL BOEDEKER
THE ORLANDO SENTINEL

Disgruntled fans, mystified by network scheduling, keep asking about their missing favorites. Two questions crop up most frequently:

Where's "Everwood"?

Where's "Commander in Chief"?

"Everwood," the WB drama that hasn't offered a new episode since Dec. 8, returns at 8 Est tonight. In two fresh, back-to-back installments, fans learn the latest about the family life of Dr. Andy Brown (Treat Williams), the prescription-drug addiction of Dr. Jake Hartman (Scott Wolf) and the romantic turmoil between Ephram Brown (Gregory Smith) and Amy Abbott (Emily VanCamp).

"Commander in Chief," the ABC drama about the first female president of the United States, hasn't presented a new episode since Jan. 24. It rejoins the lineup April 18.

Geena Davis won a Golden Globe for playing President Mackenzie Allen, and "Commander in Chief" remains the most-watched new series from last fall, just ahead of CBS' "Criminal Minds." So how could "Commander in Chief" be in such deep trouble?

Start with erratic scheduling, production problems and major shakeups behind the scenes. Series creator Rod Lurie left, and super producer Steven Bochco stepped in. Now Bochco (of "NYPD Blue") is focusing on a fall pilot, and executive producer Dee Johnson is guiding "Commander in Chief" to the end of an 18-episode season. (That's another sign of problems: Most series produce 22 episodes a season.)

When ABC last week announced the season finale dates for "Grey's Anatomy," "Desperate Housewives" and "Lost," the network was mum on what's ahead for "Commander in Chief." The presidential saga will have seven new episodes to air in the six weeks before the season ends May 24.

Renewal in May depends on how "Everwood" and "Commander in Chief" perform in the season's final weeks. The odds are better for "Everwood." The WB is going out of business, but the new CW network will need established series to start next fall. "Everwood" did well on Thursdays last fall, and the drama will probably produce higher ratings after "7th Heaven" on Mondays this spring.

"Commander in Chief," however, did the unforgivable in today's television world. It became a favorite among viewers older than the 18-to-49 age group, reducing its appeal among advertisers.

ABC hurt the show with misguided nurturing. The network kept "Commander in Chief" off the air in February to protect it from Fox's "American Idol" and the Winter Olympics on NBC. In March, in President Allen's slot, ABC subbed "Sons & Daughters," a critical favorite that has yielded anemic ratings. Out of sight, "Commander in Chief" was out of most viewers' minds.

With President Allen off the schedule, CBS swooped into the same time slot in March and premiered "The Unit," a military drama created by playwright David Mamet. "The Unit," starring Dennis Haysbert, has emerged as the season's most-watched new drama.

Last season, "Desperate Housewives" and "Lost" were big fall arrivals that electrified the television industry. Nothing new this past fall generated a similar reaction.

The major newcomers this season arrived at midseason. In addition to "The Unit," CBS has another hit in "The New Adventures of Old Christine," a comedy with Julia Louis-Dreyfus. The midseason has produced many failures — "Love Monkey," "Emily's Reasons Why Not," "The Book of Daniel" — yet CBS single-handedly is proving that viewers still want new scripted programming.

Reality has thrived at midseason. Two editions of Fox's "American Idol" sit atop the ratings. "Dancing With the Stars" revived ABC's fortunes on Thursdays and Fridays. "Deal or No Deal" is one bright spot on NBC's schedule. In the early going, "American Inventor" has performed well on ABC.

In this rapidly changing landscape, President Allen couldn't compete. ABC wouldn't let her. The network frittered away the biggest hit of the fall, and renewal seems highly unlikely.

The probable legacies of "Commander in Chief": Davis can polish her Golden Globe, and fans can mourn a series that might have been the next "West Wing."

Geena Davis, winner for Best Performance by an Actress in a Television Series, in the pressroom at the 63rd Annual Golden Globe Awards at the Beverly Hilton Hotel in Los Angeles on Jan. 16, 2006.

Minutemen get back on track with three wins during break

Doc Schneider played a large role in stifling Loyola's attack, as he recorded a career-high 19 saves in the win.

"It's all to my defense," Schneider said. "When they play well, I play well. We just play hard together."

After the break, the scoring opened up for both sides. Loyola scored three goals in the first 1:29 of the second half to tie the game. UMass answered with five consecutive goals, but Loyola rallied with two goals to draw within three, at 9-6, entering the fourth quarter.

UMass scored the first five goals of the final frame to put the game away. The Maroon and White were led by a balanced scoring attack, as five players scored two goals, led by senior attacker Sean Morris who also added four assists, to boost his NCAA-leading points total to 38.

The win was the first for UMass over the Greyhounds in 10 meetings.

Against Sacred Heart (1-6) on Tuesday, it appeared that the Minutemen would coast to an easy win over the then-winless Pioneers, as UMass jumped out to a 5-0 lead in the first six minutes. But Sacred Heart hung tough and by halftime had narrowed the gap to three, at 8-5.

"I thought we really started strong," Cannella said. "One of our goals was to start strong, but to be able to maintain it throughout and sort of cruise. Sacred Heart is a good team – I don't take anything away from them – but between the second and the third quarter we floated a little bit, and we paid for it."

It appeared that the letup by the Minutemen would be very costly as Sacred Heart scored the first three goals of the third quarter to tie things up. But UMass responded by dominating the rest of the way, scoring the next nine goals before allowing a goal with 17 seconds left, resulting in the 17-9 final score.

Freshman goalie Doc Schneider recorded a career-high 19 saves in a 14-9 win over Loyola on Saturday at Garber Field.

Junior midfielder Brett Garber turned in his second stellar performance in as many games, as he tallied four goals. Senior attacker Clay Stabert also netted four goals and added an assist, for a career-high of five points.

A key to the UMass run was the play of senior long-stick midfielder Jake Deane. Deane kept the Minutemen in possession, winning 20-of-26 faceoffs.

"I thought the difference was Jake Deane," Cannella said. "We won all of the faceoffs during that stretch and we were able to make a little run to score three goals and go up. When you have a guy like Jake that is going to go out there and fight for you, people jump on his back. I think that's what we did."

The Minutemen began their successful stretch with a win at Brown (2-4) on March 18, a bounce back performance from the loss to Albany earlier in the week.

Clinging to a 9-8 lead late in the third quarter, UMass benefited from a Brown penalty, resulting in a man-advantage for the Minutemen. Cannella contemplated holding the ball so that UMass would begin the fourth quarter with possession, but decided to put the ball in Morris' hands and let his captain make the final judgment.

The decision paid off, as Morris found senior midfielder Jamie Yaman on the doorstep setting up an easy goal. UMass kept control in the fourth quarter, outscoring Brown 3-1 to escape with a 13-9 victory.

As has become customary, UMass benefited from a balanced scoring attack, as Yaman, Garber and freshman attacker Jim Connolly all netted hat tricks.

Garber led the way with four goals and added an assist for a career-high five-point game. Garber scored nine goals during the week, and is now tied with Morris for the team lead with 12 goals on the season.

"I feel like I've been getting more confidence," Garber said. "We've been playing great as a team – that's what helped it. I've been able to get some looks and I've been able to take advantage of it."

Cannella was encouraged by having other players aside from Morris fill up the box score.

"I think that everybody is ready to step up which is great," Cannella said. "If they try to shut somebody down hopefully somebody else steps up. If you're consistent that way you'll be a pretty good offensive team."

Senior long-stick midfielder Jake Deane has been dominant on faceoffs this season for UMass, winning 63 percent of draws.

UM off to slow start

provided quality innings out of the bullpen. To play 27 innings and only use four pitchers is something that we are really pleased with."

While the pitching staff held its own and gave the Maroon and White opportunities to win, UMass hurlers also gave up some costly runs. Several times over the break the Minutemen relinquished late-inning leads.

Against Army on March 17, UMass took a 5-4 lead into the bottom of the ninth inning after Lou Proietti scored the go-ahead run on an error in the top half of the frame.

However, the Black Knights put two runs on the board in the bottom of the inning to steal the game from the Minutemen, who suffered their third loss of the season.

On March 19 against Illinois, the Minutemen took a 3-1 lead into the seventh inning. Sullivan was cruising until the seventh, when he let up three runs on five straight hits to give the Illini a 4-3 lead. Illinois held on for the one-run win and handed UMass its fifth loss, extending its losing streak to four games.

The Minutemen snapped their four-game skid the next day with a 7-2 win over the Rollins College Tars, the only win during the eight games UMass played during Spring Break.

Sophomore Aaron Smith started against the Tars for the Maroon and White and went five and 1/3 innings allowing two runs — one unearned — on five hits while striking out two. Decato saved the game for Smith, turning in three and 2/3 innings of shut out baseball to get Smith his first win of the season.

The Tars had runners in scoring position in both the seventh and eighth innings including a bases-loaded, two-out situation in the eighth — but Decato escaped the jams and rescued the Minutemen from their four-game losing streak. Freshman Adam Tempesta was 2-4 in the game with an RBI and a run scored.

body has got to pay and I guess it was his turn," Samsonov said. "The team went through so many changes this year, a lot of things changed, and it seemed like it was almost natural just to go even higher."

Along with Sinden, O'Connell presided over a disastrous strategy heading into the NHL lockout that cost the league the entire 2004-05 season. The Bruins spent years purging their roster of all long-term deals in the hopes that they would be in position for a spending spree when the games resumed.

"This team, the way it's set up with the rule changes, I think that we have to be considered one of the favorites for the Stanley Cup," O'Connell said in August after signing captain Joe Thornton to a three-year contract.

But the new agreement with the players wasn't the one the Bruins expected, and they didn't come away with any advantage O'Connell scrambled to fill up the roster but was unable to convince big names like Peter Forsberg and Mike Modano to sign up.

"That was the strategy we took and I'll live with it. That's the way it goes," he said from his home in a telephone interview with The Associated Press shortly before the Bruins took the ice against Buffalo on Saturday night. "Whenever you don't win in professional sports and you're the general manager of the team, this is to be expected."

The Bruins were 27-32-12 when O'Connell was fired, they are last in the Northeast Division, 13th in the Eastern Conference and nine points behind Montreal in the playoff race. In all, O'Connell's teams went 207-203-71 and twice topped 100 points but never made it out of the first round of the playoffs.

"He tries to put a team together and obviously he can't play. So we have to do the job on the ice, and we didn't get it done," forward Glen Murray said after the 5-4 victory over the Sabres.

New players, same goal for Sox

he was traded. "That's all we talked about is how there's probably 30 of us that were at some point on the team, or maybe a couple more in '04, and there aren't very many guys left.

"But personal feelings don't matter. It's about making money and it's about having the best team that you think can win on the field."

Boston actually used 51 players in 2004, eight of them for three games or less. Only 13 are still in the organization.

Three of them – pitchers Lenny DiNardo, Abe Alvarez and Phil Seibel – are expected to start the season in the minors and a fourth, outfielder Gabe Kapler, is recovering from a ruptured left Achilles' tendon.

The nine players from the 2004 team certain to start the season with the Red Sox, barring injury, are pitchers Timlin, Schilling, Wakefield and Keith Foulke, designated hitter David Ortiz, catcher Jason Varitek, outfielders Manny Ramirez and Trot Nixon and first baseman Kevin Youkilis.

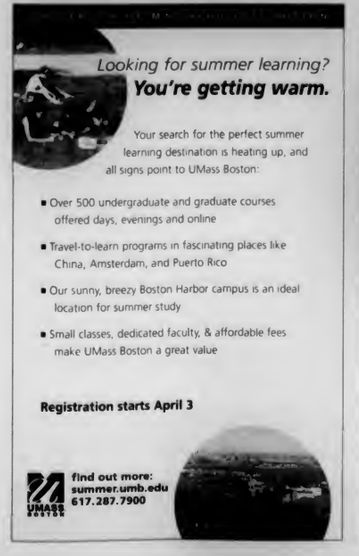
The Red Sox were swept in the 2005 AL division series by the Chicago White Sox. Other recent champions also declined after making wholesale changes, although none had fewer returnees than Boston.

Arizona won the title in 2001 then used 16 of the same players in 2003 when it finished third in the NL West. Anaheim won the title in 2002 then used 20 returnees on the 2004 team that was swept by Boston in the AL division series.

Florida won in 2003 and had 13 players back in 2005 when it finished third in the NL West. Three of them – Josh Beckett, Mike Lowell and Alex Gonzalez – joined the Red Sox after last season.

"In this game of baseball, you never know what's going to happen," said rightfielder Nixon, entering his eighth full season with Boston. "You just take it in full stride and go out there and don't change the way you play."

The trade for Pena, who figures to platoon in right field this year, leaves Nixon's future in question. He can become a free agent after this season.



"Players get older, players get hurt, players get more expensive."

Epstein said of his team-building approach. "It's important to keep one eye on the present and one eye on the future in putting together a roster."

Back in the 1918 World Series, Babe Ruth went 2-0 as a pitcher and allowed two earned runs in 17 innings. The Red Sox won the title on Sept. 11 that year then sold Ruth to the Yankees on Jan. 3, 1920.

Of course, there was no indication then that the transaction would become the symbol of the 86-year championship drought. And now, there is no certainty about how the new-look Red Sox will perform after the season starts April 3.

"You never know what kind of product you have until you put it out on the field," Timlin said.

UM takes A-10 opener

off it's A-10 schedule on Wednesday against George Washington.

The Maroon and White's offense exploded for five home runs on the day, including a school-record four in the second game of the doubleheader.

Balschmiter threw a one-hitter and recorded six strikeouts in the first game, while Acampora blasted her fifth home run of the year, a two-out grand slam in the third inning.

The only hit Balschmiter allowed was a lead-off single in the first. It would be the only base runner for the Colonials.

The Minutewomen, on the other hand, had 12 runners in the first game. After Acampora's grand slam opened things up for the offense, the Minutewomen scored five more runs before the game was called in the sixth. UMass won the opener 9-0.

The second game of the doubleheader was no different for the Maroon and White, as UMass pounded four more home runs. Catcher K.J. Kelley had two homers in the game, giving her three on the season, and adding to her school record for career homers. She now has 38 home runs as a Minutewoman.

Mollica added a homer of her own, and freshman Samantha Solato added one as a pinch hitter for Stefanoni. The Minutewomen shutout the Colonials again 6-0, sweeping their conference rival to open A-10 play.

Busch gets first win for Penske

By Jenna Fryer
Associated Press

BRISTOL, Tenn. – New team, new car, same old results for Kurt Busch at Bristol Motor Speedway.

Busch brashly bumped Matt Kenseth – his old teammate – out of his way with four laps to go Sunday to win the Food City 500, his fifth victory in the last nine races on the half-mile track.

But this was his first win since joining Roger Penske's team at the start of the season and taking over the famed No. 2 Dodge that nine-time Bristol winner Rusty Wallace drove. Busch celebrated his victory by jumping from his car, grabbing the checkered flag and doing "snow angels" on the finish line as a nod to the wintery weather that plagued the track all weekend.

"This is unreal," he said. "I'm just so happy to be able to have this car and have Roger's privilege to do so."

Kevin Harvick finished second and was followed by Kenseth, who faded back after Busch's pass and drew the ire of Jeff Gordon after making contact with him that sent Gordon spinning. Gordon plummeted all the way to a 21st-place finish, then stalked Kenseth on pit road.

Kenseth approached him with his arms out as if he was trying to explain the situation, but Gordon gave him a hard shove that knocked him back several feet. The two were quickly separated by NASCAR officials.

"That was my fault, it was an accident and I didn't mean to do it," Kenseth said of his contact with Gordon. "I would be hot, too. He raced hard all day long for his third-place finish and it got taken away from him. I probably should have known better than to go over him."

Carl Edwards finished fourth and Bobby Labonte was fifth. Mark Martin and Greg Biffle were sixth and seventh – putting four of Roush Racing's five drivers in the top seven.

Kyle Busch, who won Saturday's Busch race, was eighth. Ryan Newman was ninth and Kasey Kahne, last week's winner, rounded out the top 10.

Bristol is always a race of attrition, with drivers hoping to avoid the numerous accidents while keeping their tempers intact. This one was no different, except that the usual temper tantrums weren't in play until very late in the race. Instead, shoddy driving skills seemed to contribute to most of the 18 cautions.

The many accidents led dozens of torn up race cars – at one point, a piece of sheet metal from Dale Jarrett's car flew into the stands and was quickly snatched up as a souvenir – and only 21 of the 43 cars finishing on the lead lap.

Still, the event wasn't immune to retribution and retaliation. Gordon spun out Martin Truex Jr. late in the race, and Truex tried to get even by banging alongside Gordon's Chevy. Truex was a lap down, Gordon was in the lead pack, and the shenanigans were holding up Tony Stewart.

Stewart, sick of watching the games in front of him as the leaders pulled away, rammed into the back of Truex to send him into a race-ending spin. Truex then got a tongue-lashing over his radio from his crew chief, who was irate that his rookie driver allowed frustration to blow a decent finish.

denly looked like a rattled underdog from a mid-major. Rashad Anderson tossed up an airball 3-point attempt that could have cut the lead to one, and Adrien missed one of two free throws in the final 30 seconds.

But Mason gave UConn a chance to win with poor free-throw shooting. Lewis missed three attempts in the final 15 seconds – the last two with 6.1 seconds to go – giving the Huskies a final possession to tie or win. Denham Brown, who made the reverse layup at the regulation buzzer to send the game to overtime, was off the mark from the left wing with a potential game-winning 3-pointer at the buzzer.

Throughout the game, chants of "G-M-U" and "Let's Go Mason!" reverberated off the ceiling of the Verizon Center. Green and gold, as expected, were the dominant colors, and the building reached a new-level din of enthusiasm when Tony Skinn made a 3-pointer to tie the game at 21 in the first half.

The pregame mannerisms of the coaches also reflected the different state of the two programs. Larranaga looked like someone running for mayor, shaking hands with everyone and high-fiving the cheerleader's pompoms, while UConn's all-business Jim Calhoun stood with folded arms and an expression that suggested a man fighting stomach cramps.

UConn started 7-for-10 from the field yet couldn't pull away from the tenacious Patriots, who somehow managed to pull down and chase rebounds despite their height disadvantage. When the Huskies went cold, missing seven straight field goals, George Mason pulled even. The second of back-to-back steals by Skinn led to two free throws by Thomas that put the Patriots ahead 29-28, their only lead of the first half.

But the Huskies responded with a 15-2 run, including four 3-pointers from four players over the final three minutes of the first half. The lead was 12 when George Mason got a boost just before halftime – Campbell's three-point play with less than one second remaining cut the deficit to single digits, 43-34, at the break.

Mason outrebounded UConn 16-15 in the half, but the Huskies shot 57 percent, with Adrien going 5-for-5 for 10 points.

The Patriots pulled within one early in the second half with an 8-0 run. Campbell hit a 3-pointer after a gritty offensive rebound by Thomas, and Skinn made a driving layup despite losing control of the ball and changing hands in mid-air. Then, with 12:31 to play, Campbell hit another 3-pointer that tied the game at 49. The next milestone came with 11:09 remaining, when Butler sank another 3 to give Mason a 52-51 lead.

For the next six minutes, the teams punched and counterpunched, with neither leading by more than two until Skinn's 3-pointer with five minutes to go put Mason ahead 67-63. Marcus Williams' steal and three-point play cut Mason's lead to 71-70 with 47 seconds remaining, and the Patriots went 2-of-5 from the foul line in the final minute to give UConn the chance to send the game to overtime on Brown's buzzer-beating layup.

Sox look to return to 2004 form

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. – The 2004 World Series trophy has a permanent home in Fenway Park. Most of the Red Sox players who won it are already gone.

Just 17 months after becoming champions, only nine players from that team are likely to be on this year's Opening Day roster. Why such a shake-up, especially since the last time Boston won the title it parted with a key contributor – Babe Ruth – 16 months afterward and didn't win another one for 86 years?

Why tamper with success?

"Usually teams that win still have holes," reliever Mike Timlin said. "People want to make a good thing better. That's just the nature of America."

Older players whose contracts run out command more money than the Red Sox want to pay (Johnny Damon, now with the New York Yankees) or decline in performance (Kevin Millar, now with Baltimore). Young players develop to the point where they deserve to be in the majors (Jon Papelbon).

Starting pitchers find better free agent deals elsewhere (Derek Lowe and Pedro Martinez after brilliant outings in the 2004 World Series) or have reasonable contracts that make them good trade material (Bronson Arroyo).

"I have enormous respect and admiration for the members of our 2004 club," general manager Theo Epstein said. "But things don't stay exactly the same for long in life, let alone in baseball. You can't bring the same team back year after year just by bringing back the same players."

Arroyo is the most recent Red Sox champion to leave, going to Cincinnati in a trade for 24-year-old outfielder Wily Mo Pena, a raw talent with exceptional power. That leaves Boston with Curt Schilling and Tim Wakefield as the only regular starting pitchers from the 2004 team that swept St. Louis in four games.

"I talked to Millar yesterday," the popular Arroyo said the day after

'Break' out week

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team limped into Spring Break on the heels of its first setback of the season, a disappointing 9-8 loss to Albany on March 14, but the No. 10 Minutemen (6-1, 1-0 ECAC) regained their swagger with three wins during the week that classes were adjourned.

UMass punctuated the stellar week with a dominant 14-9 win over ECAC foe Loyola on Saturday at Garber Field. The Maroon and White began the week with two out-of-conference wins, beginning with a 13-9 victory at Brown on March 18 and following with a 17-9 drubbing of Sacred Heart on Tuesday at home.

The Minutemen will look to ride this momentum into Penn State, as they will face the Nittany Lions in Happy Valley on Saturday at noon.

In Saturday's matchup with No. 19 Loyola (3-3, 2-1 ECAC), the Minutemen came out with a little extra intensity and it showed as they sent Loyola players to the Garber Field turf repeatedly.

"This was the first week we've played our game since Hofstra," said senior defenseman Jack Reid, who had the day's biggest hit, a crushing shot at midfield that forced the Loyola player to leave the game. "We won a bunch of games when we weren't playing our game, but we had a strong opponent in Loyola and we had to come out and play UMass lacrosse. That was a big thing all week."

In the days leading up to the game, UMass coach Greg Cannella tried to motivate his squad to play with more intensity, especially with the challenging ECAC schedule beginning.

"It's something that we focused on from Tuesday to today – to get back to playing the way that we believe we can play, with the intensity level that we can play at," Cannella said. "We're going to need to do that throughout the next seven games."

UMass came out of the gates sharp, and held a 4-1 edge at halftime. Freshman goalie

See LACROSSE on page 7

Junior midfielder Brett Garber scored nine goals in three games during Spring Break, bringing his team-leading total to 12. The Minutemen won all three games they played last week.

Minutemen struggle in first A-10 series

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team (2-9, 0-3 Atlantic 10) went into Spring Break with a 1-2 record and a road trip to Florida and New York around the corner. Aside from the Sunshine State's 70-degree weather, there wasn't much for the Minutemen to celebrate after the Fordham Rams (9-13, 3-0 Atlantic 10) swept UMass in this weekend's series.

"We need to learn how to win," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We've been a better ballclub than we've shown. We're looking to get back on the winning track."

Since March 17, the Minutemen have mixed one win against Rollins College – a 7-2 triumph in the first half of a two-game series on March 21 – in with seven losses. UMass has dropped its last four games – three were to the Rams in New York this weekend in its first series of conference play.

Stone and company will be back in action when they face Sacred Heart on the road on Tuesday at 3 p.m.

Fordham's dismantling of the Minutemen ended yesterday with a 4-2 UMass loss after a stellar pitching performance by hurler David Sullivan came up short.

Sophomore Bryan Garrity drove in freshman second baseman Adam Tempesta in the sixth inning, pulling UMass to within one run. But the Rams sealed the deal in the eighth with two runs of their own, pushing the lead to 4-2.

Fordham improved to a perfect 3-0 in A-10 play after the sweep of the Minutemen this weekend.

Rams' starter Javier Martinez blanked the Maroon and White in the second game of the series on Saturday. Martinez threw eight shutout innings and struck out eight Minutemen while allowing just five hits.

UMass hurler Rory McDonald took the L in a hard-fought effort: he threw eight innings, striking out five Rams and allowing seven hits. The two Fordham runs were unearned.

Junior first baseman Bryan Adamski hit for a .350 average with two home runs over the break – that boosted his average to .313 for the season (third on the team), and a team-leading seven runs scored, .594 slugging percentage and .500 on-base percentage.

Adamski has been the anchor for the UMass offense so far this season and Stone has high expectations the rest of the way.

"We really think [Adamski] is going to hit well and that's why we have him in the four-spot," Stone said. "We expect the rest of the lineup to come around. We should be turning the corner real soon. It's going to take eight to 10 games to get into the swing of things."

The UMass pitching staff performed well in the Fordham series despite the 0-for-3 showing. After the Rams posted 11 runs on Friday, the Minutemen hurlers recovered nicely over the weekend, allowing six runs over the next two contests. Stone was pleased with his pitchers' outings and sees light at the end of the tunnel.

"I'm pleased with the starters," Stone said. "[Rory] Macdonald and [David] Sullivan pitched well enough to win this weekend. [David] Lloyd was pitching well enough to win [on Friday]. Decato

UM drops two games

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team dropped a pair of games this past week, giving the team its second and third consecutive losses. The Minutewomen (2-6) closed out a four-game road trip by suffering a 10-8 loss to Hofstra on Wednesday afternoon, followed by a 17-8 defeat to New Hampshire (3-4) on Saturday at Garber Field.

UMass will be back in action when it takes on Vermont at 4 p.m. on Wednesday at Garber Field.

The Minutewomen finished their first lengthy road-trip of the season with a 1-3 record, grabbing their lone win against Albany just over two weeks ago. The loss was UMass' second in a row, and its fifth of the year.

Junior Samantha Sepulveda scored a career-high four goals against Hofstra, but her effort was not enough to put away the Pride. Hofstra out-scored UMass 6-2 in the second half to battle back and give the Pride a 10-8 win.

Hofstra's Heather Albro scored her first of three goals 1:26 into the game to give the Pride an early 1-0 lead. UMass came right back just over four minutes later to score three unanswered goals, giving the Minutewomen a 3-1 advantage halfway through the first period of play.

Sepulveda scored two of her four goals in this run, and would later add her third of the half when she scored on a free position shot with just 11 seconds remaining, giving the Minutewomen a 6-4 lead going into the second half.

Hofstra came out of the gates strong after the intermission and scored four unanswered goals to take an 8-6 lead almost halfway through the period. Hofstra's Kimberly Hillier scored three of those goals in what was a most impressive game on her part. Hillier finished the game with five goals, and none more important than her goal with 1:55 remaining, putting the icing on the cake and giving the Pride a 10-8 victory over the Minutewomen.

UMass returned home for the first time in three weeks on Saturday, and its Spring Break homecoming did not go as planned, dropping its third straight in a 17-8 loss to New Hampshire.

The Wildcats out-shot the Minutewomen 45-22, and got five goals from Alexa Webster and four from Katie Leland to grab the win at Garber Field. The first half was evenly played, statistically, but New Hampshire was able to dominate in the second half and put the game out of reach.

The Wildcats jumped out to a 3-0 lead early on, but the Minutewomen were able to keep their composure and get right back in the game with two goals of their own. Sophomore Kathleen Typadis made it a 3-2 game when she scored her 18th goal of the season with 21:41 remaining in the first half. The goal was her 54th in 25 games, as Typadis leads UMass in scoring with 19 points on the year.

New Hampshire ended the first half on a 6-2 run, and went into the intermission with a commanding 10-5 lead. UMass came out with the first goal of the second half, but the Wildcats answered with four straight goals of their own, giving them a 14-6 lead. The Minutewomen only scored three goals in the second half, and as a result, suffered their sixth loss of the season.

Senior Kerri Connerty finished the game with two goals and an assist to lead UMass in the game. Connerty is now tied for ninth all-time in career points with 115, and is currently eighth all-time in career assists with 39 in 58 games.

UMass surging early in season

While most of the student body was away celebrating Spring Break and agonizing over NCAA tournament brackets, the Massachusetts softball team (11-1, 2-0 Atlantic 10) was surging through the early Spring, building its own NCAA tourney resume.

Last week the Minutewomen completed their early season tournament schedule with a quarterfinal loss to Florida Atlantic. Later in the week they began Atlantic 10 conference play by not allowing a single run in a sweep of George Washington in a doubleheader.

UMass will be back in action on Wednesday in its home opener against Dartmouth.

The Minutewomen began Spring Break as many UMass students did, in Florida, where the Maroon and White took part in the FAU Parent's Weekend Tournament.

UMass started strong by upsetting No. 24 North Carolina in the first game of pool play.

Freshman pitcher Brandice Balschmiter was once again on fire, throwing a three-hit shutout and striking out a career high 13 batters while walking none. Freshman Whitney Mollica provided most of the offense in the game with a two-run homer in the third inning.

Later that day, the Minutewomen returned to the field to face Florida Atlantic, losing to the host school in a mostly offensive battle, 10-7.

UMass was behind 10-3 before a four-run seventh inning rally was cut short, when Mollica's two-out shot to the warning track in left field with two runners on was caught by FAU freshman Christine Houghtaling.

The Maroon and White recovered the next day with a 2-1 victory over Michigan State, but would end up splitting the second day as well, losing to Chattanooga 4-3 in eight innings to wrap up pool competition.

UMass advanced into the first championship round of the tournament with a 2-2 record in pool play, but lost for the second time in three days to host Florida Atlantic 4-3, despite out-hitting the Owls 9-4.

The Minutewomen took the 2-0 lead in the third when Whitney Mollica rounded the bases with a triple to left field, knocking in senior Kristi Stefanoni, and scored herself on an errant relay throw from left.

The Owls tied the game in the fifth inning, and then took a 4-2 lead in the top of the seventh on a two-run two-out triple.

In the bottom of the inning, junior Amanda Acampora had an RBI single to bring the Maroon and White within a run, but it would be the last the Minutewomen could come up with, and they were eliminated from the tournament.

The sting of the loss would be short-lived however, as UMass kicked

Cinderella dances to Final Four

By Joseph White

WASHINGTON – George Mason is no longer the cute little underdog. The Patriots, by golly, are going to the Final Four.

The suburban commuter school from Fairfax, Va., beat top-seeded Connecticut 86-84 in overtime Sunday in the Washington Regional final, ending the stranglehold that big-time programs have enjoyed for 27 years in college basketball's biggest showcase.

They lacked m size, athleticism and history relative to their opponent, but the 11th-seeded Patriots made up for it with tenacity.

Buoyed by a partisan crowd and playing some 20 miles from their campus, George Mason rallied after trailing by 12 late in the first half and nine early in the second. They hit six straight 3-pointers in the second half, shot 5-for-6 in overtime and outrebounded UConn 37-34 even though the Huskies have three starters taller than any of the Patriots' frontcourt players.

The Patriots became the second double-digit seed to make the Final Four, matching LSU's run, also as an 11th seed, in 1986. The Colonial Athletic Association team is the first true outsider to crash the Final Four since Penn and Indiana State both got there in 1979. The Patriots celebrated after the final horn by standing on the press row table and saluting their fans.

All five Mason starters finished in double figures. Jai Lewis had 20, and Lamar Butler and Will Thomas each scored 19. Jim Larranaga's team kept the same five players in the game from the 10:37 mark of regulation to the very end of overtime.

George Mason (27-7), having by far the best season in school history, had never won an NCAA tournament game until it beat half of last year's Final Four – Michigan State and No. 3 seed North Carolina – back-to-back in the first two rounds. Now it can say it has beaten the last two national champions – Connecticut and North Carolina.

Rudy Gay scored 20, and Jeff Adrien had a career-high 17 points for Connecticut (30-4), which never could put together a complete game in the tournament. The Huskies had to rally from double-digit second-half deficits to beat Albany and Washington and barely held off Kentucky.

Folarin Campbell's tough baseline fadeaway gave the Patriots an 84-80 lead in overtime, and UConn sud-

O'Connell knew end was near

By Jimmy Golen

BOSTON – On the day he was hired as the coach of the Boston Bruins, Robbie Ftorek said he knew that every day brought him one step closer to getting fired.

"He's the guy who's going to get rid of me eventually," Ftorek said, casting a glance over the general manager Mike O'Connell. "You're going to get released. It's part of the job."

Two years later, Ftorek was gone. And O'Connell, who cut Ftorek loose with nine games left in the 2003 regular season, got the same treatment on Saturday when team president Harry Sinden fired him with 11 games left in the year.

"When you think something has to be done, and you believe it has to be done and the consensus is that it has to be done, you have to do it," Sinden said. "And Mike, in the some of the things he did when he was here, believed in the same principle."

Under O'Connell, the Bruins went through four coaches in six years. he even took the bench himself after firing Ftorek. This year took on an even more desperate tone as the Bruins traded stars Joe Thornton and Sergei Samsonov in a push for the playoffs, only to fall short.

"It happens in the league," Samsonov said in Vancouver after his Edmonton Oilers beat the Canucks 3-2 on Saturday night. "He made those calls, he was the GM at the time and that's the business we play in. It seems like if you don't perform, trades happen and sometimes it goes even higher."

One of the NHL's Original Six, the Bruins have not won the Stanley Cup since Bobby Orr led the team to titles in 1970 and '72. Boston has reached the finals five times since then during a record-setting string of 31 consecutive playoff appearances.

But the franchise had an equally consistent run of letting its stars leave, from Orr to Ray Bourque to Thornton, whom O'Connell traded in November as a last-ditch effort to turn around the last-place club. Samsonov was sent to the Oilers this month.

Al-Qaida conspirator takes the stand

Moussaoui testifies that he was to fly a fifth plane into White House on 9/11

By Matthew Barakat
Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui testified Monday that he and would-be shoe bomber Richard Reid were supposed to hijack a fifth airplane on Sept. 11, 2001, and fly it into the White House.

Moussaoui's testimony on his own behalf stunned the courtroom. His account was in stark contrast to his previous statements in which he said the White House attack was to come later if the United States refused to release a radical Egyptian sheik imprisoned on earlier terrorist convictions.

On Dec. 22, 2001, Reid was subdued by passengers when he attempted to detonate a bomb in his shoe aboard American Airlines Flight 63 from Paris to Miami. There were 197 people on board. The plane was diverted to Boston, where it landed safely.

Moussaoui told the court he knew the World Trade Center attack was coming and that he lied to investigators when arrested in August 2001 because he wanted it to happen.

"You lied because you wanted to conceal that you were a member of al-Qaida?" prosecutor Rob Spencer asked.

"That's correct," Moussaoui said.

Spencer: "You lied so the plan could go forward?"

Moussaoui: "That's correct."

The exchange was key to the government's case that the attacks might have been averted if Moussaoui had been more cooperative following his arrest.

Moussaoui told the court he knew the attacks were coming some time after August 2001 and bought a radio so he could hear them unfold.

Specifically, he said he knew the World Trade Center was going to be attacked, but asserted he was not part of that plot and didn't know the details.

Nineteen men pulled off the Sept. 11 attacks on New York in Washington in the worst act of terrorism ever on U.S. soil.

"I had knowledge that the Twin Towers would be hit," Moussaoui said. "I didn't know the details of this."

Asked by his lawyer why he signed his guilty plea in April as "the 20th hijacker," Moussaoui replied. "Because everybody used to refer to me as the 20th hijacker and it was a bit of fun."

Before Moussaoui took the stand, his lawyers made a last attempt to stop him from testifying, but failed. Defense attorney Gerald Zerkin argued that his client would not be a competent witness because he has contempt for the court, only recognizes Islamic law and therefore "the affirmation he undertakes would be meaningless."

Moussaoui at first denied he was to have been a fifth hijack pilot Sept. 11 but under cross examination spoke of the plan that would have him attack the White House. He said Reid was the only person he knew for sure would have been on that mission, but others were discussed.

Shiite leaders denounce United States for raid

By Mariam Fam
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — New violence flared Monday in northern Iraq with 40 dead in a suicide bombing, while Shiite leaders cut off political talks and denounced the United States over a weekend raid that they said killed worshippers in a mosque.

Although the United States said no mosque was attacked, Shiites blamed the military for killing 22 people Sunday. Jawad al-Maliki, a lawmaker from the United Iraqi Alliance, said the Shiite bloc had canceled Monday's session of negotiations to form a new government because of the raid.

"We suspended today's meetings to discuss the formation of the government because of what happened at the al-Moustafa mosque," al-Maliki said, adding that the alliance was expected to decide Tuesday when to resume the talks.

President Jalal Talabani said he called U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and they decided to form an Iraqi-U.S. committee to investigate the attack.

"I will personally supervise, and we will learn who was responsible. Those who are behind this attack must be brought to the justice and punished," Talabani said.

Monday's bomber struck an army recruiting center, which is in front of a joint U.S.-Iraqi military base between Mosul, Iraq's third-largest city, and the ancient city of Tal Afar.

The attack shortly after noon killed 40 people and wounded 30 others — civilians and military personnel — who had gathered among a crowd of recruits for the Iraqi army, the Defense Ministry said.

The U.S. military said no American troops were hurt in the bombing and reported only 30 dead.

Iraqi army Lt. Akram Eid told The Associated Press that many of the injured were taken to the Sykes U.S. Army base on the outskirts of Tal Afar, about 40 miles west of Mosul, Iraq's third-largest city.

U.S. troops helped secure the area after the attack and treat the wounded, the U.S. military said.

In continuing sectarian violence, at least 21 more bodies were found — many with nooses around their necks — and mortar and bomb attacks killed 11 people in Baghdad and other towns.

Details of a joint U.S.-Iraqi Special Operations attack in northeast Baghdad late Sunday continued to filter out, with Iraqi officials angrily disputing a U.S. account of what happened.

Iraqi Interior Minister Bayan Jabr said the Mustafa mosque was attacked with worshippers killed, while a U.S. statement said the operation focused on "a compound of several buildings and that "no mosques were entered or damaged during this operation."

The military said the joint operation "killed 16 insurgents and wounded three others during a house-to-house search on an objective with multiple structures."

"They also detained 18 other individuals, discovered a significant weapons cache and secured the release of an Iraqi being held hostage," the statement said.

Jabr angrily denounced the operation and rejected the U.S. account.

"Entering the Mustafa Shiite mosque and killing worshippers was unjustified and a horrible violation from my point of view," Jabr said on the Al-Arabiya TV news network.

Rumsfeld: U.S. must counter extreme ideology

CARLISLE, Pa. (AP) — The United States is faring poorly in its effort to counter ideological support for terrorism, in part because the government does not communicate effectively, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Monday.

Rumsfeld made the remark in response to a question from a member of his audience at the Army War College, where he delivered a speech on the challenges facing the country in fighting a global war on terrorism.

"If I were grading I would say we probably deserve a 'D' or a 'D-plus' as a country as to how well we're doing in the battle of ideas that's taking place in the world today," he told his questioner. "I'm not going to suggest that it's easy, but we have not found the formula as a country" for countering the extremists' message.

Rumsfeld's audience consisted of more than 300 war college students and faculty members.

In his prepared remarks Rumsfeld said the al-Qaida terrorist network and affiliated Islamic extremists represent one of the most brutal enemies the United States has ever seen.

Rumsfeld cited several examples of vicious terrorist assaults, including the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, and warned that unless the terrorists are stopped they will continue to seek the means to launch even deadlier attacks on the West in the years ahead.

"The enemy we face may be the most brutal in our history," Rumsfeld said. "They currently lack only the means - not the desire - to kill, murder millions of innocent people with weapons vastly more powerful than boarding passes and box cutters," he added, referring to the terrorists who hijacked the airliners on Sept. 11.

It was Rumsfeld's first visit to the war college in his more than five years as secretary of defense.

Earlier in the day he stopped at Shanksville, Pa., to see for the first time the place where hijacked United Airlines Flight 93 crashed in a field on Sept. 11, killing all 40 passengers and crew shortly after hijacked planes crashed into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. The Sept. 11 Commission report said the hijackers crashed the plane as passengers tried to take control of the cockpit.

In his speech, Rumsfeld described the Shanksville site as a place where "a group of ordinary airline passengers gave their lives in extraordinary defiance of foreign hijackers and in defense of our country's capital."

Rumsfeld said progress is being made in the global war on terror, particularly in making it more difficult for the terrorist groups to recruit, train, raise money, establish sanctuaries and acquire weapons. But he stressed that more needs to be done.

"The strategy must do a great deal more to reduce the lure of the extremist ideology by standing with those moderate Muslims advocating peaceful change, freedom and tolerance," he said.

Rumsfeld noted that among the more than 300 war college students in his audience were an Afghan military officer and one from Iraq.

"We welcome you and are proud to stand with you in the cause of freedom," the defense secretary said.

UMass polling leader called into question

By Brooke Donald
Associated Press

BOSTON — For a decade, Louis DiNatale has been the leading pollster in Massachusetts. His surveys have gauged support for such divisive issues as same-sex marriage and measured the popularity of the men and women running for elective office.

And for the most part, the Lancaster resident and Democrat, who also doubles as head of the University of Massachusetts at Lowell's Center for Economic and Civic Opinion, has stayed out of the spotlight, though often quoted for his political insight.

But in recent weeks, DiNatale has made headlines not for his polls or analysis — but for a side job he took as a paid political consultant. One lawmaker said his dual roles have "cast a shadow" over the university's polling center, and called for an investigation.

School officials — who have halted gubernatorial polling for this election cycle and also called for a review of the center and DiNatale's work — are questioning the future of polling there altogether.

"I think it does raise some larger issues about how we

Students sue government over civil rights

By Chloe Gotsis
The Daily Free Press (Boston U.)

BOSTON — Citing civil rights infringements, a student organization is suing the United States Department of Education Secretary Margaret Spellings for denying financial aid to students who have been convicted of drug misdemeanors.

According to the Students for a Sensible Drug Policy v. Spellings lawsuit, the ACLU, which filed the suit on behalf of the SSDP, is accusing Spellings of violating students' rights under the due process clause by "singling out, for denial of financial aid, the category of individuals with a controlled substance conviction."

According to the lawsuit, the provision also violates the double jeopardy clause of the Fifth Amendment, which prevents multiple punishments for the same offense. The ACLU states in the suit that Spellings and the DOE are unconstitutionally punishing students by revoking their financial aid because of a drug conviction they already received a punishment for in a court of law.

"We think it's counter-productive to block access to education students with drug convictions," said Tom Angell, campaigns director of the SSDP. "It's intended to stop drug abuse but it actually endorses drug abuse

Senate debates immigration legislation

By Suzanne Gamboa
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — As immigration rights activists rallied outside the Capitol, senators broke Monday from the House's get-tough approach by refusing to make criminals of people who help illegal immigrants.

The Senate Judiciary Committee adopted an amendment by Sen. Dick Durbin, D-Ill., that would protect church and charitable groups, as well as individuals, from criminal prosecution for providing food, shelter, medical care and counseling to undocumented immigrants.

"Charitable organizations, like individuals, should be able to provide humanitarian assistance to immigrants without fearing prosecution," Durbin said.

The committee also approved more than doubling the current force of 11,300 Border Patrol agents in an effort to stem the tide of new undocumented workers arriving daily. It voted to add 2,000 agents next year and 2,400 more annually through 2011.

In December the House voted to make offers of non-emergency aid a felony. Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, proposed Monday requiring humanitarian groups providing aid to illegal immigrants to register with the Department of Homeland Security but withdrew the idea in the face of opposition from the Senate panel.

The immigration bills have sparked protests around the country, and with the committee's action on Monday, demonstrators at the front of the Capitol claimed to have already had an impact. Among the more than 1,000 demonstrators were at least 200 clergy members, dozens of them wearing handcuffs to protest the House's action.

Protests held as senators discuss immigration laws

"This is not about legislation any more," said Jorge Medina, an immigrant from Honduras now living in Charlotte, N.C. "This is about feelings now. We are Americans, too. We are not from Mars and we are not from the moon."

President Bush used a naturalization ceremony Monday for swearing in 30 new citizens from 20 countries to warn critics of his proposal to let some illegal immigrants remain in the United State against stoking anti-immigrant feelings.

"The immigration debate should be conducted in a civil and dignified way," the president said as lawmakers began tackling the hot-button election issue of what to do with the nation's estimated 11 million illegal immigrants.

More than 500,000 people rallied in Los Angeles on Saturday, demanding that Congress abandon the House-passed measures that would make being an undocumented immigrant a felony and would erect a 700-mile fence along the 2,000-mile U.S.-Mexico border.

Similar but smaller protests were held in Dallas, Phoenix, Milwaukee and Columbus, Ohio, over the weekend. On Monday, thousands of demonstrators, many waving U.S. and Mexican flags, marched through Detroit. And hundreds of students walked out of high schools Monday in Dallas and Huntington Park, Calif.

The committee faces a midnight deadline for completing a bill with a version of the "guest worker" program that Bush wants for illegal immigrants. The House rejected that program and Majority Leader Bill Frist has said the Senate will start debating a bill Tuesday without it if the committee fails.

Overhauling the nation's immigration laws "is not going to be easy," Bush said at the naturalization ceremony at Constitution Hall two blocks from the White House.

"No one should play on people's fears or try to pit neighbors against each other," Bush said. "No one should pretend that immigrants are threats to America's identity because immigrants have shaped America's identity.

Chairman Arlen Specter (R-Penn.) and Sen. Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.) and other members of the Senate Judiciary Committee consider immigration legislation during a mark-up hearing yesterday.

"No one should claim that immigrants are a burden on our economy because the work and enterprise of immigrants helps sustain our economy," the president said. "We should not give in to pessimism. If we work together I am confident we can meet our duty to fix our immigration system and deliver a bill that protects our people, upholds our laws and makes our people proud."

Since the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, calls for tougher border security have dominated debate over the knotty problem of controlling immigration.

But a tough immigration-enforcement bill passed by the House last year has galvanized forces that want worker programs for illegal immigrants already in the country.

"We will not accept enforcement-only approaches," said Cecilia Munoz, vice president of the National Council of La Raza, a Hispanic advocacy group.

Senators up for re-election this year are being forced by the debate to juggle the demand from voters for tighter borders to keep out terrorists and businesses who look to the tide of immigrants to help fill jobs.

Facebook beginning to deactivate fake profiles

By Lee Hurwitz
Indiana Daily Student (Indiana U.)

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — As Facebook is becoming ever more popular, users can no longer enjoy the humor of being poked by a panda or a monkey. With more college (and now high school) students creating profiles on Facebook, other students have opted to take the more creative route of making fake profiles.

However, Facebook has answered back and has decided to deactivate all fake profiles until the users change back to their actual identities.

Indiana University sophomore Jon Palak created a fake profile under the name 'a panda,' but Facebook recently deactivated it.

"(Facebook) sent me an e-mail saying that I have to change my name, which I was able to change to Jon 'a Panda' Palak," Palak said. "But then I deactivated that because it didn't have the same ring as 'a panda.'"

Palak said he created his panda profile because of his addiction to Facebook that arose after he created a profile with his actual name.

"For me, I was badly addicted to it and I was checking it every day," he said. "So, to get rid of my addiction, I decided, 'What the heck, if I was a panda, I would stop checking it.'"

The opposite effect worked, as Palak's fake profile encouraged other Facebook users to message him and view his profile, he said.

However, it is against Facebook's policy to create fake profiles because it is against its goal.

"The intent of Facebook is to enable the communication of real information between real users," said a Facebook customer-service representative.

While the Web site is cracking down on profiles, Facebook is also trying to get rid of inappropriate groups as well.

"After we lost to Indiana State in basketball, I started a Facebook group with a few curse words in it," said freshman Noah Skube. "After a month, they notified me and told me that they were taking that down."

Skube has also created a fake profile, naming his after ABC/ESPN analyst Lee Corso. However, his profile has not yet been deactivated.

"My friend at [North Carolina] State started a Trey Anastasio profile and through that, I figured out how you got the second e-mail address," Skube said. "Later, I was talking with my cousin about what I should make. We both love Lee Corso, so I decided to do it. It was one of those spur-of-the-moment things."

But not all Facebook users have had the same luck as Skube. John Thayer, a friend of Palak's, also created a profile that was deactivated.

Users have been able to create fake profiles in a few ways. Skube created a new profile on Facebook by using an e-mail address ending in iub.edu, instead of indiana.edu. However, Palak and Thayer both requested name changes, which were granted at the time.

As Facebook has started to deactivate fake profiles, the users of those profiles have also questioned the site's methods for doing so.

"I guess you could see where they're coming from because it is in their policy, but it's kind of silly to think about it," Thayer said. "There's no harm in it and it brings a lot of attention."

Thayer said he believes users are looking at their profiles because they are fun. However, he also said it makes sense to delete offensive profiles, but not to delete fun profiles.

"Facebook should deactivate profiles for some things, like a J.J. Redick or Brodie Croyle profile, where they are college students because those could be misleading," Skube said. "But not someone who's obviously not, like Lee Corso, Lindsay Lohan or a panda."

Palak shared the same views.

"As long as you understand that you can't make a profile that's kind of slanderous to someone, it should be around," Palak said. "If it's all positive and fun, why not keep it?"

by kicking students out of school. Murderers and rapists are eligible to receive financial aid while a student caught with one marijuana cigarette is automatically denied."

If the court rules in favor of the SSDP, Angell said students who were previously denied financial aid because of drug convictions would be able to reapply.

The provision in the HEA has been criticized by approximately 200 prestigious health and education organizations such as the American Public Health Association, the American Federation of Teachers, the American Bar Association and the Association for Addiction Professionals, the ACLU said in a press release.

The lawsuit also states that the provision unfairly targets racial minority groups such as African Americans, who account for 62 percent of those drug convictions.

According to Boston University spokesman Colin Riley, BU has not had any students lose their financial aid because of drug convictions.

"The university's policy is to comply with the federal law," Riley said.

Angell estimated the lawsuit would not be heard in court for at least three months.

The ACLU filed the class-action suit on March 22 on behalf of the SSDP, a student organization working towards creating an alternative solution to the U.S. drug abuse problems. The SSDP is asking the Supreme Court to repeal a provision of the Higher Education Act that denied aid to students on the basis drug convictions, according to a March 22 ACLU press release.

The law currently denies federal aid to 35,000 students a year nationwide because of drug convictions, according to a March 22 article in The New York Times.

The HEA was created more than forty years ago in an effort to distribute higher education aid to students on a need-basis. In 2000, the HEA instituted a mandate for federal judges to automatically deny federal aid to students with drug convictions.

Before the 2000 provision, judges had the option to deny federal aid based on drug convictions, but they chose not to in 99.8 percent of the cases, according to the ACLU press release.

The SSDP filed the lawsuit to represent 200,000 students who have lost their aid due to drug convictions since 1998, the Times reported.

Woman reports possible phone scammers

Friday, March 24

Police investigated a vandalism report at 530 West St. at 9:17 p.m. after four young people walking along the street reportedly took a resident's mailbox and threw it into the street. No one was found and there are no suspects at this time.

Police responded to 22 University Dr. at 5:54 p.m. after a woman reported that someone had apparently attempted to break into her brown 1992 Toyota Camry. The driver-side door handle was pried open and had a damaged lock. Police have no suspects at this time.

Police investigated reports of a stolen vehicle after receiving a report at 1:00 p.m. The reporting party claimed that the car was stolen from the Big Y parking lot while she was in the store. The missing car was later recovered in Springfield.

Kathryn Rachel Rodriguez, 22, of 5231 Homestead Blvd. Westborough, was arrested at 11:11 p.m. and charged with operating under the influence as well as failing to stop/yield.

Saturday, March 25

Five youths were arrested at 4:00 p.m. after they were caught with marijuana on Amherst Public School property. A teacher from the school reported the five males, all reported to be between the ages of 15 and 16, after they were allegedly spotted smoking.

An Amherst woman received a phone call from a person claiming to work for Bank of America, looking for information regarding her account. She reported that she had tried to *57 the number, but it was unavailable. She believes the caller now has her social security number. It is believed the same person has tried scamming others in recent months.

Sunday, March 26

Police were called to Pomeroy Commons of 495 West St. at 1:47 p.m. after a woman noticed a full-size black 357 revolver style BB gun in her apartment that was not there when she had left. It is unknown who the gun's owner, but police are investigating.

Shiites protest U.S. raid on alleged mosque

"Innocent people inside the mosque offering prayer at sunset were killed."

Police said gunmen fired on the joint U.S.-Iraqi patrol from a position in the neighborhood but not from the mosque. Police and representatives of radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who holds great sway among poor Shiites in eastern Baghdad, said all those killed were in the complex for evening prayers and none was a gunmen.

AP reporters who visited the scene Monday morning said the site of the attack was a neighborhood Shiite mosque complex.

TV video shot Monday showed crumbling walls and disarray in a compound used as a gathering place for prayer. It was filled with religious posters and strung with banners denouncing the attack.

Other video from Sunday night showed dead male bodies with gunshot wounds on the floor of what was said by the cameraman to be the imam's living quarters, attached to mosque itself. The compound, once used by Saddam Hussein's government, consists of a political party office, the mosque and quarters for the imam.

The video showed 5.56 mm shell casings scattered on the floor. U.S. forces use that caliber ammunition. A grieving man in white Arab robes stepped among the bodies strewn across the blood-smeared floor.

Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a U.S. military spokesman, said the operation was only launched after observation of the site convinced the military it was being used as a kidnapping cell.

"In our observation of the place and the activities that were going on, it's difficult for us to consider this a place of prayer," Johnson said. "It was not identified by us as a mosque, though we certainly recognized it as a community gathering center. I think this is frankly a matter of perception."

Hundreds of people turned out for the funerals of those killed in the raid. The mourners, many carrying Iraqi flags, walked alongside coffin-laden trucks.

Baghdad Gov. Hussein Tahan said the local government had cut ties to the U.S. military and diplomatic mission "because of the cowardly attack on the al-Moustata mosque."

In the capital, a bomb exploded in a bus headed for the Sadr City slum, killing two passengers and wounding four others, police Col. Hassan Jaloob said. The bomb had been left in a bag, he said.

A rocket that hit the headquarters of the Shiite Fadhila party in southeast Baghdad killed seven people and wounded 13, including children, police Capt. Ali Mahdi said.

The latest violence came a day after 69 people were reported killed in one of the bloodiest 24-hour periods in weeks. Most of the dead appeared to be victims of the shadowy Sunni-Shiite score-settling that has torn at the fabric of Iraq since Feb. 22 when a Shiite shrine was blown apart in Samarra, north of Baghdad.

Thirty victims of the continuing sectarian slaughter — most of them beheaded — were found dumped on a village road north of Baghdad.

Iraqis in the Shiite neighborhood where the recent deaths occured carried flags yesterday at a mock funeral parade for the victims.

UMass polling issues raise suspicions want to conduct this going forward," said Robert Connolly, a spokesman for UMass President Jack Wilson, who wouldn't elaborate on whether this marked the end of polling at the university.

Experts say DiNatale's case illustrates the balancing act of pollsters, who work hard to eliminate any perception of bias, but can't help but have formed relationships with some of the people they routinely survey and opinions on issues they've researched many years.

"But in the polling business there is an incentive to do good polling," said Columbia University political science professor Robert Shapiro. "If polls look really blatantly different, the risks of never getting another polling gig or being exposed as slanted are high."

Shapiro, who isn't directly familiar with DiNatale's case, said people who oversee public-opinion polls should disclose private activities that may affect their polling results. He said what a person does in their private life shouldn't necessarily have an effect on their research, but transparency is essential.

DiNatale did not return phone calls seeking comment for this story. He has told the Boston Globe there was nothing improper about his outside work and no evidence he altered poll results. The school, as well, doesn't believe the polls were compromised.

But Shapiro and other pollsters said that may not matter.

"Just the perception can end up causing problems," said Shapiro, who has written articles in political journals on what he says were efforts by President Nixon's administration to influence Gallup and Harris polls that concerned his administration.

"I mean, look at the port security situation," he added. "Whether it was wrong to let the Dubai firm handle security didn't really matter. The president still took a punch."

DiNatale started at the university on its Boston campus in 1984, doing polling, research and teaching at the McCormack Institute. He also worked part-time in the president's office. In July 2004, he moved to the Lowell, where, in addition to his polling and teaching duties, he became director of public affairs. His current salary is $154,500 annually.

The University of Massachusetts Poll has been conducting quarterly surveys of Massachusetts registered voters since 1996. The surveys have focused on issues such as politics, the selection of a new pope, the Big Dig and health care.

Sponsored research helps finance the collection of political data. Survey clients have included organizations including the Massachusetts Public Health Association, the Metropolitan Area Planning Council and the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

DiNatale designs the questions and analyzes the results. Telephone interviewers conduct the polling of a random sample of respondents. A typical poll will survey 300 to 500 people, and the margin of error will be plus or minus 5 percentage points, according to the poll's Web site.

As part of the review, a school auditor will go through thousands of documents and conduct interviews to determine if any taxpayer money was used improperly to finance DiNatale's outside work. Connolly said...That outside work included advising three gubernatorial candidates and arranging for a top aide to produce a private poll for one of them.

This week, House Chairman of the Joint Committee on Higher Education Kevin Murphy plans to meet with the state auditor to see whether a formal investigation is necessary.

"We want to see what's going on and make sure all of the income and expenses are in compliance with state law," said Murphy, of Lowell. "This has certainly cast a shadow over the university."

The state Ethics Commission may also be considering the issue. Murphy sent a letter requesting an inquiry, but citing policy, commission spokeswoman Carol Carson wouldn't confirm if a review was taking place.

Connolly said while the school audit is about what's happened, "it's also fair to say there is a larger rethink of polling at Massachusetts."

Cliff Zukin, president of the American Association for Public Opinion Research, said it's rare that pollsters working for a university would moonlight as a consultant.

"Usually there is no crossing of the line," he said. "Anything that even gives the appearance of a conflict of interest gives universities a black eye."

He said pollsters are constantly researching and updating the best practices for the industry to reduce any bias. He said interviewers are trained to ask questions fairly and even the order a candidate appears on a poll can shape its outcome.

More than 10 years ago, the head of the Ohio Poll at the University of Cincinnati, Alfred Tuchfarber, was criticized for contributions he made to the Republican candidate for governor while at the same time doing polling on the race.

The immediate fallout saw newspaper sponsors dropping their support of the poll and Tuchfarber having to remove his name from the poll. University of Cincinnati spokesman Carey Hoffman said Tuchfarber ended up distancing himself from the poll he had founded more than 15 years before, then DiNatale didn't donate to any candidates, according to campaign finance records.

Potential candidates develop early rivalry

Senator John McCain of Arizona.

Governor Mitt Romney of Massachusetts

BOSTON — Republican Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts raised cash for his campaign committee on Monday in what is shaping up as enemy territory — the home state of potential 2008 presidential rival John McCain of Arizona.

Romney held a fundraiser in Phoenix, a foray that Romney's staff says highlights his ability to compete in Southwestern and Mountain states. They are home not only to McCain and a coveted bloc of Republican-leaning voters, but also many of Romney's fellow Mormons.

It is McCain whom Romney singled out when the governor announced in December he would not seek a second term this year. Unlike the senator, who once joked he thought about being president "every day in the shower," Romney said his interest was more like the movie "Star Wars:" "It's in a galaxy far, far away."

In repeated interviews, Romney has questioned the effectiveness of the 2002 McCain-Feingold campaign finance law, arguing it has had "unintended consequences" and "driven money into secret corners."

Romney's staff regularly quips about McCain's age and questions the senator's ability to win over the influential and monied supporters of President Bush after their own rivalry developed during the 2000 presidential race.

By 2009, McCain would be 72, three years older than Ronald Reagan was in 1981 when he became the oldest first-term president.

McCain's staff, speaking privately like Romney's to avoid incurring the boss' wrath, labels Romney a johnny-come-lately to conservative Republican and national security causes. They also question whether a dashing candidate dubbed "Mattress Mitt" has the mettle to endure a rough-n-tumrating battle.

McCain himself is far more generous.

"I think he's a very good man; I think he's extremely attractive," the senator said in a recent interview in Washington. "I had some dealings with him when he was in charge of the Olympics, cleaning up the Olympics, where he did a great job."

As for Romney's criticism of his campaign finance bill, McCain said in the interview: "It's no longer possible for a trial lawyer or a union leader or a corporate head to be called by a senator who's a powerful committee chairman and say, 'I want a check for six figures and by the way, your legislation is up before my committee.'"

While the general election is still more than 2 1/2 years away, the fact that there will be neither a sitting president nor vice president running for the White House in 2008 has touched off early and intense competition in both parties.

Public opinion polls have placed McCain atop the GOP pack. But Romney has not avoid the sniping.

During a recent visit to the Olympics in Italy, former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani — who is also considering a 2008 bid — said the security in Turin "is even an improvement" over the tight security at the Salt Lake City games in 2002.

Left unsaid was that Romney had run those Olympics in Utah.

"Romney's comments have not gone unnoticed, and his visit to Phoenix to raise some money has raised some eyebrows," said Scott Reed, a Republican political consultant who was campaign manager for Bob Dole's 1996 presidential campaign.

"I'm not sure it's a smart long-term strategy," Reed added. "One thing I've learned about this business is that candidates remember ... especially early on in campaigns when people are just getting started."

A Romney spokeswoman insisted that any talk of a McCain-Romney rivalry was both premature and off target.

"Governor Romney has a great deal of respect for Senator McCain and considers him a true American hero," said Julie Teer, political director of his Commonwealth PAC. "The purpose of the governor's trip to Arizona is to raise money for the Commonwealth PAC to help Republican candidates up and down the ticket there in 2006."

Trial continues for al-Qaida conspirator

The 19 terrorists on Sept. 11 hijacked and crashed four airliners, killing nearly 3,000 people in the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and on the planes. The intended target of the plane that crashed into a Pennsylvania field remains unknown.

Moussaoui said he talked with an al-Qaida official in 1999 about why a 1993 bombing at the World Trade Center failed to bring the towers down. He said "was asked in the same period for the first time if I want to be a suicide pilot and I declined."

Just before Moussaoui took the stand, the court heard testimony that two months before the attacks that a CIA deputy chief waited in vain for permission to tell the FBI about a "very high interest" al-Qaida operative who became one of the hijackers.

The official, a senior figure in the CIA's Osama bin Laden unit, said he sought authorization on July 13, 2001, to send information to the FBI but got no response for 10 days, then asked again.

As it turned out, the information on Khalid al-Mihdhar did not reach the FBI until late August. At the time, CIA officers needed permission from a special unit before passing certain intelligence on to the FBI.

The official was identified only as John. His written testimony was read into the record.

"John's" testimony was part of the defense's case that federal authorities missed multiple opportunities to catch hijackers and perhaps thwart the 9/11 plot.

His testimony included an e-mail sent by FBI supervisor Michael Maltbie discussing Moussaoui but playing down his terrorist connections. Maltbie's e-mail said "there's no indication that (Moussaoui had plans for any nefarious activity."

He sent that e-mail to the CIA even after receiving a lengthy memo from the FBI agent who arrested Moussaoui and suspected him of being a terrorist with plans to hijack aircraft.

Prosecutors argue that Moussaoui, a French citizen, thwarted a prime opportunity to track down the 9/11 hijackers and possibly unravel the plot when he was arrested in August 2001 on immigration violations and lied to the FBI about his al-Qaida membership and plans to hijack a plane.

Had Moussaoui confessed, the FBI could have pursued leads that would have led them to most of the hijackers, government witnesses have testified.

To win the death penalty, prosecutors must first prove that Moussaoui's actions — specifically, his lies — were directly responsible for at least one death on Sept. 11.

If they fail, Moussaoui would get life in prison.

Hopkinton car crash kills teen driver, brother

HOPKINTON (AP) — A 17-year-old driver and her ten-year-old brother are dead after a single car accident in Hopkinton.

The teen-age driver has been identified by her Hopkinton High School principal as Andrea Goncalves, a junior at the school. She was driving a 2001 Saab that skidded off the road yesterday and hit a tree.

Her brother, Joshua — a fourth grader at the Hopkins School — died at the scene. The girl was later pronounced dead at the UMass Memorial Medical Center in Worcester.

A preliminary investigation shows that speed may have been a factor. The crash is under investigation.

Principal Dee Gould says she met with the teachers Monday morning before classes, and counselors would be available for the students — individually and in groups — throughout the day.

The accident came at a time when some lawmakers are talking about raising the minimum driving age in the state to 17-and-a-half. From the current 16-and-a-half. The talk is in response to several recent accidents involving teenagers, including a crash on Route 128 in Wakefield just over a week ago that killed two 16-year-old high school students.

Two fishermen rescued after boat runs aground

EASTHAM (AP) — Two fishermen and a dog managed to swim to safety Monday after their vessel ran aground off a beach in Eastham.

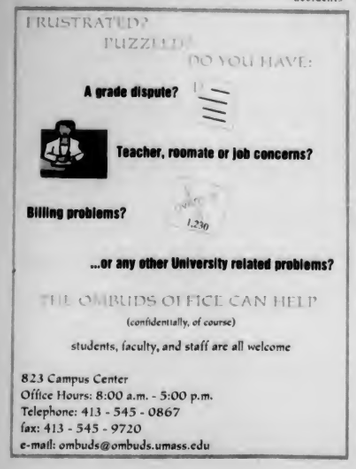
One fisherman, Michael Darragh, was taken to Cape Cod Hospital for treatment of severe hypothermia. A second fisherman, Ian Orchard, was found huddled in an unused Coast Guard station several hours after a call for help, said Coast Guard spokeswoman Kelly Turner.

Darragh and Orchard, both of Orland, Maine, were aboard the Stonington, Maine-based fishing vessel Josephine Someone aboard called at 4:15 a.m. to report it was taking on water off Nauset Light Beach along the Cape Cod National Seashore.

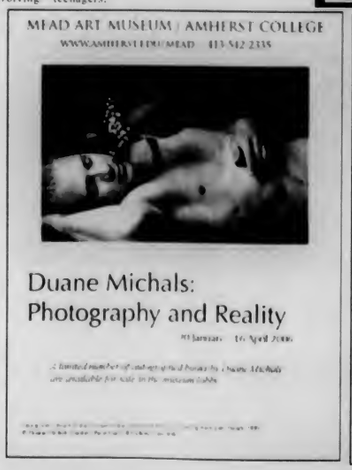
When he was rescued, Darragh told officials he thought his crewmate had also managed to swim ashore, prompting a land search while the Coast Guard searched the water by helicopter and vessel. Orchard was found by fire officials around 8 a.m. on Coast Guard beach.

The Josephine broke up and was being removed by the National Seashore Park Service.

Springfield's non-union workers get two percent pay raise



SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Non-union employees of this cash-strapped city are getting their first raise in four years.



The 216 clerks, administrators and department heads making between $500 and $2,000 a week are getting a 2 percent boost that will be retroactive to last July. The total cash value is just over $160,000.

Phil Puccia, the executive director of the state-appointed control board overseeing the city's finances, called the raise a "cost of living increase" that falls far short of the offers so far rejected by Springfield's three largest unions representing teachers, firefighters and police officers.

Those unions have been offered either 11 percent raises or 75 percent of the four years of back pay.

Selectively blind American journalism

Jackie Hai

Earlier this month, over 100,000 Mexican-Americans took to the streets of downtown Chicago to march in protest against the stiffening of immigration laws. The peaceful rally stretched over 20 city blocks and brought traffic to a complete standstill.

Did you hear about it? Don't feel too bad if you didn't, because this march – estimated by some to be the largest in the history of Chicago – barely made a blip on the radars of mass media networks. While a sleeping giant had begun to stir, mainstream America continued tuning in to news about the latest Washington scandal or hype over the Oscars.

The Chicago protest, the result of months of grassroots collaboration and planning, would spark similar movements in cities across the country over the weeks to come. 5,000 in San Jose, 25,000 in Phoenix. More than half a million in Los Angeles last Saturday – that one was finally too much to ignore and got some extensive airtime over the weekend.

Was it total silence up to this point? Well, no. Newspapers and independent news media picked up on the story from the beginning. Columnists and bloggers debated the rights and wrongs of illegal immigration and possibilities for reform, but the point is that only people living in close proximity to the event or those who are proactive about seeking out their news would have learned anything about it. It's a sign of our overall dependency on television and mass media, like it or not – when the networks choose to turn a blind eye, millions are left in the dark without even knowing it.

Nor was the Chicago protest the only instance in which important events have been suppressed by the television network giants. Last May, the infamous Downing Street memo that implicated Tony Blair's prior knowledge of faulty intelligence over WMDs in Iraq was first reported in The London Times. Independent media here was all over it, but the mainstream remained silent until the buzz around the story became too loud to ignore.

Last November, the non-partisan Government Accountability Office released a report concluding that electronic voting machines are insecure, frequently use uncertified and inadequately inspected software, and caused loss and miscount of votes in the last election. A joint congressional news release was made at the same time. The response? Crickets chirping on all the mass media wire services. BradBlog.com was one of the first to break the story, and it quickly circulated through alternative news sources online.

It's a sign of our overall dependency on television and mass media, like it or not – when the networks choose to turn a blind eye, millions are left in the dark without even knowing it.

The free flow of information is essential to democracy. Yet instead of vital knowledge, we are fed a steady stream of sensationalism, spin and sound bytes by the corporate networks. Fox News has garnered the reputation of being a bastion for conservative misinformation. And the average American, short on time and energy, can flip on CNN any time of the day and fill up on 30-second segments about nuclear weapons in Iran, the avian flu, celebrity hijinks, car crashes, the dangers of video games and other ultimately useless tidbits of information.

Despite all of that, it's not all fluff, and the occasional worthwhile story does come through. So I'm not saying don't ever watch the news, but to watch it with a more critical eye. Separate the filler from the substance. Now, thanks to the Internet, following up on an interesting story takes a minimal amount of effort – just a few clicks on search sites like news.google.com will bring up thousands of sources to better see the whole picture with.

The Internet also makes readily available a large number of independent media collectives, AlterNet.org being one of the foremost today in bringing together the cream of the digital crop. Truthdig.com is another site that aims to "drill beneath the headlines," while sites like Technorati.com and Blogrunner.com open the front door to the blogosphere that has taken off in recent years.

Independent sources have their pitfalls, too, which you'll run into from time to time, such as lack of funding and resources, unprofessional reporting and incomplete research. The critical reader must stay alert and read between the lines, regardless of where news is coming from. Essentially, the best way to stay informed is to cast the net as widely as possible, and then develop habits to decide for yourself what's the real and important stuff.

Mainstream media might be selectively blind, but it doesn't mean we have to close our own eyes and play along.

Not something to gawk about

Caroline Moss

For the last few months, we have all reveled in the glory that is Angelina's unborn child, how Jen's coping and how Vince Vaughn is strangely comfortable with the fact that he's a complete rebound. We sympathize with Katie Holmes' need for drugs during labor as opposed to Maverick's genius plan of having a Scientology silent birth in which Mama Cruise will have to keep her mouth shut while she pops out a child.

We wonder if 32-year-old Nick Lachey realizes that dating 19-year-old Kristin Cavalleri from "Laguna Beach" is like your 13-year-old cousin leaving his bar mitzvah early to whisk away an infant from the nursery at a local hospital.

Yet seven whole days between publications can almost be too long of a time to see if Nicole Richie weighs less than the average six year old, or if Britney has finally figured out that her husband is a huge tool.

Well, folks, wait no longer. Thanks to Gawker.com/Stalker, we all now have the opportunity to find out what the stars are up to 24/7 ... literally. Celeb-spotting fans can log onto the Website at any hour of any day and tell the world that they saw (insert name) doing (something dirty) with (an Olsen twin).

Yeah, of course, we all just love to hear about which drugs Lindsay Lohan decided to get addicted to this weekend, but in my opinion, there are just some aspects of the lifestyles of the rich and the famous that can go unsaid.

NBC stated on a recent news broadcast of the information behind GawkerStalker that this kind of blatant exposure can lead to dangerous encounters with stalkers, rapists and the occasional teeny bopper. Yeah, of course, we all just love to hear about which drugs Lindsay Lohan decided to get addicted to this weekend, but in my opinion, there are just some aspects of the lifestyles of the rich and the famous that can go unsaid.

Not because I care about their privacy, let's be serious, but because I would almost rather write 20-page papers for no good reason than bore myself with the stuff that often gets posted on this Website.

For example: Mar 14, 2006 at 9 p.m.: "hey, i just saw lecy goranson (the original becky from roseanne!) leaving her apartment in red hook. she actually looked damn good! big trendy black glasses with a blue long sleeve shirt and citizens. pretty hot." I hope the four people out there who can actually admit to ever watching "Rosanne" and knowing who this person is can find solace in the fact that she's a huge babe now.

Matthew Broderick, March 14 at 12:00 a.m.: "Inside Viceroy saw a disheveled Matthew Broderick (his hair looked like he just pulled a winter hat off - I guess this means he was drunk), standing in the doorway like he wanted to leave." So which is it Ferris? Can't keep that cap nana knit for you off your head, or too much time hanging around the ice-luge? Naturally the latter.

March 24 at 5 p.m.: "Erika Christianson waiting for a cab with an unknown male counterpart. She creepily hiked up her skirt in a vain attempt to flag down a passing taxi. Not the best move considering her giant ankles and calves." A slight blow to her ego, I'm sure.

March 22 at 8 p.m.: "At Wicked ... Christina Applegate sat behind us. She seemed to enjoy the performance, though I heard more laughing from her new young-a boyfriend. He was cute, but a child. They held hands." Holding hands during a Broadway show? God, Christina, you're so easy.

Is this really necessary? Does anyone care that last week Mike Myers was standing somewhere in a green shirt? Paris Hilton was spotted videotaping her sexual extravaganzas again, big deal. What else is new? So what happens if the sketchy dude in his NYC apartment logs on exactly one second after it turns out Winona Ryder is buying (or maybe stealing) a bottle of water 18 blocks away? Does he chase her down? Does he bother? Would you?

So while it may be socially acceptable to read US Weekly and InStyle once every seven days, its just downright creepy to check GawkerStalker as if it was Facebook, let alone post some worthless and random celebrity sighting on the site yourself. We should just leave Kirstie Alley and her questionable relationship with Jenny Craig, as well as all of the anorexic Michelle Tanners of the world, alone, for their own sake, and more importantly, for ours.

Campus and national issues not separate

Mike Sances

Like you, I listened attentively to WMUA's broadcast of the SGA election debates two weeks ago. Aside from the fact that everything that was said that night was read off of a piece of paper, I was particularly struck by a question presented to the hopefuls for trustee, concerning the presumed opposition between so-called campus issues and national issues.

Can we separate the two? A representative of the press wanted to know. Braving the threat of litigation, I quote presidential candidate Rob Shepherd, who earlier that evening faulted the incumbents for attempting "to bring national and state politics into it. It's a student government, and they should understand that. It should be, 'What will help students?'"

Shepherd appeared to be echoing sentiments expressed back at an SGA meeting in December. As reported in the Collegian by Matt Belliveau on December 8, "Debate roared ... concerning the approved recommendation to assist in mobilizing broad public support for the Free Higher Education campaign."

As one senator protested: "SGA senators are voted in by students to deal with campus issues, and there are campus issues that we have to deal with first." So ...eliminating students' bills is not a campus issue? Free college doesn't help students?

Obviously, no one would object to a free education; it was rather a question of where the money would come from. For the Free Higher Ed camp, it comes from repealing President Bush's tax cuts, and, it is strongly implied, stopping the war in Iraq. Suddenly, student government had become political.

Well, with the election results in, and hopefully not thrown out by the time this piece goes to press, we can finally put a rest to the notion that the voters on this campus are interested only in breakfast sandwiches and potholes. Mishy Leibbum, the student trustee-elect, is an avowed supporter of Free Higher Ed, and on the night of the debate, made her position explicitly clear. As reported in the Collegian by Katie Huston on March 14, "Leiblum disagreed [with Shepherd]. 'I don't think it's necessary to create a dichotomy between the small issues and the big issues on campus...you can't simply look to the little issues without looking to the big issues.'"

It is about time someone pointed that out. Now there are some, myself included, who might see the Free Higher Ed campaign as idealistic—and it probably is. If you really want to talk about idealism, however, look to this false choice between the SGA and the war. It is the height of idealism to thrust one's head in the sand and pretend that the crisis in higher education funding – or those potholes, for that matter – can be isolated from the billions spent on the war. Separating campus and national issues is not only unnecessary. It is also fantasy.

Well, with the election results in, and hopefully not thrown out by the time this goes to press, we can finally put a rest to the notion that the voters on this campus are interested only in breakfast sandwiches and potholes.

Another case in point: since the beginning of the semester, there has been a white and red banner hanging outside the south face of the Student Union. The banner is part of a wider campaign that has included a rally, full-page ads printed daily in the student newspaper and buttons. Since the politically incorrect ball is already rolling at this point, allow me to state the obvious: we can not possibly hope to free Jill Carroll until we free Iraq, from the American occupation and from the terrorism and now sectarian killings that were unknown to that country until the invasion three years ago.

I mean this in both a moral and a practical sense. Morally, because unfortunately Jill Carroll is not alone, and not only because she is one of many journalists to be kidnapped in Iraq. More importantly, it is because she is only one of tens of thousands of noncombatants afflicted by this terrible war, whether through kidnapping, revenge killing, a lost loved one – take your pick.

Take, for example, this Washington Post report from Iraq from July 20, 2005: "About 10 a.m. last Wednesday, a suicide bomber drove his brown Suzuki sedan and its load of explosives into the crowd of American soldiers and Iraqi children clustered around the Humvees, residents said. Twenty-six of al-Khalij's children died. The bomb killed boys old enough to play out in al-Khalij's streets and young enough to still want to. One U.S. soldier was killed and at least three others were wounded, the military said." The soldiers had been handing out candy.

Were the deaths of these children any less tragic than Jill Carroll's current ordeal? Was the death of the American soldier? What about, for that matter, the deaths of the Iraqi soldiers killed in the opening weeks of the war? In the case of the July incident, the press answered loud and clear: judging by the amount of ink, the lives lost in the London subway bombings of July 7 were worth a lot more than the lives of the 26 dead Iraqi children.

But there is also a practical element at play here. Until the U.S. military leaves Iraq, the insurgency will continue to flourish, enjoying the tacit support that flows from resentment toward the occupation. If we don't leave soon, there will be many more Jill Carroll's. There may very well be more courageous UMass alumni caught up in the chaos that we have allowed to bloom in Iraq. You can call it giving into the terrorists if you want; the real question ought to be whether it is the right policy to pursue.

Jill Carroll is being held hostage in Iraq, a country held hostage by the United States. But the war is holding our education, and our futures, hostage as well. The sooner we face up to these unavoidable relationships, the better, and it is less a matter of how the SGA addresses these issues than what the students are going to do to bring the war home.

Science is a higher power

David B. Lawrence

Atheism or, as it is often practiced, Scientism, requires every bit as much faith as do other organized religions and belief structures. Lacking knowledge about whether or not there is a God, one could admit to being agnostic (meaning you don't know). Saying that there is a God, of course, takes some faith. Logically speaking, saying that there is no God takes exactly the same degree of faith.

Existence came from somewhere. Whether it was created, came into being by accident or is in some kind of self-replicating cycle, something got the whole thing in motion.

Break it down logically. My belief in science tells me that all things in existence can be explained by science, be it why I make the decisions I make or how a stew of chemicals became life. I give science total ability to give an answer, X, to any question, Y. However that X will still be subject to questioning.

Eventually, on some level, some kind of faith will have to kick in; to answer the X. Science can't explain it all. Whether you have faith in a particular God or faith that there is no God, since you have no way of knowing, both of those are faith.

Science explains existence. It does not explain the origins of existence. Think about it: maybe science proved the Greek Gods wrong by explaining what caused lightning: transfer of electrons. Maybe today it can explain electrons and the other particles (charged or not) in the standard model in terms of their constituent particles: quarks, leptons, gluons and perhaps someday strings.

But eventually, when science has figured the tiniest thing that matter is made of, it still won't know what caused that, what made it, what made it the smallest. Likewise, knowing the mass and light output of a star or planet, and knowing how gravity and other forces pull them together, doesn't tell us why gravity does that. It takes our knowledge up a level, but the question of why is still there. With all our volumes of data on them, and equations describing them, looking up at the stars should be no less wondrous today than it was for our ancestors.

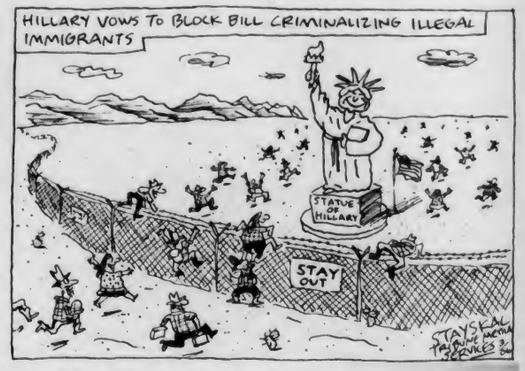
The problem with believers in scientism and many atheists is that they have a faith of their own, in science, but don't admit to it. It's not just a faith in science's ability to explain speciation (like Darwin did) or the beginnings of the universe (like Stephen Hawking and other cosmologists try to do). They have a faith in science's ability to explain where all of existence came from.

But it doesn't, science explains relationships: it can't explain where the whole thing came from. Atheists would disagree with me: oh yes it can, they say, and if I ask how, they would tell me "I don't know, but there are theories...or could be some day."

I'm a Catholic, so that means I think most of you are way off about the world. Don't worry though, if you really believe in your religion and live a good life, you'll get into my heaven anyway.

Talk about blind faith.

Again, I'm not arguing that there is a God. To do that, you need some kind of faith, and most of those faiths are not mutually compatible. I'm a Catholic, so that means I think most of you are way off about the world. Don't worry though, if you really believe in your religion and live a good life, you'll get into my heaven anyway. That's one of the things that make Catholicism so compatible with free speech and liberal democracies.



If you don't have any faith in one explanation of the origin of things or another, you ought to be agnostic, but certainly not Atheist. Agnostic means you think there might be a God, or not—you don't know. But in order to be Atheist, you have to have some competing explanation for existence that refutes all others. If science and reason can't do that, how else can you? Only with faith: If you still think science can, as I said earlier, you haven't escaped faith at all.

Just ask famous scientist and anti–intelligent design advocate Kenneth Miller. His 1999 book, "Finding Darwin's God" has two parts: the first attacks religious zealots who would deny Darwin, the second attacks scientific zealots whose scientism would deny religion.

The problem with the false belief that science can explain not just all things, but where existence came from, is that it takes away from the credibility of many of those who attack religion. The crazies you see supporting Intelligent Design, or creationism, they have no trouble defending themselves, because in many cases their opponent's arguments are grounded in faith, in scientism.

In order to combat religion, if you think it's up to no good, you need to understand its legitimacy. Religion requires faith, and it is a way for people to understand the existence of the world. Science is not, nor does it require faith, but if you're under the impression that science can eventually explain the existence of the world, than you have faith in scientism, it is your religion. Please don't criticize mine.

"Stay Alive," directed by William Brent Bell, is about a videogame that kills people. The film begins with a point-of-view shot. We're inside the game and it's creepy. The character whose eyes we're looking through runs for his life while cries of horror dominate the soundtrack until he's eventually hanged. The player of the game is Loomis Crowley, a game tester, and the game is called "Stay Alive." He goes upstairs and says to his two friends, "I found you guys in the game. You got it good." Why his friends are in the game is beyond me, but the three of them are the first to die in reality by the hands of the demons who rule the evil videogame.

The main character of the film is Hutch (Jon Foster, "The Door in the Floor"), who works at an office with Miller Banks (Adam Goldberg, "A Beautiful Mind"). Hutch is helping Miller to get through a game called "Silent Hill 4." They exchange some entertaining and genuine gaming dialogue.

At Loomis's funeral, Hutch meets up with Abigail (Samaire Armstrong). She gives him some of Loomis's things, including "Stay Alive." There's a romance towards the end of the film between Hutch and Abigail which is so poorly set up it feels like it was an afterthought.

Unless Abigail professing to "go to Princeton in the fall," and then later reneging and admitting she lives in a van constitutes romantic sparks. I mention it because I think screenwriters William Brent Bell and Matthew Peterman thought this was grounds for a randomly placed kiss.

Hutch and a few of his friends, including Swinkie (Frankie Muniz, "Agent Cody Banks"), the "know-it-all," Phineas (Jimmi Simpson, "Herbie Fully Loaded"), the cocky humorist and October (Sophia Bush, "One Tree Hill"), the goth chick, sit down to play "Stay Alive." Miller joins them from his home. There's a poem on the screen the players must read. They read it and lines disappear from the screen. "Voice activated?" Swinky announces. "No way. That's next-generation technology." But this is another logic gap because there's no evidence of a machine with a device to pick up speaking. Reading the poem while the game responds should indicate to these characters that the game is supernatural. But it doesn't. It takes a few more deaths before the characters other than Hutch suspect the game of anything.

The game takes place at the Garouge Plantation, and it's based on the real life story of Countess Elizabeth Bathory. "Uncover the horrible truth about the Garouge Plantation and stop the evil, but in order to do this you must stay alive." When the narrator of the game says it, it sounds a whole lot cooler. October explains later, after some research on Elizabeth Bathory, that "they walled the bitch up in the tower alive. And here's the kicker. The last thing she said was that she'd be back." This is like a variation on the plotting of "The Ring."

More people start dying, the police suspect Hutch of the killings and the game starts playing on its own. To save their own lives, Hutch and Abigail have to confront the Countess Elizabeth Bathory at the Garouge Plantation, while Swinky plays "Stay Alive" and directs them through the home. Days after seeing the film, which could do with a lot more creepy scenes, I am struck by how little sense this film actually makes. Is Swinky controlling the characters here or what?

If you don't want to think to hard, however, you may find yourself willing to go with most of the story. The glaring flaw is that there's a lot of flip-flopping opinions on whether or not a game can kill people and this grows taxing. There should be a natural progression from disbelief to belief. It all adds up to a film that seems like it mimics the most cliched storytelling devices as though it's a math formula instead of a movie – there's no ingenuity.

Sonic Youth's self-titled reissue shows early talents and faults

BY NICK ROMANOW
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Following the successful deluxe edition reissues of Sonic Youth's "Goo" and "Dirty" albums their first two releases for Geffen Records, probably their most accessible and arguably two of their best – the alternative rock pioneers have taken a decidedly unpredictable path in selecting their next release to be reissued.

Sonic Youth
SONICYOUTH
5/10
"Sonic Youth"
Geffen Records

Of course, if Sonic Youth has taught the rock world anything it is to expect the unexpected. The choice to re-release their self-titled debut EP, originally released in 1982, was probably the last thing that Geffen Records expected or wanted from the Sonic Youth camp but, nonetheless, it has received the same type of care and packaging that went into the two more commercially viable deluxe editions that preceded.

The EP is, to begin with, something of a fans-only album. Hinting at the claustrophobic chaos of the band's 1983 full-length debut "Confusion Is Sex," the "Sonic Youth" EP rides the no-wave scene and the band's art-punk predecessors as far as they can. Aside from Lee Ranaldo's electric-drill part in "The Burning Spear" and the jammy progression and finale of "The Good and The Bad," nothing on "Sonic Youth" really reveals the band's talents, or creativity, in songwriting or experimentation with noise and sound. Where "Confusion Is Sex" revels in its dark, twisted wreckage, "Sonic Youth" simply bears the markings of a young, inexperienced band.

However, that band is the same one that, in just a few short years, would grow into an underground phenom; one of the best American rock bands that would forever challenge and change the landscape. That is exactly what the value of the "Sonic Youth" EP is to fans and interested parties. While some moments hint at what's to come – and even at its lowest points Sonic Youth never sounds like a stale retread of anything else – "Sonic Youth" serves its purpose better as a historical document than as a great record. The five songs that compose the original release explore different facets of what Sonic Youth was doing in 1982; however, it is almost certain that the band was outgrowing the material by the time they were recording it.

The bonus materials help to continue to flesh out the young band and prove to be a more intriguing listen then the EP itself. The bulk of the extra songs are from an early Sonic Youth, predating the EP's recording. The seven-song set features songs that would make it onto the recording, primitive versions of songs that would end up on the set and a few unreleased tracks. Proving that Sonic Youth has always been a great live band, these songs find the source material far more alive and electrified then the rather stiff recording. The version of "She Is Not Alone" accurately depicts the direction that the band was headed, finding both guitars creating a violent soundscape while Thurston Moore's amateur singing talents practically beg for mercy. The disc closes off with a studio version of the unreleased track "Where The Red Fern Grows."

The reissued "Sonic Youth" EP isn't going to win over too many, if any, new fans. However, it is a worthy addition to any Sonic Youth diehard's collection. Even a curious, slightly experienced Sonic Youth listener will surely be astounded at the inauspicious beginnings of a band that millions now know and love.

Thurston Moore and Kim Gordon of Sonic Youth play at recent shows. The band has released its first EP as part of a series of special edition reissues of its earlier records.

Manilow, 'High School Musical' – geeks redefine pop-music cool

BY JIM FARBER
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

When it comes to scoring a pop hit these days, dorks rule.

How else to explain Barry Manilow recently hitting No. 1 on the Billboard Top 200 Album chart with his reactionary "Greatest Songs of the '50s" CD? Or Disney's fantastically antiseptic "High School Musical" topping Billboard's album list not once but twice, with the second time being last week?

Consider, too, the seemingly unstoppable success of "American Idol's" parade of well-scrubbed grinners (from Clay Aiken to now-ousted '06 finalist Kevin Covais). Plus that rash of pre-rock-era-style hit CDs packed with either standards or that hybrid gruel of pop and opera ladled out by the likes of Michael Buble, Josh Groban and Andrea Bocelli.

If that's not enough, the first new music in 15 years from that seminal '70s schmaltz band Chicago just hit stores. And Manilow coached the "American Idols" on songs of the '50s last week, forming a kind of double generational dork-a-thon.

Together, this conga line of conservative artists has created what could be the most unhip surge on the pop charts since before the rise of rock 'n' roll. What can account for this?

"With the Republicans controlling both houses of Congress, this is the Eisenhower-era revisited," says Rolling Stone senior editor David Fricke. "It's ostrich time, where people are looking for comfort rather than challenge in their art. It's a lot easier to listen to Barry Manilow murder what are actually good songs from the '50s than to consider what (left-leaning songwriter) Steve Earle has to say."

Author Karen Schoemer has written a new memoir, "Great Pretenders," which traces her own journey from rock-critic hipster to Pat Boone apologist. She sees a direct connection between Connie Francis crooning featherweight hits like "Who's Sorry Now?" in the '50s and what Manilow is doing now. "(They're) both completely irony free," notes Schoemer.

To author and pop-culture critic David Browne, today's political conservatism plays out in greater social conformity. "It began with the start of the Iraq war," he explains, "with the president saying things like, 'You're with us or you're against us.' Those who are a little quirky, strange or out of step are considered freakier than ever. And that filters down from the government to the singers on 'American Idol.'"

If nothing else, "American Idol" offers an uncommonly clear picture of the current tastes and desires of people outside the media elite. After all, it's voted on entirely by viewers. This has created, what Browne calls, "a return of the silent majority" (Richard Nixon's term for the unheard, conservative masses).

This surge in the squeaky clean may also come in flinching reaction to the flagrant sexiness that pervades the rest of pop culture. In that way, Manilow functions as a kind of anti-Beyonce — as do the fresh-faced singers of "High School Musical" and "American Idol."

"With Britney Spears, the tabloids and breasts everywhere, where do you go?" asks Schoemer. "To bring back the nonsex of the '50s is almost a weird breath of fresh air."

The uptick in earnest geek chic may also provide a respite from the snarkiness otherwise rampant in the culture. In that light, buying a Manilow or Groban CD can be seen as a kind of defiant act. It even functions as a response to the more violent or sexed-up expressions of cutting-edge forms like hip hop.

The trend also reflects a simple market reality: namely, the recent dramatic increase in tweens downloading music. That accounted for much of the early success of "High School Musical."

Fricke even sees a reactionary sensibility invading the once-revolutionary world of punk rock, via its castrated cohort known as "emo."

"Originally, punk rock was outwardly aggressive," he explains. "Emo is all about 'Why can't I get a date for prom night?' That's as '50s as the Platters."

Of course, the latest conservative wave is hardly the first. Back in the '70s, the "soft rock" movement rose in reaction to psychedelic hard rock and glam. It fostered velveeta acts like America and Loggins & Messina. The '90s, for their part, saw a "correction" to grunge's nihilism in the form of a 10 million-CD-selling, smiley-faced band, Hootie and the Blowfish.

"It goes in 10-year cycles," explains Sean Ross, who analyzes radio trends for Edison Research. "One of the things that's happening now is that radio is in transition. So everything is up for grabs. Also, you have a very slow market out there — labels aren't putting out so many records. And, because they're looking at the costs of promoting records, they're putting out fewer left-field ones."

But before we consign innovation and edge to the dusthin of history, we'd do well to remember that the more extreme a reactionary movement becomes, the more likely it is to seed its own reaction.

"Back in November of 1962, who in their right mind would have predicted that the Beatles would blow up in this country 18 months later?" asks Fricke. "Nirvana also caught everyone with their pants down. I have eternal faith in the quality of art to blow people away — just when they least expect it."

For Chef, a brutal payback

BY TERRY LAWSON
DETROIT FREE PRESS

The notion that said you don't pick a fight with someone who buys ink by the barrel is pretty much on its last legs.

In fact, picking a fight with what is now dismissed as MSM — mainstream media — has become a favored sport of talk-show shouters like Bill O'Reilly (who threatened to get into the personal lives of New York Times nabobs like Frank Rich) and the National Army of Bloggers, who lick their chops at the prospect of taking out wounded targets like Dan Rather.

Now, with the tables turned — or at least rid of their polite place settings — the folks you need to avoid offending are the Frankenstein monsters of the airwaves. You know who they are. These are the people who were given more or less free reign by the old MSM — when it realized they could capture TV and radio audiences for relatively little capital outlay. Think Howard Stern and all his potty-obsessed progeny. Or the crowd at Comedy Central, which seems to go relatively unbothered by their corporate patrons, Viacom.

While I don't like to boast about my relationship with the kids of "South Park," I've become a fairly regular viewer. One of the things I like best is that the lack of concern for production values means that creator-writers Trey Parker and Matt Stone can whip out an episode with jokes relevant to recent events. So I half expected the premiere episode of the 10th season that aired Wednesday to feature a gun-toting VP or a bald Natalie Portman blowing up something.

Instead, I witnessed the cruel and inhumane execution of long-running character Chef, voiced by soul legend Isaac Hayes. A couple of weeks ago, Hayes announced he was leaving the series to protest the airing of an episode that lampooned — OK, seriously mocked and mauled — Scientology and its most famous adherent, Tom Cruise. Parker and Stone retaliated with an episode that cobbled together old dialogue to put in the mouth of Chef, ridiculed Scientology again and then dealt him a death blow. That'll teach you.

Was it funny? Yeah, in the same mean-spirited way many of the show's comic attacks have always been, laying to waste people and ideas the pair find ridiculous or distasteful or hypocritical. (Hayes never raised his gruff baritone when the show went off on born-agains or Catholics.) But it was also an unapologetic payback for daring to bite the hand that feeds.

Not long ago, a news magazine wrote of "South Park Republicans," voters and activists who support the Cheney-Rumsfeld agenda while rejecting the party's evangelical-driven stands on moral and social issues. If it takes stem-cell research to revive Kenny one more time, go for it.

Like its network neighbor Jon Stewart, "South Park" has a political POV without towing all of any party's line, and that's commendable. And to be fair, Stan and Cartman did try to save Chef, now revealed as a child molester from the "fruity little club" they believe brainwashed him. But death is a chilling price to pay for literally not going along with the program. So here's the lesson, dissenters: Don't pick fights with people who control the moves of crappy cardboard cutouts.

The graphic novel: evolution of an expanding literary genre

By Randy Myers
Knight Ridder Newspapers

Once viewed as junk that could rot impressionable brains, comics are now considered hip, hot and smart.

Even critics at the buttoned-up New York Times are singing the praises of high-profile, long-format books, called graphic novels, such as Art Spiegelman's disturbing take on 9/11, "In the Shadow of No Towers," or Charles Burns' chilling AIDS parable, "Black Hole."

West Point has made it mandatory for the graduating class of 2006 to read one of these works. If recruits can be required to study Marjane Satrapi's "Persepolis" — a poignant, well-reviewed work that depicts family life during the Iranian Revolution — then there's something surely afoot.

Perhaps most significantly, Hollywood has propelled graphic novels to the front ranks of pop culture, adapting many into movies, including the just-released "V for Vendetta" along with critical darlings "Sin City" and "A History of Violence."

"What we're seeing is some sort of tipping point that has been a long process in coming," says Publishers Weekly's Calvin Reid, editor for comic coverage.

"Really, for the first time, many people are seeing graphic novels in bookstores, and more people are seeing that there is more variety than superhero comics. Not that there's anything wrong with superhero comics. There's a lot of creativity in them, too."

If you still assume today's "funnies" focus on the antics of surly ducks or muscled guys and gals clad in Lycra, you need but browse through comic emporiums such as Berkeley's Comic Relief or Concord's Flying Colors.

Sure, exploits of the usual suspects — Superman, Spider-Man, Batman — line the shelves, but now they're sharing prime real estate with ambitious fare that tackles complex topics ranging from genocide to a son's painful feelings during his mother's terminal cancer.

Even chain stores such as Barnes & Noble realize there's gold to be mined here, and have expanded comics sections.

The numbers say it all. In 2001, graphic novels rang up $75 million in American sales. By 2005, sales in Canada and America amounted to $250 million, according to ICv2, a pop-culture-monitoring Web site.

And while recent moves by the New York Times and Entertainment Weekly to review graphic novels have increased their profile, perhaps more important is the movie industry's love affair with the format. "Hollywood is obsessed with them," says Reid.

"V for Vendetta" marks the latest in a flood of "based-on-a-graphic-novel" movies. Produced and written by "Matrix" creators the Wachowski brothers, it's the first big-buzz movie this year.

Moviemakers have borrowed liberally from the action genre of graphic novels, but they've also adapted quirky character-centric dramas, such as those in Daniel Clowes' "Ghost World" or Harvey Pekar's "American Splendor" collection, which was turned into a movie starring Oscar nominee Paul Giamatti.

The Hollywood partnership hasn't always been foolproof, however, pumping out duds such as "The League of Extraordinary Gentlemen" and "From Hell," along with winners such as "A History of Violence" or "Sin City."

"V for Vendetta" arrived after a string of delays, having been yanked just after the London subway bombings. ("Vendetta" finds a mysterious masked man in a totalitarian future seeking to blow up Parliament.) Created by Alan Moore, who has attained a Stephen King-like reverence in the comic world, "Vendetta" demonstrates how the graphic novel can fearlessly tackle a weighty subject such as terrorism while managing to be both entertaining and prescient.

For Clowes, adapting his "Ghost World" for the screen was an eye-opening experience. He discovered the key to translating his work for the screen was to avoid being too literal. Not all fans were pleased with the results.

"At first, I was very beholden to my own work, and then I realized just who was I going to really offend," he says. "I want my movies to be movies and my comics to be comics."

More recently, Clowes wrote another screenplay, loosely based on his surrealistic "Eightball" comic series. "Art School Confidential," set to open in limited release April 28, fondly lampoons art school. It reteams him with "Ghost World" director Terry Zwigoff, who gave us the documentary "Crumb" and the raunchy "Bad Santa."

Not only have graphic novels become fertile ground for filmmakers, but they're also seen as a powerful marketing tool. That was evident at San Francisco's WonderCon comics convention in February, when actor Paul Walker and director Wayne Kramer promoted their violent guy flick "Running Scared." Besides an end credit that features graphic novel-like panels, "Scared" has no direct connection to the graphic novel form.

Additionally, studios drummed up interest in "Mission: Impossible III," "The Hills Have Eyes," the remake of "The Omen," the fright flick "Silent Hill" and "Superman Returns," among others, by showing clips and having some celebrities on hand.

Hugo Weaving as V in "V for Vendetta," the latest of a growing number of films based on graphic novels.

Within the prose world, numerous award-winning writers have expressed their admiration for the form, including Pulitzer Prize-winner Michael Chabon, whose "The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier & Clay" focuses on the early years of comics, and indie author Dave Eggers. Other highly regarded novelists such as Paul Auster ("Oracle Night") and Jonathan Lethem ("The Fortress of Solitude") have had works turned into graphic novels. Popular fiction authors have chimbed aboard as well, with thriller writer Brad Meltzer ("The Zero Game") and black romance writer Eric Jerome Dickey ("Genevieve") having released graphic novels.

But will all this heightened visibility amount to anything? Can it erase Americans' stereotypical notions that comics are suited only for boys or socially challenged men? Perhaps it could, especially when glancing at sophisticated future titles.

Upcoming topics range from one based on "The 9/11 Commission Report," another on the musings of a journalist covering the Iraq war called "War Fix" (set for a June release) and biographies on Malcolm X, Ronald Reagan, Frank Sinatra and J. Edgar Hoover.

The graphic novel has been on the cutting edge before, but failed to fan out into the mainstream. Some thought it would soar when the publishing world was swept up by the Holocaust-themed "Maus" by Spiegelman. The harrowing memoir won a Pulitzer Prize in 1992. But while critics heartily applauded it, hard-core prose fans viewed "Maus" as magnificent, but an anomaly in the comics realm.

Other luminaries, such as Will Eisner ("A Contract With God"), were producing innovative work, while college students and the disaffected discovered the underground work of R. Crumb. Reid, of Publishers Weekly, attempted to convince readers to try other offerings; few listened.

But times have changed, and the public seems ready to embrace an art form that offers deep story lines along with innovative visuals. The graphic novel is flexing its muscle in bookstores, on movie screens and at the ever-important cash register.

Fox rattles them 'Bones' for a second season, despite troubles

By Kate O'Hare
Zap2it.com

"We're pretty damn happy," says executive producer Hart Hanson, who had just learned that Fox has renewed his freshman crime drama "Bones" for a second season. "I had long ago given up the hope of getting an early pickup. I knew we were performing quite well, and we seemed to have a really solid audience that they couldn't shake."

"Bones" stars David Boreanaz ("Angel," "Buffy the Vampire Slayer") as FBI Agent Seeley Booth, who is unofficially partnered with forensic anthropologist Dr. Temperance Brennan (Emily Deschanel) and, by extension, with her scientific cohorts (TJ Thyne, Michaela Conlin, Eric Millegan, Jonathan Adams) at the fictional Jeffersonian Institute, whom he calls "squints."

After a rough launch on Tuesday at 8 p.m. ET against a not-dissimilar show, CBS' military crime procedural "NCIS" — which has garnered huge audience numbers in its third season — "Bones" moved around when "American Idol" premiered in January, eventually landing on Wednesday at 8 p.m. ET.

"We kept laughing that we could not catch a break, ever, on this show," Hanson says. "We were up against 'NCIS,' then 'Survivor' and 'Lost.' Good Lord. Barry Josephson, my partner, is a very, very optimistic man. I guess he turned out to be right. I was not nearly so sanguine.

"But our loyal audience just keeps tuning in. I guess Fox was heartened enough by that to pick it up. That's my guess."

Asked what he thinks he's done right, Hanson says, "Obviously the key to this show is the chemistry between David and Emily. We covered a lot of tones, and the audience stayed with us. We had lots of different ways of plotting our stories, and the audience stuck with us.

"The thing that was always the same, withstood the test of time, was David and Emily at the core, and then the squints around them."

While Boreanaz has consistently played Booth with good humor and gusto, Deschanel's Brennan started out the season as distant and a bit chilly, but Hanson says that's been changing.

"Emily has to learn," he says. "She's very intelligent, so she learns. She has to let some of her own charm come out — Brennan's charm and Emily's massive amounts of charm.

"Emily's an immensely charming, cheerful, happy, connected human being, then all of a sudden she turns into Brennan, and it's quite a change. Of all the actors, it's the biggest change from who she is."

Hanson, though, has no plans to alter Boreanaz's approach. "I'm starting to think, 'Oh, my God, he's James Garner.' That man loves to work, and the more he works, the better he gets, and he just gets it. He's a big star. Love him.

"As we go toward the end of the season, he's in a lot of scenes. He's working very hard. He's a bear for punishment, that guy, such a pro."

One advantage of an early pickup is that it comes before the season-finale episode has been shot, or even written.

"I'm writing it as we speak," Hanson says. "I took my hands off the keyboard. Let me just say that we'll be looking at a little bit of what happened to Brennan's parents. I don't want to tell you anything else, because now we get to do a cliffhanger."

For those who missed it, Brennan's parents vanished when she was 15, sending her into the foster-care system.

"I'll tell you that we'll find out at least half the story of what happened to Brennan's parents," Hanson says.

While he's not planning to send thank-you flowers to Fox programming chief Peter Ligouri, Hanson quips, "We're going to send him money and vehicles."

Author Stanislaw Lem dies at 84

By Ryan Lucas
Associated Press

WARSAW, Poland — Stanislaw Lem, a science fiction writer whose novel "Solaris" was made into a movie starring George Clooney, died Monday in his native Poland, his secretary said. He was 84.

Lem died in a Krakow hospital from heart failure "connected to his old age," Wojciech Zemek told The Associated Press. He gave no other details.

Lem was one of the most popular science fiction authors of recent decades to write in a language other than English, and his works were translated from Polish into more than 40 other languages. His books have sold 27 million copies.

"A great artist has died, a man with the hallmarks of a genius," renowned Polish film director Andrzej Wajda told the country's PAP news agency.

His best-known work, "Solaris," was adapted into films by director Andrei Tarkovsky in 1972 and by Steven Soderbergh in 2002. That version starred George Clooney and Natascha McElhone.

Set on a spaceship above a fictional planet, a psychologist meets the likeness of a long-dead lover as he and the crew grapple with suppressed memories of lost loves.

Lem's first important novel, "Hospital of the Transfiguration," was censored by communist authorities for eight years before its release in 1956 amid a thaw following the death of Soviet dictator Josef Stalin.

Other works include "The Invincible," "The Cyberiad," "His Master's Voice," "The Star Diaries," "The Futurological Congress" and "Tales of Prix the Pilot."

"He was an amazingly talented man, and Polish literature never had anyone like him before," said Tomasz Fialkowski, co-author of a book of interviews with Lem and the deputy editor of the weekly Tygodnik Powszechny.

While Lem was widely known as a writer of science fiction, his works were never simple tales of spaceships and light sabers.

Instead, he wrote about new scientific discoveries and the evolution of man and technology, Fialkowski said. Lem also foresaw many new technologies, including virtual reality, Fialkowski said.

While his novels often took place in space in the undetermined future, Lem "connected it all with his interest in what is going on in the here and now, with politics," Fialkowski said.

Lem was born into a Polish Jewish family on Sept. 21, 1921, in Lviv, then a Polish city but now part of Ukraine.

His father was a doctor and he initially appeared set to follow in that path, taking up medical studies in Lviv before World War II.

After surviving the Nazi occupation, in part thanks to forged documents that concealed his Jewish background, Lem continued his medical studies in Krakow. Soon afterward, however, he took up writing science fiction.

Lem addressed his multiple talents with a touch of modesty and humor.

"If I was a child prodigy, it could only have been in the eyes of doting aunts," Lem once said. "In my fourth year, I learned to write, but had nothing of great importance to communicate by that means."

Lem is survived by his wife and a son, Zemek said. Funeral arrangements were not disclosed.

Sinden, Sullivan on thin ice

for the Black and Gold (he was named GM in October of 1972). Coincidence? I think not.

Sure, O'Connell's trade of Joe Thornton to the Sharks for three average players, at best will go down as one of the worst deals ever made in the history of sports. But the now-former GM can't be the only guy to take the fall. After all, it was O'Connell who went out and acquired two highly coveted players in Gonchar and Nylander to try and get the team over the hump and win a Stanley Cup in 2004. While that goal was not reached, some blame could also be given to head coach Mike Sullivan.

Sullivan got the job in 2004 and led the team to a great regular season, but when he could not get past the first round of the playoffs with such a talented roster, one had to wonder if he was the right man for the job.

On the other hand, Sullivan has not been dealt the best hand this season. He had his best player taken away from him in a pathetic panic move by O'Connell, only making it that much tougher for him to win. And with this year's goaltender-by-committee, carrying this team into the playoffs without hitting the ice was anything but easy.

So now what?

You have a terrible off-season that ends up hurting the team, you trade away your two best players in Thornton and Sergei Samsonov for no truly great players in return, and you fall out of the playoff race. Not only should O'Connell take the fall, but Harry Sinden should realize that his time spent in Boston is long overdue.

You cannot sit there and tell me that the team's president did not give the OK to go ahead with their post-lockout strategy that failed mightily. There is also no way that Sinden would let O'Connell trade away the face of the organization without getting his permission first. It just wouldn't happen.

For that reason, and that reason only, I am putting the blame on both Harry Sinden and Mike O'Connell. I can't watch another highlight of Joe Thornton dishing the biscuit to Jonathan Cheechoo without remembering how good Glen Murray was with Jumbo Joe by his side. I can't read the box scores in the morning without noticing that the man we traded away is second in the NHL in points with 106, and has turned the San Jose Sharks from one of the worst team's in the league into a playoff contender.

I can remember the days when we thought coaching was always the problem. Little did we know, it was those making the moves that have cost a once proud organization to crumble right in front of our eyes.

It used to be a franchise of determination, grit and integrity. It used to be a team that was respected by all sports fans in the city of Boston and throughout the entire NHL. It used to have that swagger known as "Black, Gold and Glory."

It used to be called Bruins.

Redick, Morrison: All-American

By Jim O'Connell
Associated Press

J.J. Redick of Duke and Adam Morrison of Gonzaga spent all season locked in a bicoastal scoring race. Fittingly, they ended it as the only unanimous selections for The Associated Press' All-America men's basketball team.

Redick, the most prolific 3-point scorer in college history, was a repeat choice. He and Morrison were joined on the first team Monday by Redick's teammate Shelden Williams, Randy Foye of Villanova and Brandon Roy, Washington's first All-America in 53 years.

Redick and Morrison gave fans a "Can you top this?" scoring competition that ended with both receiving all 72 first-team votes from members of the national media panel that selects the weekly Top 25. The voting took place before the NCAA tournament.

Morrison, the only junior on an otherwise all-senior first team, won the scoring title with a 28.4 average, just ahead of Redick's 27.4. Morrison shot 43.7 percent from 3-point range, while Redick hit 42.1 percent from beyond the arc.

"It is a testament to the type of season each of us has had," Redick said. "Adam is certainly a great player and it is an honor to be unanimous pick along with him."

Morrison said being an All-American isn't "something you think about receiving when you start your collegiate career, but to be associated with some of the great names of college basketball is an honor. I guess to be a unanimous pick with J.J. seems only fitting since the two of us have been followed so closely this year. He's a great player."

Morrison is Gonzaga's second All-America, joining Dan Dickau in 2002.

This is the second time in three years there were two unanimous selections. In 2004, Jameer Nelson of Saint Joseph's and Emeka Okafor of Connecticut were unanimous.

Redick is the first repeat first-teamer since Jason Williams, another Duke guard, in 2001 and 2002.

Redick and Williams, a senior center who averaged 18.4 points and 10.3 rebounds while shooting .58 percent from the field, are the ninth set of teammates to be selected to the first team and the first since Jason Williams and Shane Battier of Duke in 2001.

"Both J.J. and Shelden are deserving of this honor. They have produced on the court at a high level all season, and throughout their entire careers at Duke," coach Mike Krzyzewski said. "They both understand that individual awards like this come about as a result of throwing themselves into what is important for our team. It is quite an accomplishment for teammates to be named first team All-America by The Associated Press."

Duke, the overall No. 1 seed in the NCAA tournament, was the only team besides Connecticut to be ranked No. 1 in the AP poll this season. The Blue Devils won both the regular season and tournament championships in the Atlantic Coast Conference.

Foye, who averaged 20.1 points, 5.6 rebounds and 3.2 assists as the key in Villanova's four-guard offense, was the third-leading vote-getter, named on 55 first-team ballots. He is the Wildcats' first All-American since Kerry Kittles in 1996.

"It's an honor to be selected as an AP All-American with such great players," Foye said. "It's an honor for my family, my school and our fans, and I'm very grateful to everyone involved, especially my teammates and coaches."

Roy is Washington's first All-America since Bob Houbregs in 1953.

"It's awesome that top players from the state of Washington with a year difference in age are considered top players in the country," Roy said. "That says a lot for the state and how we've come along as basketball players. When I was a kid, I dreamed about this."

Roy, a 6-foot-6 swingman, averaged 19.9 points, 5.7 rebounds and 4.1 assists while shooting 51 percent from the field and 81 percent from the free throw line.

Dee Brown of Illinois was the leading vote-getter on the second team and was joined by fellow senior Rodney Carney of Memphis, junior PJ. Tucker of Texas and sophomores Rudy Gay of Connecticut and Leon Powe of California.

The third team includes seniors Craig Smith of Boston College and Allan Ray of Villanova, junior Nick Fazekas of Nevada, sophomore Glen Davis of LSU and freshman Tyler Hansbrough of North Carolina.

The preseason All-American team this season was Redick, Morrison, Williams, Brown and Smith.

Gonzaga's Adam Morrison and Duke sharpshooter J.J. Redick were unanimous first-team All-America selections for the 2006 season.

Larranaga keeps things light

Knight doing this? Jim Calhoun? Rick Pitino? Even UMass' own Travis Ford? Heck, any coach?

Minutes before heading onto the MCI Center floor in Washington, D.C., for their Elite Eight matchup with the Connecticut Huskies, Larranaga reminded his men who they were: the CAA – Connecticut Assassin Association. Everyone had a good laugh, and with good reason. The Patriots had nothing to lose, while UConn had everything. Larranaga even upped his own ante by joking he was heading to Indianapolis anyway, but wasn't sure if his team was coming or not.

Larranaga will tell you it's all in the name of keeping things fun. After all, we play basketball because it's fun, not war, right?

Mason had fun alright, scoring the greatest upset in tournament history.

Like so many Cinderellas past, this one was bound to run out of gas when its weak bench caught up with it. GMU's way around the problem? They didn't make a substitution for the final ten minutes of regulation and the whole overtime.

The quintet – Skinn, Jai Lewis, Lamar Butler, Will Thomas and Folarin Campbell – in turn fed off each other terrifically, couldn't miss and played great defense down the stretch, save one UConn cut to the hoop with less than five seconds to go in regulation that forced overtime.

It's not as if the Huskies were sloppy. They turned the ball over just nine times on the afternoon and led by as much as 15. The Patriots just happened to play exactly how big underdogs need to but seldom do in games of this magnitude – perfect.

There are, of course, other stories that would have been nice. J.J. Redick could have finally gotten the big prize, Adam Morrison could have shown off some more of that 11th-hour mojo, and the Missouri Valley could have continued to crash the party.

The Big East and the ACC, the two most powerful conferences in basketball, are not sending a team to the Final Four. Though the Big East has to look far more sheepish, in an attempt to upstage the ACC, they robbed Conference USA of most of its quality teams – with no regard to geography – created a 16-team mecha-conference and sent a record eight teams dancing. Yet not one will be on the main stage.

Even the other three Final Four participants are not without some intrigue. LSU is young and bloodthirsty, putting its weight on the shoulders of a mastodon who goes by the moniker "Big Baby". UCLA, after a decade of decline, is looking like your father's Bruins again. Florida's platoon of sophomores have finally shrugged off the widely-believed ideal that the Gators' program is soft.

But this story is definitely the coolest, if not the greatest. If an 11th-seeded, mid-major, one-time bubble team knocking off three recent national champions en route to the Final Four – and inspiring a nation in the process with its carefree attitude – isn't the sweetest rocking of the college hoops establishment ever, then what is?

Seriously, find one.

Even Billy Packer has to concede.

Who could have thought, a month ago, that this ragtag team donning green and gold would capture the fascination of the entire sports nation? That, playing 15 miles from its home campus but in a fan demographic split between Georgetown, Maryland, Virginia, George Washington and the like, the fans on hand would be screaming "G-M-U" and rocking and swaying with every move the Patriots made.

Less than a month ago, these guys were going nuts at the chance of playing David to everyone's Goliath. Fast forward to last weekend, with the mission all but accomplished, and they're still going nuts – thankfully, not for the nuts.

Skinn, by the way, got his redeeming shot.

Prior to the game, UConn guard Rashad Anderson declared his team was headed to Indianapolis – not exactly a bold statement at the time, considering the odds.

But with GMU hanging onto the lead late in overtime, Skinn couldn't pass up the opportunity to return the favor.

"Still think y'all are going to Indianapolis?" he reportedly asked Anderson.

The Patriots are headed to Indy, and win or lose, they're already legends.

third period. After Loyola scored two goals to close the gap to 9-6 late in the third, the Minutemen scored the first five goals of the fourth quarter to put the game away.

RANKING WITH THE BEST

UMass is one of the top teams in the nation, as evidenced by its No. 7 ranking, and the efforts of several individuals have put them at the top of several NCAA statistical categories.

Senior attacker Sean Morris continues to lead the nation in scoring, with an average of 5.4 points per game. The All-American is far and away tops in assists, with 26 on the year, good for an average of 3.7 per game. The second place player in assists, Cornell's Eric Pittard, is over a goal behind Morris with a 2.67 average per game.

Joining Morris among the nation's best is a fellow captain, senior long-stick midfielder Jake Deane. Deane has scooped up an average of 7.9 groundballs this season putting him fourth overall and his 63-percent success rate on faceoffs is the eighth-best percentage.

Freshman goalie Doc Schneider, who recorded a career-high 19 saves in the win over Loyola, is ninth in the country with a .626 save percentage. As a team the UMass offense ranks fourth in the country in scoring with 12.7 goals per game.

Junior midfielder Brett Garber scored nine goals in three games over Spring Break and leads the Minutemen with 12 goals.

GRASS EASY ON UMASS

The March 18 contest at Brown was the first game of the season the Minutemen played on grass. UMass prepared for the game by practicing on the lower Boyden fields in the days leading up to the game.

UMass coach Greg Cannella said despite some difficulty handling groundballs on grass, his players prefer to play on the natural surface because it is easier on their legs than the unforgiving artificial turf of Garber Field.

The Minutemen's next game, Saturday at Penn State at noon, will be played on grass and the team will again practice at Boyden this week to prepare.

ODDS AND ENDS

Morris was named the ECAC Offensive Player of the Week and the UMass Dinn Brothers Athlete of the Week yesterday after racking up nine points in the games with Loyola and Sacred Heart.

Freshman attacker Jim Connolly was named the ECAC Rookie of the Week on March 20, after tallying his first career hat trick in the win over Brown.

Junior midfielder Brett Garber was also honored by the league following the Brown game, as he was named to the ECAC Honor Roll after his four goals and one assist performance against the Bears.

In the Brown game, both teams were unusually productive at clearing the ball, as both squads were perfect, with UMass 14-of-14 and Brown 13-of-13.

The time of UMass' regular season finale, a home matchup with Rutgers on May 6, has been changed to 3:30 p.m. to accommodate a national television broadcast on ESPN-U. Three of the Minutemen's final four games of the season will be on national television, with the April 22 game at Georgetown also appearing on ESPN2 and the April 29 game at Syracuse airing on CSTV.

Junior midfielder Pat Larmon tallied three points on two goals and one assist in Saturday's matchup with No. 19 Loyola.

Young Gator guns triumph

favorite underdog, George Mason, in the Final Four on Saturday night. The 11th-seeded Patriots shocked top-seeded Connecticut earlier Sunday to win the Washington Regional.

Last year was supposed to be the Year of the Gator. David Lee, Anthony Roberson and Matt Walsh gave Florida impressive firepower, and the youngsters could provide some depth off the bench.

The three stars might have been one or two too many, though. The Gators lost to Villanova in the second round last year, exposed as more of a collection of good players than a true team.

This year's group couldn't be more different. Brewer was a prep All-American, but Noah, Al Horford and Taurean Green are often better known for their famous fathers than their games.

And the roots of their success were laid as much off the court as on it. The sophomores have not only played together since they arrived at Florida, they live together. The bonds they've formed at home carry over to the court, and give them a foundation that older players would envy.

"We're very close," Noah said earlier in the week. "And in the beginning of the season, a lot of people doubted us and that made us a tighter group because we knew how good we could be."

They started convincing other people after starting the season with 17 straight wins. But it was the three straight losses in the beginning of February that really made them winners.

"When we lost three in a row, I said it's good for our team because it is helping them figure out how to win," Donovan said. "They didn't understand a missed block out, a broken defensive assignment, giving up 3-point shots could cause us to lose."

They do now. Their win over Villanova was their ninth straight, and their age was never an issue Sunday.

The Wildcats were supposed to be the veteran team, led by seniors Randy Foye and Allan Ray. But it was Ray who committed a silly technical, shoving a ball at Walter Hodge after a foul. Villanova seemed to unravel after that and could never get it back together, no matter how hard Foye worked to rally them.

Ray finished with 11 points on a dismal 5-of-19 shooting, and the Wildcats were harassed into 25 percent shooting. Their usually lethal three-point attack was nowhere to be found.

The Gators, meanwhile, played with maturity. Noah seemed to always be there whenever Florida needed a big basket or rebound, finishing with 21 points, 15 rebounds and five blocks. Green went 12-of-13 from the free-throw line, and he hit a running bank shot after Villanova pulled within 45-42 midway through the second half.

"Those kids are big and strong. And young," said former Villanova coach Rollie Massimino, who'd hoped to see the Wildcats reach the Final Four for the first time since his 1985 squad won the national title.

"You thought they would crack a little, but they never did."

Florida guards Corey Brewer (left) and Al Horford (right) celebrate after the Gators upset No. 1 Villanova in the regional final on Sunday.

George Mason stuns basketball world

By David Ginsburg
Associated Press

WASHINGTON – The nets were gone, the trophy was packed away, and virtually everyone wearing green and gold had already been hugged.

So, nearly an hour after George Mason guard Lamar Butler cradled the rebound of Connecticut's final errant shot Sunday, some two dozen jubilant Patriots fans finally decided it was time to leave the arena.

But not before they said those sweet-sounding words again, just for emphasis.

"Final Four! Final Four!"

That's right, as improbable as the following sounds, it's the absolute truth: George Mason is going to the Final Four of the NCAA tournament.

The 11th-seeded Patriots are headed to Indianapolis as the Washington Regional champions after shocking No. 1 seed Connecticut 86-84 in overtime.

"Yeah, we expected this," George Mason freshman Chris Fleming said, flashing a huge grin. "Honestly, we came in thinking, what do we have to lose? Everyone else thinks we're underdogs. We think we can beat this team."

And they did. Using the same five players over the final 10 minutes of regulation and throughout overtime, George Mason (27-7) stunned the Big East regular-season champions and became the first No. 11 seed to reach the Final Four since LSU in 1986.

The Patriots will face Florida, which advanced by eliminating No. 1 seed Villanova on Sunday.

George Mason's win over a Connecticut squad that spent five weeks as the top-ranked team in the nation will be remembered as an upset. But given the fashion in which the Patriots have played over the past two weeks, combined with UConn's inexplicable failure to play up to its potential this month, the outcome wasn't outlandishly surprising.

"We didn't play our best basketball and they did everything great. They out-rebounded us, shot better in the second half," said Connecticut's Jeff Adrien, a reserve who scored 17 points. "That's a real good team."

Evidently better than the Huskies, whose late-season lapse began with a loss to Syracuse in the quarterfinals of the Big East tournament.

UConn got a top seed anyway, but nothing came easy for the Huskies in the NCAA tournament. They fell behind by 12 before beating Albany, then squeezed past Kentucky. On Friday, Connecticut beat Washington in overtime after Rashad Anderson nailed a game-tying 3-pointer with 1.8 seconds left in regulation.

Alas, the Huskies (30-4) had no comebacks left against George Mason after forcing overtime on a last-second layup by Denham Brown.

"We were kind of playing like that the whole tournament. Rashad saved us last game and Denham saved us today," Adrien said. "It was a matter of time for us to break out, but we just didn't do it. We haven't been able to put teams away."

The Patriots, meanwhile, fed off the enthusiasm of their quirky coach, Jim Larranaga, who told his players during timeouts that UConn didn't know George Mason played in the Colonial Athletic Association.

"That's a little bit of disrespect," guard Tony Skinn said. "Coach told us the CAA stands for 'Connecticut Assassin Association.'"

It sure did Sunday.

Add UConn to an impressive list of George Mason victims that includes Michigan State and North Carolina. The Patriots may not have the size, speed, athleticism and depth of some of the nation's elite programs, but there's no arguing with the results.

"Talent is not everything, especially with a team playing on such a roll as they were," UConn forward Josh Boone said. "A lot of those guys probably didn't get recruited by big-time schools, so they're going to play harder against a team like us, especially in the Elite Eight, when nobody but them and their fans thought that they were supposed to be there.

"Now they're in the Final Four."

And the Huskies? The two-time national champions were left trying to make sense of a solid season that ended far sooner than anticipated.

"If we keep winning 30 games a year," Connecticut coach Jim Calhoun said, "I think we'll be in pretty good shape and we'll win our championships again."

The No. 11-seeded George Mason Patriots had good reason to celebrate after their 86-84 overtime upset over No. 1 seed UConn on Sunday.

UF shocks Wildcats, reaches Final Four

By Dave Campbell
Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS – With Florida minutes away from the Final Four, Joakim Noah threw his head back, screamed and pounded his chest as if to announce the Gators' arrival.

Noah and his sophomore teammates dispatched the last No. 1 seed standing, and are suddenly heading to Indianapolis – perhaps as the favorite.

The young, third-seeded Gators beat a steep learning curve with a 75-62 win over top-seeded Villanova in the Minneapolis Regional final Sunday, and are going to the Final Four a lot sooner than anyone could have thought.

Noah had 21 points, a career-high 15 rebounds, five blocks and was selected most outstanding player of the regional. Fellow sophomore Al Horford added 12 points and 15 rebounds.

"When you're young and you don't play in these situations, you just don't know," Noah said. "I think the more we play in these situations, the better we're going to become."

Point guard Taurean Green scored 19 points for Florida (31-6), which will face No. 11 seed George Mason next Saturday in the national semifinals. No. 2 seed UCLA plays No. 4 seed LSU in the other game.

This marks the first time since the field was expanded to 64 teams in 1985 that no top-seeded team advanced to the Final Four – and the second time in tournament history.

"We're the Gator boys. The Gator boys are hot right now," said Noah, whose father is 1983 French Open champion Yannick Noah.

Villanova star Randy Foye fouled out with 28.9 seconds left and walked slowly to the bench to hug his coaches and teammates, as tears streamed down his face. He carried the Wildcats (28-5) for the second time in three days, without any help from fellow senior Allan Ray.

"Like Randy said, this is going to hurt for a while," said Ray, who had 11 points on 5-for-19 shooting.

Foye had 25 points, but Lee Humphrey helped keep him from getting free behind the three-point line. Foye missed six of his eight 3-pointers.

"We've won games that way. We've shot poorly and then got on the offensive boards and played defense," Villanova coach Jay Wright said. "They were just too good."

This was Florida's eighth straight trip to the tournament under coach Billy Donovan, but so many of his previous teams – minus the national runner-up in 2000 – failed to fulfill their postseason potential.

This tight group of sophomores, led by the fiery, pony-tailed Noah, vowed to change that after bonding during their first few weeks on campus. Despite a second-round loss in the tournament last year to Villanova, the Gators are a nation-best 15-1 in March over the last two years.

"They were unselfish. They wanted to win, wanted to learn. They wanted to work, and they wanted to get better," Donovan said.

Noah and Horford were too tough for the Wildcats to use much of the flashy, four-guard attack for which they are known. Foul trouble made it impossible in the second half, as Foye drew his third at the 18:00 mark, Kyle Lowry picked up his fourth with 14 minutes left and Ray's third came soon after.

A smooth, sweeping layup across the lane by Ray cut the Gators' lead to 54-47 with 7:30 to go. But after a foul by Will Sheridan, a timeout, and two more free throws by Noah, it was a nine-point edge for Florida.

The cap came when Horford, slowly backing down with the ball in the post, spun and dropped an easy pass on the baseline to a streaking Noah – who powered up and threw down a rim-bending dunk for a 66-54 lead with less than 3:30 left.

"I can't say I'm surprised," said Gators reserve forward Chris Richard. "We've been playing together a while and impressed a lot of people in the summer. I'm not going to pinch myself. You know, I'm not cocky, but I knew we had a great team."

Before that, every time the Gators opened up a healthy lead the Wildcats came right back.

Ray picked up an early technical foul during a brief tiff for holding the ball in the face of Florida's Walter Hodge, and the Wildcats lost some energy after that – falling behind by as many as 12.

A foul by Ray a little later in the half sent him to the bench, and put Green on the line for three shots. Green made two of them to give the Gators a 31-21 lead with 5:46 left before halftime.

Despite shooting 21 percent from the field (6-for-38), Villanova refused to limp into the locker room with a double-digit deficit – as it did two days before in a third-round win over Boston College.

Florida became a bit careless, started getting frustrated with the officials and struggled when the Wildcats used their full-court zone press with Mike Nardi pestering Lee Humphrey at the top.

The Gators had 10 first-half turnovers, failed to make a field goal in the final 4:39, had given up 16 offensive rebounds – and all of a sudden the lead was down to 35-30 at the break.

"That's generally a recipe for disaster, but because we defended the 3-point line that gave us an opportunity," Dukiwan said.

Since their national championship in 1985 as a No. 8 seed, the Wildcats have been trying to get back to the Final Four. With seniors Foye and Ray leading the way, this Villanova squad was no underdog.

Ranked near the top of the AP poll all season, these Wildcats were favorites to get to the Final Four.

"Everybody was crushed," Wright said. "I told them to just cry. Everybody let it out. It's supposed to hurt. I'm so proud of them. I know it hurts for everybody, but I really want to make sure this group feels great about itself."

Florida coach Billy Donovan takes his team back to the Final Four for the first time since 2000, when the Gators lost to Michigan State in the finals.

Two films by Israeli and Palestinian women:
the search for identity in a fractured society

Paradise Lost

Minutemen get physical

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Jack Reid, a senior defenseman on the Massachusetts Men's lacrosse team, felt that in recent games the Minutemen (6-1, 1-0 ECAC) had gotten away from playing the physical brand of lacrosse that they exhibited early in the season.

In No. 7 UMass' 14-9 win over Loyola on Saturday, Reid took it upon himself to step up the physicality. With 14:39 remaining in the fourth quarter, Reid was carrying the ball out of the UMass zone on a clear attempt. Standing in his way at midfield was Loyola's Patrick Kennedy. Rather than attempt to doge Kennedy or make a pass to a teammate, Reid decided to make a stand.

Reid lowered his shoulder and flattened the hapless Kennedy while continuing his run into the Loyola zone.

"People think you can't hit when you have the ball," Reid said. "But if you're going to stand at the midfield line and try to stop me you better be moving forward and not just standing still. I just had this kid lined up in front of me and he thought he was going to get me so I just decided to drop my shoulder and give him one.

"I like dropping my shoulder and getting physical," he added. "It was a big thing we wanted to do [Saturday] - step up the physicality. Everybody was hitting on both sides of the ball. It was part of the tone we wanted to set."

In the ultimate example of adding insult to injury, Kennedy was penalized for being offsides on the play, as the hit knocked him over the midfield line — where he remained on the ground for several minutes — resulting in too many Loyola players being on the defensive side of the field.

The irony of Kennedy being penalized after taking such a brutal hit was not lost on Reid, and he also felt that future opponents may think twice before standing in his path.

"That's a great feeling to have when you knock someone's socks off then they get a penalty for going offsides," Reid said. "Maybe somebody won't stand in front of me next time. We'll see."

RUNNING UP THE SCORE

In their three wins last week, the Minutemen benefited from explosive offensive outbursts. Last Tuesday's 17-9 win over Sacred Heart was a perfect example of how this year's squad is prone to going on scoring runs (as well as surrendering them).

The Minutemen jumped out to a 5-0 lead on the Pioneers in the first period and seemed to be on their way to easy victory. But in the second and third quarters, UMass eased off the gas pedal enough to allow Sacred Heart to score five straight goals and tie the game at eight. Despite seeing their comfortable lead evaporate, the Minutemen were able to respond with the next nine goals to ice the victory.

In each of the other two games last week, UMass used offensive spurts en route to wins. In a 13-9 win at Brown on March 18, the Maroon and White fell behind 2-0 early but answered with four straight goals and never trailed again in the game.

On Saturday, UMass ran off five consecutive goals after Loyola evened the score at four in the Senior attacker Sean Morris (top) and junior midfielder Brian Jacovina (bottom) combined for eight points against No. 19 Loyola on Saturday.

George Mason is miles from ordinary

Brendan Hall

The date was March 5, 2006.

The occasion was the semi-final round of the Colonial Athletic Association Tournament in Richmond, Va.

The sense of urgency on the countenance of George Mason guard Tony Skinn, the Patriots' second-leading scorer, was evident as the game's intensity heightened in the waning minutes, the Hofstra Pride clinging to a lead lost earlier by the Patriots.

At that point, GMU was looking for a hole in the NCAA Tournament fence to climb through. Although it was receiving votes in the polls and sported an impressive RPI ranking of 26, GMU was the regular season co-champs of a conference that was ranked 10th and, despite an impressive victory on Bracket-Buster Day, was just 2-4 against the RPI Top 50. Only one of the seven teams they lost to (UNC-Wilmington on Jan. 21) actually made it to this year's NCAA's – and even then, that team bowed out in the first round of play.

Skinn, a senior from Maryland, could feel the cool running through his skin – no pun intended – as he sank a 3-pointer from the corner to cut Hofstra's lead to four with a minute to go, but in one fell swoop he lost it.

He dropped it.

He squandered it.

On his way back up the court, no doubt in the heat of the moment, he landed a quick elbow in the groin of Pride guard Loren Stokes, leaving him sprawled on the hardwood floor. The refs missed the call, but the cameras did not.

Mason went on to lose that game by nine, and was fortunate to get an at-large bid to the Big Dance. In the aftermath, the team said all of the right things and head coach Jim Larranaga made the right moves – suspending Skinn for the first round – to keep the negative press relatively at bay.

Hofstra went on to suffer defeat at the hands of UNC-Wilmington in the conference finals, and again to CAA rival Old Dominion in the NIT quarterfinals last Wednesday.

The rest of this story – GMU's improbably upsets, leading to a ridiculously improbable Final Four ticket-punching – can now be read, seen and heard from every remote American news outlet, and chatted about at every water cooler.

In its darkest hour of the season, this team was able to turn the lights back on and make history.

And when you counter in all the other storylines about such a unique group of individuals, what isn't there to like about this overachieving gang of overnight celebrities?

Every Tuesday at practice, the Patriots take a half-hour out of their practice schedule to play some baseball – that's right, baseball. While other teams are working on improving from the field, they're making fielder's choices. When other squads around the country are running suicides, these guys are trying to pull off a suicide squeeze.

Can you imagine Bobby

Bruins decline starts from the top down

Danny Picard

So what do they call it now?

There is one heck of a mess down on Causeway Street these days, and no, I am not talking about the scene in front of the Harp on Saturday nights. This mess is even greater than anything walking out of the city's finest bars at 2 a.m.

It's called Bruins.

Maybe you recognize that phrase, thanks to the people at NESN for shoving it down our throats as we sit there watching our beloved Boston Bruins fall from grace. Maybe you've seen the commercials – or the billboards perhaps. Or maybe you haven't seen them at all because you are too disgraced to watch what was once known as the "Big, Bad Bruins."

So who's to blame for the demise of the Black and Gold?

Don't get me wrong, I am not faulting the network for selling its hockey team. I am putting all the blame on the organization itself for not putting a championship product on the ice since 1971-72. And with the recent firing of general manager Mike O'Connell, one can only assume that there are more casualties to come.

It all began to go downhill at the end of the 2004 season; we just had no idea what would follow. The Bruins had a remarkable regular season, and went into the playoffs as the No. 2 seed to face the No. 7-seeded Montreal Canadiens. Management went out and made two key acquisitions in Michael Nylander and Sergei Gonchar. And with the phenomenal play of rookies Andrew Raycroft and Patrice Bergeron, it had to be the year, right?

Think again. I was fortunate enough to be sitting in the Premium Seating section when Alexei Kovalev threw the puck off the side of the net, right onto the stick of Richard Zednik, who then sealed the deal on a game-seven overtime win for the Canadiens. And to this day, I get sick to my stomach just thinking about it.

But what happened in 2005-06 is something out of a horror movie for most Bruins fans. After the lockout, O'Connell did not re-sign a few key players in Brian Rolston, Mike Knuble, Sergei Gonchar and Michael Nylander. Team management said all the right things, and forced us to believe that they had a "plan" in place for the off-season, as they only had a handful of players under contract. O'Connell continued to say that with the new Collective Bargaining Agreement (CBA) in place, the Bruins would be in the best shape out of any team in the league, come time to sign free agents.

That "plan," as you may have already noticed, did not work. The Bruins miscalculated the whole situation, and were left spending their off-season money on players that did not seem to fit the bill of a young, fast team in the "new" NHL. The Bruins signed veterans Brian Leetch, Alex Zhamnov and Shawn McEachern in the off-season, which left many of us scratching our heads.

The Bruins got off to a slow start this year, and, as a result, the media started questioning the organization, and wondered who would take the fall. Little did we know, it would be the face of the franchise: Joe Thornton.

On November 30, Thornton was traded to the San Jose Sharks for Brad Stuart, Marco Sturm and Wayne Primeau in a blockbuster move that would make or break O'Connell's tenure as GM of the Bruins.

And we all know how that worked out.

The Bruins came out the very next night and shut out the first place Ottawa Senators by a score of 3-0. Sturm recorded a goal and an assist, while Stuart had a helper of his own. The highly unpopular three-for-one deal began to make sense to some of the naive fans, but if you knew hockey, you knew the few weeks of success after the trade would not last.

And it didn't. The Bruins now find themselves out of the playoff hunt, and in search of a new identity. So again, to whom can we point the finger at?

Obviously, team President Harry Sinden has put the blame on O'Connell. But when is Sinden going to take some responsibility in the matter? Last time I checked, the Bruins have not won a Stanley Cup in 24 years, the exact amount of time that Sinden has worked

UMass Nine visits Pioneers

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Winning baseball games almost always comes from a combination of effective pitching and run-producing offenses. So far in 2006, the Massachusetts baseball team (2-9, 0-3 Atlantic 10) has found it hard to put the two together.

Today the Minutemen continue their season-long 17-game road trip against Sacred Heart (6-13, 2-1 Northeast). The first pitch in Bridgeport, Conn. is slated to be thrown at 3 p.m.

Pitching woes have plagued UMass so far in the early goings of the spring. In their first 11 games, the Minutemen have given up double-digit run totals a total of five times. That translates into a team earned run average of just over six (6.03).

The most struggles for the Maroon and White hurlers have occurred in the early innings of games. In the first three frames its opponents have posted 38 runs compared to just 11 for the Minutemen.

Against the Pioneers, UMass coach Mike Stone will be sending sophomore Aaron Smith to the hill. Smith has been one of the bright spots in the UMass rotation as of late. In his two appearances this season – one start and one in relief – he is 2-0 with just a 2.16 ERA. The two wins In Smith's record account for the only wins the Maroon and White have enjoyed this season.

Smith's lone start came on March 21st against Rollins College. In that game he went 5 1/3 innings while giving up two runs, only one of which was earned.

So far this spring the UMass offense has been paced by junior Bryan Adamski. The first baseman leads the Minutemen in slugging percentage (.594), home runs (two), runs batted in (five) and total bases (19). His round-trippers came last Friday when he belted two two-run homers in the loss to the Fordham Rams.

After a very rocky start, the Pioneers look as though they may have righted their ship in time to face the Minutemen. SHU lost their first 11 games to begin the season. That stretch was capped by a 20-1 whitewashing at the hands of Connecticut on March 15th.

Since then they have won six of their last eight games. The Pioneers had won five straight before dropping their game on Sunday to Long Island University. Five SHU errors led to the seven runs for LIU in the game.

Dan Howard is expected to be on the bump for the Pioneers today. The junior is 1-3 on the season with a 6.50 ERA. Howard earned his lone win his last time out against Army on March 21st at home. In that game he hurled eight scoreless innings and struck out nine batters.

It was announced this week that Pioneer Renaissance man, Bobby McKee, was named the SHU Student-Athlete of the week. In five games at the plate, McKee batted .529 (9-17) including two doubles and two triples to go along with a .619 on-base percentage. On March 21st, McKee also came on in the ninth to pitch a scoreless inning and earn the save against Army.

Junior Anthony Santos started 48 games at second base and batted .238 for the Minutemen last season.

Young Gators make impressive showing

By Nancy Armour
Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS – Maybe the Florida Gators were too young to know any better. Or maybe they were the wise ones all along.

They weren't given much of a chance to do anything before the season began, and really, who in their right mind would have picked them?

Florida lost its top three scorers, one of them a first-round pick in the NBA draft, and replaced them with a bunch of kids – four sophomores in the starting lineup, only one of whom did much of significance for the whole of last year. Look around the NCAA tournament, and it's usually the veteran teams who stick around long enough to have a shot at something special.

"This team, starting the season, I felt had all the team makeup. They wanted to learn, they wanted to work, they wanted to get better," coach Billy Donovan said. "I didn't know if we'd have the experience to win basketball games or enough basketball games because we'd never been there before."

But the young Gators knew what they had. If people wanted to doubt them, go ahead – but do it after the season ended.

Turns out, they were onto something. They're on their way to the Final Four for the first time since 2000, showing more poise in their 75-62 victory over Villanova on Sunday afternoon than the most senior-laden of teams. They kept their composure whenever Villanova, the last team to top seed alive, crept close, looking as if they'd been in this situation a dozen times.

In fact, the only time they looked their age was when the buzzer sounded. The Gators ran around the court like grade schoolers, not sure if they should hug each other first or pull their new Final Four T-shirts over their heads. Corey Brewer whooped and hollered at the Florida fans. Joakim Noah mugged for the cameras, puckering his lips in air kisses.

"It's a great feeling when you have a lot of doubters and prove them wrong. It made us a tighter unit at the end of the day," said Noah, the most outstanding player of the regional. "We have been through so many different experiences . . . the more we play through these situations, the better we are going to become."

Next weekend will bring another experience to add to the young Gators' list. Third-seeded Florida will play everybody's

UMass receives grant for nutrition scholarship

By John Fenuccio
Collegian Staff

The department of nutrition at UMass has received a $90,000 grant from the U.S. Department of Agriculture to fund the Nutrition Multicultural Scholarship Program.

The program, which provides $6,000 scholarships for five undergraduate students for three years of study leading to a bachelor's of science degree in nutrition, is designed to recruit, retain and provide mentors and train high-quality undergraduate multicultural scholars in nutrition.

"This is an excellent opportunity to increase the diversity of our students and future nutritionists and to set up a system to support diverse learners beyond these funded years," said Nancy Cohen, professor and head of the Department of Nutrition.

Along with Cohen, the program is being run by Pamela Marsh-Williams, assistant provost and dean for the Undergraduate Advising and Academic Support Center (UAASC) and director of Pre-Major Advising Services, and Matthew L. Ouellett, associate director of the Center for Teaching.

Special features of the program include a scholars' seminar, a one-credit course aimed at developing social support, mentorship and professional preparation through research projects and community service projects, a peer tutoring system where senior nutrition majors provide tutoring in math, science, nutrition and other courses, finding community mentors who are nutrition practitioners of researchers in the field as well as giving participants the opportunity to serve as mentors to first year students.

The program is also designed to highlight the many rewarding careers within the nutrition major. Not only researching problems such as obesity, diabetes and eating disorders, Cohen highlighted additional career paths.

"Nutritionists teach people about nutrition education to children in schools and adults, work in hospitals and clinics providing nutrition counseling and care plans," said Cohen. "[Nutritionists also] address malnutrition in developing countries, work with medical supplement and food companies to develop and promote nutritionally-sound products and perform research into how a healthy nutritional diet can prevent diseases such as heart disease and cancer, and treat many other conditions."

Currently, nutritionists are not representative of the populations served in terms of race/ethnicity and gender, according to Cohen. This grant will provide scholarships for five students who are underrepresented in the field of nutrition, who newly join the major and who meet and maintain qualifying criteria.

The program will foster collaboration between the Department of Nutrition, the UAASC, the Center for Teaching and other campus programs to reach underserved students. It's hoped to develop an array of innovative programs for mentoring, community service and research lab experiences, and spread awareness to diverse settings and communities both nationally and globally.

Promotion for the scholarship will take place through professors, student and dormitory groups, and campus advising centers, such as the New Students Program and the Undergraduate Advising and Academic Support Center.

Applications will be accepted during the upcoming fall semester and the scholarships will begin the following spring semester.

Al-Qaida denies Moussaoui's 9/11 involvement

By Matthew Barakat
Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — Two more high-ranking al-Qaida operatives cast doubt on whether Zacarias Moussaoui was involved in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, with one portraying him as a misfit who refused to follow orders, in testimony Tuesday at his death penalty trial.

The testimony of both was read to the jury, in one case because the witness is a captive whom the U.S. government did not want to appear in court.

One terrorist, identified as Sayf al-Adl, a senior member of al-Qaida's military committee, stated sometime between Sept. 1, 2001, and late July 2004, that Moussaoui was "a confirmed jihadist but was absolutely not going to take part in the Sept. 11, 2001, mission." The 9/11 Commission reported that the U.S. had recovered from a safehouse in Pakistan a letter written by al-Adl describing the various candidates considered for the Sept. 11 attacks.

The other — Waleed bin Attash, often known simply as Khallad — is considered the mastermind of the 2000 suicide attack on the USS Cole and an early planner of the Sept. 11, 2001, plot. He said he knew of no part that Moussaoui was to have played in the 9/11 attacks. Khallad was captured in April 2003.

Their testimony backs up the claims of Khalid Shaikh Mohammed, chief organizer of the 9/11 attacks. He said in testimony read to the jury Monday that Moussaoui had nothing to do with the plot but was to have been used for a second wave of attacks distinct from Sept. 11.

Moussaoui said for the first time Monday that he was supposed to pilot a fifth plane in the 9/11 plot and attack the White House. He had previously denied a role in 9/11 and claimed to be part of a different plot.

The defense introduced an array of written testimony from these captives that was read to the jurors in an effort to undercut Moussaoui's dramatic testimony Monday that he was to hijack a fifth plane on Sept. 11 and fly it into the White House. His lawyers were trying to undo damage he might have done to himself when he testified against their wishes.

Khallad portrayed Moussaoui as something of a loose cannon during a trip to Malaysia in 2000, where he met members of a radical group affiliated with al-Qaida. Khallad said Moussaoui breached security measures and al-Qaida protocol.

For example, he called Khallad daily, despite instructions to call only in an emergency, to the point where Khallad turned his cell phone off.

Another witness, Mustafa Ahmed al-Hawsawi, who served as a paymaster and facilitator for the Sept. 11 operation from his post in Dubai, United Arab Emirates, said he had seen Moussaoui at an al-Qaida guesthouse in Kandahar, Afghanistan, in the first half of 2001, but was never introduced to him or conducted operations with him.

Al-Hawsawi said he provided money and tickets to four of the Sept. 11 hijackers and to a fifth man, identified as Muhammed al-Qahtani, who was to be a hijacker but was denied entry to the United States before Sept. 11 in Orlando, Fla.

In the written statement, Al-Hawsawi quoted Khalid Shaikh Mohammed as describing al-Qahtani as the last hijacker for the mission who would "complete the group."

Thus it appeared al-Qahtani was the so-called missing 20th hijacker of Sept. 11, a role the government initially thought Moussaoui was to have played before his arrest a month earlier.

Also Tuesday, defense attorney Alan Yamamoto read a summary of three Federal Aviation Administration intelligence reports on hijacking from the late 1990s and 2000, reports that concluded a hijacked airliner could be flown into a building or national landmark in the U.S. However, this was "viewed as an option of last resort."

The FAA had reports of questionable reliability that Osama bin Laden had discussed suicide hijackings and had discussed hijacking a U.S. air carrier in an effort to free imprisoned Egyptian cleric Omar Abdel Rahman.

But the reports concluded that crashing a jetliner into a building appeared to be an unlikely option for the goal of winning Rahman's release because it offered no time to negotiate.

The FAA was more concerned that bin Laden might try to hijack a U.S. carrier and take the American passengers as hostages to Afghanistan to deter a U.S. military strike there.

Last year, when he pleaded guilty, Moussaoui had said his plot to hijack a 747 and fly it into the White House was if the U.S. refused to release Rahman.

Moussaoui's testimony Monday that he was part of the 9/11 plot along with would-be shoe-bomber Richard Reid flew in the face of his previous denials that he had any role in the Sept. 11 attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people.

Moussaoui is the only person in this country charged in the Sept. 11 attacks, during which hijackers crashed passenger jetliners into New York's World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a field in Pennsylvania. Mohammed is in custody abroad in undisclosed circumstances, having been interrogated but not yet charged.

French protest new contract law

By John Leicester
Associated Press

PARIS – More than 1 million people poured into the streets across France and strikers disrupted air, rail and bus travel Tuesday — even shutting down the Eiffel Tower — in the largest nationwide protest over a youth labor law.

Scattered violence erupted in Paris, and riot police used water cannons and tear gas to disperse several thousand youths who pelted them with stones and bottles after an otherwise peaceful march. More than 240 people were arrested.

Unions and the leftist opposition joined in solidarity with the angry students for the one-day strike, increasing the pressure on Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin to withdraw the measure that makes it easier to fire young workers.

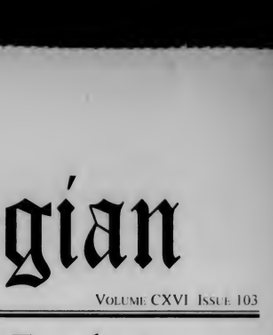
Although Villepin held firm, cracks opened in his conservative government. Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, in a clear break with Villepin, suggested suspending the law to allow for negotiations.

With the government in crisis, President Jacques Chirac canceled a trip planned for later in the week to stay in Paris.

Police and organizers' estimates for the number of marchers varied greatly, but both showed that the protest movement is growing in strength.

Police said 1,055,000 people took part in more than 250 protests nationwide, including 92,000 in Paris. The organizers' total was closer to 3 million, with 700,000 at the march from the Left Bank to the heavily policed Place de Republique.

Elsewhere, 31,000 marched in the southwestern city of Bordeaux, 28,000 in the southern port of Marseille, 26,000 in the Alpine city of Grenoble, 17,000 in Lyon and hundreds of thousands in dozens of other cities and towns, according to police.



Riot police, under orders to arrest as many troublemakers as possible, moved aggressively in Paris to prevent a repeat of the intense violence of past demonstrations.

Marchers ranged across all age groups, from students with "Non" painted on their faces, to older union militants. Many said they wanted to defend the status quo.

"Young people are sacrificed in the name of the economy, and we are here to fight against it," said Maxime Ourly, 18, a literature student at the Paris march. "We don't know what will happen in the future, and we want to control our futures."

Students and labor unions say the labor law will erode France's cherished workplace protections. Set to take effect next month, it would let companies fire employees under 26 without reason in the first two years on the job.

Villepin told parliament that he was open to talks on employment and possible changes to the law but did not say that he would withdraw it.

Police forces use a water cannon on protesters who are demonstrating against the first job contract law in Paris.

Unicycler treks to pay tuition

RUMFORD, Maine—A teenager is planning to raise funds to go back to college by riding his unicycle across New England.

Maxwell DeMilner, 19, of Peru, plans to leave Rumford on May 6 and ride his oversized one-wheeler 750 miles. His journey will make a loop through New Hampshire's White Mountains, Vermont's Green Mountains, western Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island and eastern Massachusetts before ending up in Rumford.

All the while, he'll be towing a trailer.

The goal, DeMilner said, is to raise $2,000 for tuition and supplies when he returns to college. He attended Chester College of New England in New Hampshire for the 2004-2005 school year, but didn't return this school year because he didn't have enough money.

He plans to attend the University of Maine at Farmington starting the spring of 2007, and hopes to collect contributions from individuals and businesses during his trip.

"A unicycle gets a lot of attention, it's something I know how to do, and it's not very common, and it's a lot of fun," DeMilner said.

Maxwell plans to pedal 50 miles a day and complete the journey in about three weeks. He averages about 11 mph, but said he can get up to 15 mph.

He'll tow a small trailer behind him containing changes of clothes, food, a small tent and a sleeping bag. He's prepared to camp along the way.

Nurse: spring break increases risk of STDs

By Elizabeth St. John
Arkansas Traveler (U. Arkansas)

FAYETTEVILLE, Ark. – Although spring break is a time for fun and excitement, it can also be a time when students participate in risky behavior. Spring break brings an increased incidence of sexually transmitted diseases for college students, said Lori Reynerson, a nurse practitioner at the University of Arkansas Pat Walker Health Center.

Chlamydia and HPV are two of the most common STDs on college campuses, Reynerson said.

"There are two categories of STDs," she said. These include viral and bacterial infections. A common viral disease is HPV, and chlamydia is an example of a bacterial infection.

Human papillomavirus, or HPV, is a group of viruses, many of which are sexually transmitted. The virus can cause genital warts and in some cases cancer of the cervix, she said.

HPV is probably the most common STD on campus, Reynerson said. It can be spread through skin to skin contact. A person can also be a carrier without having any symptoms, she said. In fact, many people with the virus will not show symptoms and the infection will go away on its own, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention Web site.

However, as many as 20 million people are infected with HPV and at least 50 percent of sexually active people will acquire the virus at some time during their lives, according to information on the Web site.

Chlamydia is another common STD on college campuses. Because the cervix of young women is not fully matured, many college-age women are at a higher risk for infection of chlamydia, according to the Web site. In 2004, more than 900,000 cases of chlamydia were reported to the CDC.

Chlamydia is known as a "silent" STD, according to the Web site, because many people with the infection do not have any symptoms. When symptoms do occur in men, they commonly include a burning sensation while urinating, an abnormal discharge, and sometimes prostate infections, Reynerson said. Women can experience abnormal vaginal discharge and yeast and bladder infections. However, the disease can lead to damage of a woman's reproductive organs. Chlamydia can be

World prepares for total solar eclipse

BY KWASI KPODO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ACCRA, Ghana — Tourists and scientists were gathering at spots around the world for the first total eclipse in years, a solar show that will sweep northeast from Brazil to Mongolia and blot out the sun across swathes of the world's poorest lands.

The last such eclipse in November 2003 was most visible from Antarctica, said Alex Young, a NASA scientist involved in solar research.

Wednesday's eclipse will block the sun in highly populated areas, including West Africa.

In Togo, authorities imported hundreds of thousands of pairs of special glasses that consumers cleared rapidly from shelves in the capital, Lome. Villagers in the interior will not have access to the eyewear and officials called on them to stay home.

"Please, do not go out and keep your children indoors on solar eclipse day," Togo's minister for health said in a message broadcast on state television.

Day will turn to night in the eclipse's route and a corona — the usually invisible extended atmosphere of the sun — will glow around the edges of the moon as it comes between the earth and the sun.

"Imagine if your hair was to stand up from static electricity, that's kind of what the corona looks like all around the sun," NASA's Young said. But the corona's light can burn eyes.

In Ghana, where the effect will be particularly visible, people were spending about $1 for "solar shades" — paper-rimmed glasses with dark plastic lenses that resemble eyewear used for viewing three-dimensional movies.

NASA said Turkey will be the best spot to view the eclipse, and tens of thousands of tourists were expected along the Turkish Mediterranean coast. Astronomers from NASA and Britain's Royal Institute of Astronomy were also going to an ancient Roman amphitheater in Turkey to view the phenomenon.

The moon is expected to first begin blocking out the sun in the morning in Brazil before the eclipse migrates to Africa, then on to Turkey and up into Mongolia, where it will fade out with the sunset.

Superstition will follow around the world, as it has for generations.

One Indian paper advised pregnant women not to go outside during the eclipse to avoid having a blind baby or one with a cleft lip. Food cooked before the eclipse should be thrown out afterward because it will be impure and those who are holding a knife or ax during the eclipse will cut themselves, the Hindustan Times added.

Total eclipses are rare because they require the tilted orbits of the sun, moon and earth to line up exactly so that the moon obscures the sun completely. The next total eclipse will occur in 2008.

Prosecution rests in Enron trial

BY KRISTEN HAYS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

HOUSTON — Federal prosecutors rested their fraud and conspiracy case Tuesday against former Enron Corp. chiefs Kenneth Lay and Jeffrey Skilling, but the defendants appeared undaunted after almost two dozen witnesses bolstered the government's claim that they had committed crimes at the energy trading company.

"We're looking forward to getting on the stand and getting our case out there — the positive case," Lay told reporters outside the federal courthouse in Houston.

Their defense teams will begin presenting their case in the premier trial to emerge from Enron's rubble on Monday, but other witnesses are likely to be overshadowed by the main event, when Lay and Skilling take the stand.

"We are anxious to get our story told," said lead Skilling lawyer Daniel Petrocelli, his client at his side.

Prosecutors declined comment, as is customary during a high-profile trial.

Lay and Skilling will enter the defense phase a little lighter because U.S. District Judge Sim Lake approved a government request to drop several charges against them for which it had presented no evidence. Two counts of securities fraud and one count of lying to auditors pending against Skilling were dropped, leaving 28 criminal counts against him, and a single count of securities fraud against Lay was dropped, leaving six in his case.

Lake denied routine requests from the defense for acquittal.

The dropped counts against Skilling stemmed from allegations the former chief executive signed a fraudulent quarterly report submitted to the Securities and Exchange Commission; lied about Enron's health during a first-quarter earnings conference call; and signed a statement to auditors that vouched for fudged financial statements.

The count against Lay that was dropped grew from allegations the company founder lied to analysts about Enron's finances during a conference call.

Lay also faces a separate case related to his personal banking. In one count of bank fraud and three counts of lying to banks, prosecutors allege he obtained $75 million in loans from three banks and then reneged on an agreement with the lenders that he wouldn't use the money to carry or buy Enron stock on margin. That case will be tried without a jury before Lake, beginning while jurors in the current Enron trial begin what are expected to be lengthy deliberations.

Prosecutors say Lay and Skilling repeatedly lied about the energy company's financial health when they allegedly knew accounting maneuvers propped up an image of success.

The government built its case on the recollections of witnesses, audiotapes of conference calls with Wall Street analysts and videotapes of employee meetings. It often lacked tangible proof such as e-mails, documents or notes. Neither Lay nor Skilling was known to use e-mail at Enron.

The two men counter that the only fraud at Enron was committed by a few employees who skimmed money for themselves from secret scams, including former Chief Financial Officer Andrew Fastow. They say they did nothing wrong, and attribute Enron's failure to negative publicity coupled with a loss of market confidence.

The government presented 22 witnesses since testimony began Feb. 1, which included eight former executives who have pleaded guilty to crimes, one with an immunity deal, one who settled regulatory allegations and three who said they voiced concerns about financial peril that fell on deaf ears.

"The government has really made its case that what Lay and Skilling said and were told in private were very different than what they were doing and saying in public. It really comes down to that," said Michael Wynne, a former federal prosecutor who has observed much of the trial.

Robert Mintz, another former federal prosecutor who has followed the trial, said each prosecution witness is intended to be viewed as a piece of a puzzle that when put together paints a "very damning portrait of these two defendants."

But, he said, "This is still a difficult case for prosecutors because there is no 'smoking gun' evidence. There are no bombshells. There's nothing that conclusively ties the defendants to a scheme to defraud the investing public," he said.

Petrocelli said the government's lineup offered only "glancing blows" and the defense case will present "hard facts."

"We're scrambling to get witnesses to testify, and it has not been easy," Petrocelli said. "You'll probably see more than the government called."

High school students get lessons on bankruptcy

BY DENISE LAVOIE
AP LEGAL AFFAIRS WRITER

WORCESTER, Mass. (AP) — Karyn Menard can make up to $140 a day in tips as a waitress, but before she knows it, most of that money has been spent.

After taking a field trip to U.S. Bankruptcy Court on Tuesday, Menard, 18, has decided to start saving some of her tips.

"I need to start putting it away," said Menard, one of 70 students from South High Community School in Worcester who completed a financial literacy program by going to bankruptcy court to see how drastic debt can become.

As part of the five-week program, attorneys, accountants and bankruptcy court employees gave students in-classroom lessons on how to buy and finance a car, how to use credit cards wisely and the importance of saving money for a nest egg.

During the trip to Bankruptcy Court, the students watched a mock creditors' meeting with a debtor, "Michael S. Spender," who had racked up $83,000 in debt — more than three times his annual salary.

The students also heard from bankruptcy attorney Janet E. Bostwick about how filing for bankruptcy court protection could ruin their credit for years and hurt their ability to buy a car, rent an apartment or get a job.

Menard, who works part-time at a Friendly's restaurant, said she never used to think much about how she spent her money. Now that she's looking into getting a credit card or a debit card, she's glad she learned how easy it is to sink deeply into debt.

"Now I look at where it all goes," said Menard, who said she plans to start putting half of her tips into a savings account.

Menard is just the type of teenager the financial literacy program was designed for, according to organizers.

The program was developed by the Boston Bar Association and the U.S. Bankruptcy Court for Massachusetts as a way of teaching young people how to manage their finances just as they are beginning to make financial decisions for themselves such as buying cars.

"Credit card companies are targeting kids younger and younger," said Ellen Carpenter, past president of the bar association.

"Bankruptcy filings by people under 30 are growing. There's a real need to start working with people this age," she said.

The bar association started the financial literacy program in Boston one year, and this year expanded it to include Worcester. Next year, organizers hope to offer the course to students in Springfield.

U.S. Bankruptcy Court Judge Joel Rosenthal said that of the approximately 25,000 people in Massachusetts who filed for bankruptcy court protection last year, about 4,000 of them were under 30.

"You've got to live within your means," Rosenthal told the students. "If you don't, it is inevitable that it will catch up with you."

Thai Vu, 17, said he had a personal experience recently that taught him how easy it is to get into debt. He said he overdrew his checking account by $1 and ended up owing $70 in fees and penalties.

"This course opened my eyes about how many people get into debt," he said. "It taught me how to manage my money better."

Bolten to replace Card as chief of staff

BY DEB RIECHMANN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Bush calls Joshua Bolten, his new chief of staff, a "creative policy thinker." In more informal circles, he's known as a budget cruncher who cruises around on a motorcycle.

After getting a two-week crash course from former White House chief of staff Andy Card, who is stepping down after more than five years in the job, Bolten, 51, will take on the arduous task of directing the West Wing and deciding who gets the ear of the president.

"He's a man of candor and humor and directness who's comfortable with the responsibility and knows how to lead," Bush said Tuesday in an Oval Office announcement.

Bolten, a discreet man generally viewed as a pragmatist who likes to get things done, said he is succeeding Card, but won't be filling his shoes.

"Andy cannot be replaced," Bolten said.

"I'm grateful for Andy's willingness to stay on for a couple of weeks to help break me in, and then I'm anxious to get to work," Bolten said.

Bolten has broad experience, having worked on Capitol Hill and Wall Street, on the White House staff, and for nearly three years as the director of the Office of Management and Budget.

"Josh is a creative policy thinker," Bush said. "He's an expert on the budget and our economy. He's respected by members of Congress from both parties. He's a strong advocate for effective, accountable management in the federal government."

Bolten has broad experience and has been with Bush from the moment he assumed the presidency.

Bolten joined Bush's administration on June 30, 2003, when he was sworn in as the director of the Office of Management and Budget, a Cabinet-rank position. After Bush's announcement of Bolten's new duties, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist called Bolten a "master of the budget and economic issues."

Bolten was budget chief when the government ran its three largest deficits ever, including the record $413 billion shortfall in 2004 — though the economy and years of decision-making by presidents and lawmakers were largely to blame.

He always insisted that the most important gauge was how the deficit compared to the size of the U.S. economy. Most economists agree that is the most telling way to understand how serious a problem the deficit is, but it is a measure that also made the red ink seem less severe because the economy is so huge.

Before sitting in the budget director seat, Bolten was assistant to the president and deputy chief of staff for policy at the White House.

Outgoing chief of staff Andy Card, left, looks on as President Bush speaks in the Oval Office of the White House on Tuesday.

From March 1999 through November 2000, Bolten was policy director of the Bush-Cheney presidential campaign. Previously, he was executive director of legal and government affairs for Goldman Sachs International in London.

While a government worker, Bolten sheds his bureaucratic tendencies when he straddles his motorcycle. In 2004, Bolten was with members of the Rolling Thunder motorcycling group who revved their engines on the White House driveway during a visit with Bush. The group, dedicated to POW-MIA issues, was holding its annual "Ride for Freedom" rally in the capital that day.

Bolten also worked for former President George H.W. Bush, serving for three years as general counsel to the U.S. Trade Representative and one year in the White House as deputy assistant to the president for legislative affairs.

Supreme court questions military trials

BY GINA HOLLAND
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court sharply questioned plans for military trials for foreigners held at Guantanamo Bay, in a historic argument Tuesday over President Bush's wartime powers.

Several justices seemed deeply concerned that the government had gone too far in its plans to hold a special trial for Osama bin Laden's former driver on a conspiracy charge.

Some were downright indignant over the Bush administration's claim that a new federal law bars the high court from ruling in the case of Salim Ahmed Hamdan.

Hamdan's lawyer, Neal Katyal, said that the president "has the keys to the federal courthouse" under the law.

Without Chief Justice John Roberts, a conservative Bush nominated last year, the argument seemed lopsided against the government. Roberts voted in the case on a lower court and had to recuse himself. Justices Antonin Scalia and Samuel Alito hinted their support for the administration.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy questioned Solicitor General Paul Clement about the legal safeguards for the trials. Justice Stephen Breyer also asked what would stop the president from holding the same type of trial in Toledo, Ohio, not just at the military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Hamdan claims the military commissions established by the Pentagon on Bush's orders are flawed because they violate basic military justice protections.

"This is a military commission that is literally unburdened by the laws, Constitution and treaties of the United States," Katyal told justices.

Scalia rebuffed a recusal request by five retired generals who support Hamdan's arguments. In a letter to the court, the generals had asked Scalia to withdraw from participating in the case because of remarks he made in a recent speech in Switzerland about "enemy combatants." Speaking at the University of Freiberg in Switzerland on March 8, Scalia said foreigners waging war against the United States have no rights under the Constitution.

Alito, the newest justice, suggested the court should wait until Hamdan's trial is over to allow him to question whether charging him with conspiracy violates the laws of war, as Katyal contends.

Katyal brushed aside the contention.

"The government has had four years to get their charges together on Mr. Hamdan," he said.

Hamdan, a Yemeni who was captured in Afghanistan in November 2001, is charged with conspiracy to commit war crimes, murder and terrorism. He claims he is an innocent father of two young daughters and worked as a driver for bin Laden in Afghanistan only to eke out a living for his family.

The Bush administration says he is a trained terrorist who should be tried for war crimes before a special military commission, the first such trial since the aftermath of World War II.

Roberts left the bench before arguments began and won't be involved in the decision.

Hamdan is among about 490 foreigners being held as "enemy combatants" at the military prison in Guantanamo Bay. Ten of the men, including Hamdan, have been charged with crimes.

Justices ruled two years ago that the government could detain enemy combatants but not shut off their access to U.S. courts.

In this follow-up case, justices are considering the government's plans for trials before a panel of military officers.

Hamdan's trial was halted last fall when a federal judge ruled that he could not be tried by a U.S. military commission unless a "competent tribunal" determined first that he was not a prisoner of war under the 1949 Geneva Convention.

Spanish media aids pro-immigrant rallies

BY GILLIAN FLACCUS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — The marching orders were clear: Carry American flags and pack the kids, pick up your trash and wear white for peace and for effect.

Many of the 500,000 people who crammed downtown Los Angeles on Saturday to protest legislation that would make criminals out of illegal immigrants learned where, when and even how to demonstrate from the Spanish-language media.

For English-speaking America, the mass protests in Los Angeles and other U.S. cities over the past few days have been surprising for their size and seeming spontaneity.

But they were organized, promoted or publicized for weeks by Spanish-language radio hosts and TV anchors as a demonstration of Hispanic pride and power.

In Milwaukee, where at least 10,000 people rallied last week, one radio station manager called some employers to ask that they not fire protesters for skipping work. In Chicago, a demonstration that drew 100,000 people received coverage on local television more than a week in advance.

"This was a much bigger story for the Latino media," said Felix Gutierrez, a professor at the University of Southern California's Annenberg School for Communication. "If the mainstream media had been paying better attention, there would not have been the surprise about the turnout."

Adrian Velasco first learned of House legislation to overhaul immigration policy on Los Angeles' Que Buena 105.5 FM. Over two weeks, the 30-year-old illegal immigrant soaked up details about the planned march against the bill from Hispanic TV and radio. On Saturday, he and three friends headed downtown.

"They told all the Hispanic people to go and support these things," Velasco said. "They explained a lot. They said, 'Here's what we're going to do.'"

One of those doing the most talking was El Piolin, a syndicated morning show radio host who is broadcast in 20 cities.

Students from Huntington Park High School march in a demonstration Friday, March 24, 2006, to protest legislation cracking down on illegal immigrants.

Poll: Americans see, hear more profanity

By Jocelyn Noveck
Associated Press

(AP) — This is a story about words we can't print in this story. You probably hear these words often, and more than ever before. But even though we can't print them — we do have our standards — we can certainly ask: Are we living in an Age of Profanity?

Nearly three-quarters of Americans questioned last week — 74 percent — said they encounter profanity in public frequently or occasionally, according to an Associated Press-Ipsos poll. Two-thirds said they think people swear more than they did 20 years ago. And as for, well, the gold standard of foul words, a healthy 64 percent said they use the F-word — ranging from several times a day (8 percent) to a few times a year (15 percent).

Just ask Joe Cormack. Like any bartender, Cormack, of Fort Dodge, Iowa, hears a lot of talk. He's not really offended by bad language — heck, he uses it himself every day. But sometimes, a customer will unleash the F-word so many times, Cormack just has to jump in.

"Do you have any idea how many times you've just said that?" he reports saying from time to time. "I mean, if I take that out of your vocabulary, you've got nothin'!"

And it's not just at the bar. Or on TV. (Or on the Senate floor, for that matter, where Vice President Dick Cheney used the F-word in a heated argument two years ago.)

At the community college where Cormack studies journalism, students will occasionally inject foul language into classroom discussions. Irene Kramer, a grandmother in Scranton, Pa., gets her ears singed when passing by the high school near her home.

"What we hear, it's gross," says Kramer, 67. "I tell them, 'I have a dictionary and a Roget's Thesaurus, and I don't see any of those words in there!' I don't understand why these parents allow it."

For Kramer, a major culprit is television. "Do I have to be insulted right there in my own home?" she asks. "I'm not going to pay $54 a month for cable and listen to that garbage." And yet she feels it's not a lost cause. "If people say 'Look, I don't want you talking that way,' if they demand it, it's going to have to change."

In that battle, Kramer has a willing comrade: Judith Martin, who writes the syndicated Miss Manners column.

"Is it inevitable?" Martin asked in a recent interview. "Well, if it were inevitable I wouldn't be doing my job." The problem, she says, is that people who are offended aren't speaking up about it.

"Everybody is pretending they aren't shocked," Martin says, "and gradually people WON'T be shocked. And then those who want to be offensive will find another way."

Perhaps not surprisingly, profanity seems to divide people by age and by gender.

Younger people admit to using bad language more often than older people; they also encounter it more and are less bothered by it. The AP-Ipsos poll showed that 62 percent of 18 to 34-year-olds acknowledged swearing in conversation at least a few times a week, compared to 39 percent of those 35 and older.

More women than men said they encounter people swearing more now than 20 years ago — 75 percent, compared to 60 percent. Also, more women said they were bothered by profanity — 74 percent at least some of the time — than men (60 percent.) And more men admitted to swearing: 54 percent at least a few times a week, compared to 39 percent of women.

"That word doesn't even mean what it means anymore," says Larry Riley of Warren, Mich.

Bartender Joe Cormack sits in his room in Iowa. Like any bartender, Cormack hears a lot of talk, and says he's not offended by bad language.

Kadima party projected to win Israeli vote

By Josef Federman
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Israeli TV stations predicted that acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's Kadima Party would win Tuesday's election by a smaller margin than expected, but it still could form a coalition to carry out his plan of drawing Israel's final borders.

Olmert has said his party, founded by Ariel Sharon before his debilitating stroke, only would govern with parties supporting his plan to separate from the Palestinians and establish Israel's borders by 2010. He has not said which ones he prefers as partners in a center-left coalition.

In Gaza, Hamas said it would resist Olmert's border plan.

A spokesman for Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said the PLO is ready to negotiate immediately the implementation of the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan with the next Israeli government.

Elections officials said voter turnout was 63.2 percent, the lowest in the nation's history. A low turnout was seen as hurting Kadima and favoring small, ideological parties. Final results were expected Wednesday.

The Labor Party, which favors a negotiated settlement with the Arabs, came in a strong second.

The hard-line Likud, which dominated Israeli politics for three decades and opposes Olmert's plan to withdraw from much of the West Bank, came in a distant fourth, according to polls broadcast immediately after voting ended.

The surprise of the evening was the strong showing by two parties that had been considered marginal.

The hard-line Israel Beitenu Party of Avigdor Lieberman, who advocates redrawing Israel's borders to exclude Israeli Arabs, was expected to win 12-14 seats, making it the third-largest party in parliament. Opinion polls predicted Lieberman's party would win 10-15 seats.

Lieberman was the chief aide to former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. His party, which would like to redraw Israel's borders to include more Jews and exclude more Arabs, has two representatives in the current Knesset.

The Pensioners' Party, not represented in the current parliament, was expected to win 6-8 seats, and Kadima officials said the party was a natural coalition partner.

Surgeons remove two fetuses from infant

By Paul Garwood
Associated Press

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — Surgeons operated on a 2-month-old Pakistani girl Tuesday to remove two fetuses that had grown inside her while she was still in her mother's womb, a doctor said.

The infant, who was identified only as Nazia, was in critical condition following the two-hour operation at The Children's Hospital at Pakistan Institute of Medical Science in the capital, Islamabad, said Zaheer Abbasi, head of pediatric surgery at the hospital.

Abbasi, the chief doctor who led the operation, said the case was the first he was aware of in Pakistan of fetus-in-fetu, where a fetus has grown inside another in the womb.

"It is extremely rare to have two fetuses being discovered inside another," Abbasi told The Associated Press, adding that he did not know what caused the medical abnormality.

"Basically, it's a case of triplets, but two of the siblings grew in the other."

The baby comes from Abbotabad, about 30 miles north of Islamabad.

She is the fifth child of a woman in her 30s, who was at the hospital to be with her daughter. Her father works in the Arabian Gulf.

Abbasi said surgeons removed the two partially grown fetuses, totaling about two pounds, which had died at about 4 months.

Other fetus-in-fetu cases have been reported elsewhere in the world. A report in a June 2000 issue of the U.S. journal Pediatrics called such occurrences rare and estimated their rate at about 1 per 500,000 births.

Fidgeting in classroom may help students

By Chris Williams
Associated Press

ROCHESTER, Minn. — The fidgety boys and girls in Phil Rynearson's classroom get up and move around whenever they want, and that's just fine with him.

In fact, stretching, swaying and even balancing on big wobbly exercise balls are the point of this experimental classroom. The goal is to see if getting children to move even a little can help combat childhood obesity.

As an added perk, there's some splashy technology, too — laptop computers, a wireless network and iPods.

The data aren't in yet. But anecdotally, Rynearson and Superintendent Jerry Williams say the fourth- and fifth-graders are more focused on the curriculum than their peers in a comparison group in an ordinary classroom. And there are fewer distractions than in the traditional setup — where a lot of time is spent trying to get children to sit still.

"Sitting isn't bad," Rynearson said. "But I think kids need to move."

The classroom is the idea of Mayo Clinic researcher Dr. James Levine, also the mastermind of an office of the future that encourages more movement from desk-bound white-collar workers.

For schoolchildren, Levine says, "My dream was kids shooting hoops and spelling," much like the American basketball game of "H-O-O-R-S-E."

But the classroom at Elton Hills Elementary School doesn't go quite that far. Instead, the school replaced the standard desks and chairs with adjustable podiums that allow students to stand, kneel on mats or sit on big exercise balls.

To measure movement down to the last muscle twitch, sensors are on their legs. Levine will calculate how many calories the students are burning in the new classroom compared with their old, traditional classroom.

The concept is interesting, said Alicia Mong-Stahlberg, executive director of Action for Healthy Kids, a coalition of more than 40 health and education agencies.

While the experiment sounds "like a fun way to learn," she says that at best it would be one of many changes in diet, exercise and lifestyle students need.

"Will this really help with the obesity epidemic?" she said. "That's the area that we don't know enough about."

In Levine's experiment, a lot of the movement depends on technology. During a nutrition lesson, a group of students stood at their desks following along on their computers. Meanwhile, another group downloaded an audio file of Rynearson reading a book; a third group listened as their iPods walked them through a spelling test.

The students had mixed views of the experiment. Stephanie Mueller said she liked working on the computers, especially being able to repeat parts of lessons. And the freedom to move is "better than sitting down all day," she said.

However, another student, Mariah Matrious, didn't much like it. "I don't like standing up," she said. "My legs get tired and I like sitting down."

The experiment is due to run through the end of the school year. Rynearson said he plans to add old-fashioned desks and chairs for any students who want them.

Allison Radke perches on an exercise ball in her elementary school classroom that lacks chairs.

More human remains found near WTC site

By Amy Westfeldt
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Construction workers cleaning toxic waste from a vacant skyscraper near the World Trade Center site have found more bone fragments and human remains, officials said Tuesday.

The city medical examiner's office plans to extract DNA from the latest remains to be recovered from the former Deutsche Bank building and try to match it against a database of the 2,749 people killed at the trade center on Sept. 11, 2001, said Ellen Borakove, spokeswoman for the city medical examiner's office.

Fire Department crews had inspected the building in the months following the attacks, but construction workers clearing gravel off the rooftop found 10 bone fragments there last fall.

The new remains were found in recent weeks by crews doing a more thorough cleaning before construction workers begin dismantling the building in June, said John Gallagher, spokesman for the Lower Manhattan Development Corp.

Some victims' family members said forensic experts should search the 41-story building again.

"I'm not trying to malign the construction workers, but this is not what they're trained to do," said Diane Horning, whose son was killed at the trade center and has filed suit to remove trade center debris from a landfill where victims' remains were found.

More than 40 percent of the victims at the trade center have not been identified. The medical examiner's office is storing more than 9,000 unidentified remains and hope that more sophisticated DNA technology can allow for identifications in the future.

Borakove said that two human remains were found Jan. 27 on the 38th floor of the building.

"They are definitely human," Borakove said.

The Deutsche Bank building looms over visitors as they take in the sight of Ground Zero.

Government working to reduce greenhouse gases

By Matthew Komoto
The Poly Post (Cal Poly-Pomona)

POMONA, Calif. — University of Southern California and Yale University studies are most recent to confirm situations are worse than they seem as human-made greenhouse gases continue to climb and as government bodies at state and federal levels "pledge" to make things different.

The Energy Information Administration sites greenhouse gases as compounds in the Earth's atmosphere that absorb radiation from sunlight that is reflected from the Earth's surface and contain the heat between the Earth's surface and the atmosphere.

Industry increases man-made greenhouse gases known as fossil fuels, not only causing a rise in temperature levels but also smog and air pollution and the resulting deaths.

Currently, California state health officials blame air pollution for aggravating 9,000 deaths every year with lung cancer, asthma attacks and heart attacks.

USC has recently proposed that these estimations might be twice to three times as high, their recent study relied on new findings of soot measurements and re-evaluated patterns of death in hundreds of Southern California neighborhoods.

A new study by Yale University that will be published in April will argue that there "is no safe level of ozone."

Far below the ozone levels considered hazardous by the Environmental Protection Agency, this Yale study will show mortality rates from even low levels of ozone and air pollution.

The New Haven Register reported on this study, showing minuscule but constant air pollution and ozone increase that led to an average of three additional deaths for every 1,000 people in areas they studied in Connecticut.

The answer by many states and organizations centers on the auto industry.

Hybrid automobiles are becoming more popular and more available even with luxury car lines like Lexus.

However, passenger vehicles only produce 10 percent of nitrogen emitted in the air of Los Angeles according to the South Coast Air Quality Management District in 2003.

Trucks and buses produce the majority of emissions, consisting of 44 percent of nitrogen that affects air quality in Los Angeles from mobile vehicle pollution.

But passenger vehicles continue to be the center of attention, followed by modifications to power plants.

"America has a history of loving its cars," said EPA Administrator Stephen Johnson. "By cleaning up our fuels and vehicle exhaust, EPA is paving the road toward a cleaner environment and healthier drivers."

With high levels of pollution, California has the toughest vehicle emission requirements in the nation.

By 2009, cars and light trucks must reduce emission by 25 percent and SUVs by 18 percent.

Although California produces less than 1 percent of the world's greenhouse gas, according to the South Coast Air Quality Management District, Los Angeles has continued to be a leader in smog for the United States.

Houston, New York and Atlanta trail behind.

Los Angeles was listed at No. 1 with smog levels in 2003 at 140 percent and particulate matter levels over 180 percent when compared to average levels from other urban cities.

Many cities besides those in California are pledging initiatives against pollution, most notably and recently up north with Oregon and Washington.

ABC Channel 3 News reported that Oregon has recently adopted the tough California standards to regulate automobile emission levels despite heavy opposition from the auto industry.

An Oregon County circuit court judge has recently been challenged but upheld Oregon Governor Ted Kulongoski's adoption of Californian standards.

Washington also is planning to reduce greenhouse gases but through other methods.

A rally last Friday in Seattle highlighted their plans with guest speaker former Vice President Al Gore.

"The United States has really messed up on this, but let me tell you about Seattle," said Gore in referring to the initiative that other states are taking to reduce greenhouse gases and bolstering Seattle residents and rally attendants.

The Seattle Post Intelligencer reported that this rally was for the U.S. Mayors Climate Protection Agreement, an organization in Seattle that is spearheading an effort along with 219 cities to meet the Kyoto Protocol of reduced pollution at specified levels by 2012.

The final plan is due in September, but right now Seattle's main plans are to impose tolls and higher prices for parking lot taxes to discourage driving, zoning changes to keep stores, jobs and homes closer and pedestrian friendly, and increasing bus service and building more bike lanes.

Survey finds rise in foreign applicants to U.S. grad schools

By Robert Kleeman
Daily Texan (U. Texas)

AUSTIN, Texas — Foreign applications to U.S. graduate schools increased 11 percent, according to a 2006 survey of the University of Texas and 149 other universities.

But the survey, conducted by the Council of Graduate Schools, which represents the research and academic interests of graduate students nationwide, found that foreign applications were down 23 percent from 2003, despite the increases. The numbers began to decline in 2002, following heightened visa restrictions after Sept. 11, 2001, such as lengthier security checks and application processes.

Council spokesman Stuart Heiser said the increase was the result of an effort between graduate schools and the State Department to make the United States more accessible to foreign students.

Pat Ellison, UT admissions associate director, and her office tabulated estimates of the number of applications. She could not be reached for comment.

A fall 2005 report by International Student and Scholar Services, however, showed an increase in international students for the first time in three years. Of the 4,546 international students enrolled at the University, 2,870 are in graduate school. Korea is the largest contributor, with 873 students enrolled from that country, and India, the next largest contributing country, had 711 students.

Jerry Wilcox, director of the International Office, said University practices such as reimbursing students for the $100 information system fee charged by the Department of Homeland Security have aided UT's international student growth.

"It's modest, but $100 is $100," he said. "Every little bit helps."

Heiser said an international student's contact with the government is the first key to attracting them to an American graduate school.

"Trying to get a visa from the government is the first impression they have of authority in this country," he said. "The United States generally has the reputation of having the best graduate programs in the world, so the perception of quality is already there."

UT President Bill Powers previously said his administration's goal, aside from curriculum reform, will be diversifying the campus culturally and academically. He has spoken about his goal of offering alternatives to the top 10 percent rule, extending accessibility of admissions to students in foreign countries and expanding recruitment efforts, which include sending UT students to high schools around Texas to promote the University.

Mary Gonzalez, co-director of the UT Latino Leadership Council, said diversifying the campus will take an equal balance of recruiting minority and international students.

"It's important to learn about the experiences of people outside of the U.S.," Gonzalez said.

'Break' may bring disease

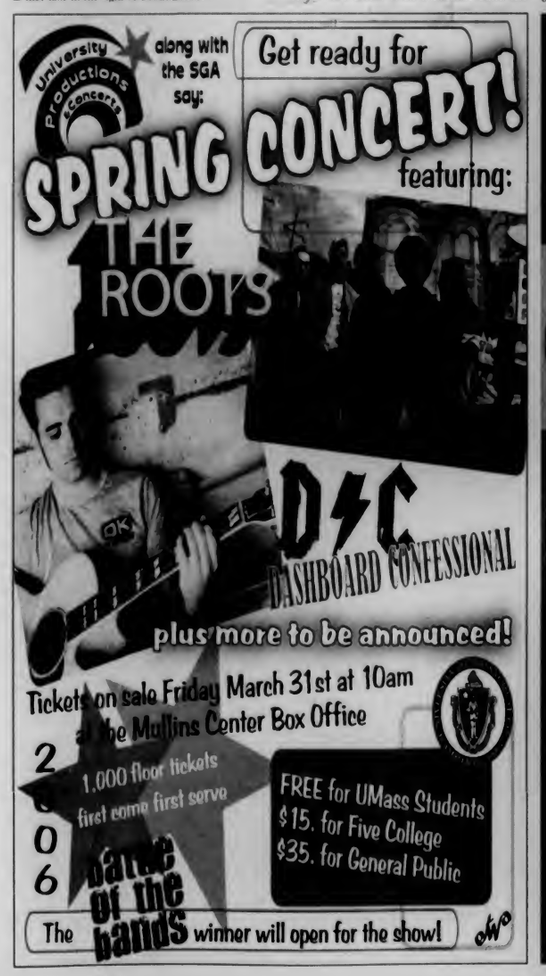
cured, though, with antibiotics, Reynerson said.



Herpes is yet another common STD. It is not limited to only infection of the genital area, however.

"Cold sores are one type of herpes," Reynerson said. "You can get genital herpes from oral herpes." This might result in painful blisters, she said. Although no cure for herpes exists, antiviral medications can lessen outbreaks of the infection, according to the CDC Web site.

Gonorrhea can also be spread through oral sex, Reynerson said. The infection can be acquired in the throat. In 2004, more than 330,000 cases of the disease in the United States were reported to the CDC. Certain antibiotics can cure gonorrhea, but drug-resistant strains of the disease are increasing in the United States, according to the Web site.

Primary and secondary syphilis are other STDs that can be spread through contact with syphilis sores, which can occur in the mouth. In rare cases, syphilis can be spread through oral sex. However, generally there must be a cut in the mouth in order for the infection to spread this way, Reynerson said. Sours from syphilis cause an increased risk in acquiring an HIV infection, according to the CDC Web site. Syphilis can be cured with antibiotics.

Hepatitis B is another serious infection that can potentially be transmitted through intercourse, Reynerson said. Vaccines are available to prevent this disease.

Are we running away from life or are we living life? This is a question one of my friends posed to the rest of us during our Argentinean road trip that we started three days ago in Buenos Aires; now we are more than 1,000 miles away in a beautiful ski resort town called Bariloche. The idea of this road trip came about after I saw "Motorcycle Diaries," which chronicles the life of a young Che Guevara taking a road trip across South America on a motorcycle with a friend.

I came to Argentina soon after watching that movie and me and a guy I met here decided to undertake something similar, but in a car. Later on, two others got added to our adventure, and now here we are, in the Andes, horseback riding and trekking, living life the way it is supposed to be lived, or are we?

One of my friends thinks we are just taking a break until real life starts: grad school, bills, adulthood, responsibilities, marriage, etc. But I think that this is a very important and integral part of life, being spontaneous, getting out there, having adventures and just doing what you want.

Yes, life will change its tempo soon after we return to our homes and try to carve some sort of niche in this world, but I can safely assume that I will be a more educated person after all these adventures I have undertaken during my college career. Not to say that someone who has not done all this is not a better or intelligent person, but for me personally, these are things I need to do, languages I want to learn and experiences I want to have.

Very soon I will be in a graduate school somewhere sitting in a library, reading about chapters and chapters on case law or God knows what, and I can think back and remember the time I drove 4,000 feet up in to the Andes or saw the most beautiful tango performance in a Buenos Aires square.

So, for all of you who are sitting thinking whether or not to take that internship in Nicaragua or go learn Chinese in Shanghai, do it. Do not care about how dangerous a place might be or how much it would set you back. Trust me, the experience and great times you will have will be more than enough repayment.

Do not care about how dangerous a place might be or how much it would set you back. Trust me, the experience and great times you will have will be more than enough repayment.

I know that it is the biggest cliché, and every article I have read about studying abroad or traveling tells you that you should do it. It will open up your mind and you meet new people but it's a cliché because it is true. I could write a book on all the experiences I have had in Argentina alone. The amount of beauty in this country and the sense of responsibility and national unity and fervor in the people are amazing. As a political science student, and also as a human being, I have learnt new lessons here everyday and will continue to do so, I am sure until my stay ends here.

I have learnt a lot about myself as well and seen myself through different spectrums. That has helped chalk out my near future for me, and I am sure a lot of you are also wondering what the next step should be after college. I say work some extra hours or borrow some money from the parents, get out a globe, close your eyes and spin it and go wherever your finger lands. That is how I chose to spend a year in Turkey and I had the most amazing time of my life. This world has way too much to discover, and you cannot do that sitting online or in a classroom.

Especially for people from the United States, it is very important to get out there and discover the world and see what different people think about the country and its government and its actions. Only then can you really use your vote to matter. The United States is highly involved in world affairs, yet Americans are not very big on foreign travel. Especially considering the fact that the dollar is worth a decent amount in most countries, and no, Americans are not spat on or hated all over the world.

Most people throughout the world will see you as who you are, yes with some prior (mis)conceptions about your country, but it is your job to correct them and prove them wrong. It is not going to happen just by them watching Hollywood films and Fox TV shows. So, what are you waiting for? STA travel is right around the corner. Go book that flight.

The gulf between high and low achievers

MAD COW MEETS BIRD FLU

Andrew Freeman

In January I visited Milton Academy to observe several history classes. I was astonished at the dynamism of the classes, which strongly emphasized student participation. The high school students were assertive and confident, rather than tired, bored, quiet or cowed as I remember so many of my classmates in high school were.

Milton Academy is one of the most prestigious private high schools in the country. It has spacious athletic grounds, rolling fields and well-maintained buildings. The quality of instruction that I observed there was superb. It is also one of the most expensive, charging over $27,000 for tuition. Milton Academy, along with the other elite private prep schools and colleges, represent one extreme of our educational system. Those who have access to this type of education tend to be the richest, best educated individuals in our society.

The media loves to track the process of the most privileged, competitive students, and their often obsessive parents. A March 3 article in The New York Times followed the difficulties of New York professionals enrolling their children in the city's private preschools. Some parents had to write admissions essays describing their toddlers, and tuition can exceed $10,000.

This intense competition continues right through to college. Across town, Amherst College Dean of Admissions, Tom Parker, in an interview with Business Week said students at the top of their rankings "have been shot out of a cannon. They are super achievers. They've had access to eight or 12 advanced placement courses" and they have SAT scores exceeding 750 out of 800.

There is another extreme to American education. Public schools in poor urban areas serve students with few resources and many problems. Many students have one or no parents, let alone two parents obsessing over their education. Some have recently immigrated to the country and lack English skills. Others are tempted to drop out of school, and live in neighborhoods marked by crime and gangs.

There is an incredible gulf between these two extremes. They are segregated by class, they are segregated by neighborhood or location and they are segregated by futures. The people who can spend over $10,000 on yearly tuition for their children can almost certainly ensure their children's future success and prosperity.

The parents working multiple jobs, or raising children without a husband or wife, often have too little time to take an active role in their children's education. Moreover, their limited budgets cannot purchase the exclusive instruction, SAT prep, athletic training, or any of the other commodities that wealthy parents arm their students with.

We have an ideal of a meritocracy in education, where excellence is rewarded and the best and brightest are advanced. Presumably this ideal is inherently fair, because the playing field is level and only natural intelligence and hard work will distinguish us. The ideal of the meritocracy underlies much of our educational system, and it is one of the few similarities between these two extremes. In particular, meritocratic concepts drive the standardized testing movement, as well as attempts to cut off options other than college.

There is an incredible gulf between these two extremes. They are segregated by class, they are segregated by neighborhood or location and they are segregated by futures.

With the passage of the No Child Left Behind Act, states have instituted standardized testing in English and math, such as the MCAS here in Massachusetts. The meritocratic idea was to create a baseline exam that can be used to judge the knowledge of students and the success of their schools; underperforming students would be kept back, and underperforming schools would be reformed or closed.

Unsurprisingly, elite exam schools and public schools in the wealthy suburbs excel, and many others falter. In my class at a Boston exam school, not a single person who took the MCAS scored less than proficient. What these exams do, from the MCAS to the SAT, is intensify the gulf between high and low achievers.

Because of these high stakes exams, many schools have reworked their curriculums to focus on what is being tested, math and English. According to a study by the Center on Education Policy, reported in The New York Times, 71 percent of school districts in this country have cut time spent on history, languages, arts and sciences. These students will be even more disadvantaged when competing with students who are exposed to all these subjects.

Another problem with our educational system is that most of our resources and our admiration go toward college education, rather than alternatives like vocational training. President Bush's education budget proposal for 2007 will lower federal vocational education funding from nearly $1.3 billion to zero.

The Bush administration wants to eliminate this funding because they believe the courses do not "contribute to academic achievement or college enrollment," according to the Assessment of Vocational Education published in June 2004. The purpose of vocational education is not to prepare students for college or academic achievement, but for skilled trades, and eliminating it reduces nonacademic opportunities.

There is a great gap between the two extremes, and most of us fall into it. But the system is set up by those at the top, the Yale students like Bush and Kerry, and we accept it. Our beliefs in meritocracy compel us to leave more low-scoring individuals behind, while keeping them from nonacademic careers they might excel in.

Amused by my fellow man's misery

Schadenfreude always seems to get a bad rap whenever people discuss their feelings. For those not in the know, schadenfreude is a gift the German people have given to the rest of the world. The word comes from the German "schaden" (damage or harm) and "freude" (joy), and it refers to the pleasure you may experience from someone else's misfortune. Among polite circles, schadenfreude comes with a negative connotation, but those circles are probably full of teetotalers anyway.

John Gruenenfelder

I used to think such an activity was worth frowning upon but I've since come around. I've seen the light, as it were. Of course, as with any pleasurable act, the key is in moderation. The way I see it, the world has more than enough villainy to go around and so, in an effort to add some balance, we should all try to find some bit of enjoyment from those global ills.

The negative connotation associated with schadenfreude likely comes from the dehumanizing aspect. After all, you are getting a good laugh from something unfortunate happening to someone else. But, like a sharp wit, as long as you reserve your enjoyment only for those who are most deserving, or for when the moment is simply too funny not to laugh, you should be safe. Employed properly, schadenfreude will make you feel better and not curb your desire to see humanity better off in the future, provided you had such a desire before laughing.

So, how do you find somebody deserving? Despots and dictators offer a wealth of good opportunities. The "how the mighty have fallen" theme always works very well. For example, when Saddam Hussein was found hiding in a dirty hole, I'm sure more than a few people got a good laugh from that. His humiliation becomes our schadenfreude.

An even better example occurred recently with the death of the former president of Yugoslavia, Slobodan Milosevic. Defiant to the end, his death from a heart attack alone in his prison cell is not particularly funny, perhaps even a little sad. But speculation abounds that he may have accidentally killed himself by self-administering a drug in the hope that it would make him appear too sick to stand trial. Only it apparently worked a little too well. Now that's schadenfreude.

Even people who have been dead for a long time can still elicit the occasional good feeling by virtue of the enormity of their soul crushing evil. I am referring, of course, to Adolf Hitler. A very bad, and now very dead, man.

As you may have heard, he recently shot an old man in the face. Depending on your attitude towards Mr. Cheney, that sentence alone may have brought forth a little chuckle.

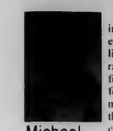
As Mel Brooks once said, "Rhetoric does not get you anywhere, because Hitler and Mussolini are just as good at rhetoric. But if you can bring these people down with comedy, they stand no chance." Brooks's musical number "Springtime for Hitler" is spot on. If Hitler were some unknown, the song would still be funny, but the fact that he was so evil turns that humor into schadenfreude.

Humiliation of the dead and evil are not the only sources of joy. Sometimes simply being mean is enough. Our illustrious Vice President, Dick Cheney, is a great example.

As you may have heard, he recently shot an old man in the face. Depending on your attitude towards Mr. Cheney, that sentence alone may have brought forth a little chuckle. Had this man died or if Mr. Cheney were a really nice guy, well, this wouldn't be funny at all, but, he didn't and Cheney's not.

In fact, Cheney seems to revel in the darkness that follows him around. He's almost certainly never going to be president, so he doesn't need to be liked and he knows it. And so we have the makings of delicious schadenfreude.



Popular culture has made schadenfreude a staple of modern comedy in this country. "Seinfeld," for example, consists almost entirely of enjoyment through the misery of others. "That '70s Show" is also particularly good at this, though not quite as focused on it as "Seinfeld" was.

These shows demonstrate that your own friends can be an excellent source of schadenfreude. Sometimes it's not comedy, either. Viewing the show "Cops" could be considered an act of schadenfreude, though it does blur the line between misery of viewer and misery of the viewed.

So go forth and have a good laugh at your friend's expense. You'll feel good about it. If your friendship is true, your friend will eventually come around too, and if your friend wants to know why you would laugh, just explain that you are practicing the act of schadenfreude. Do remember to be a good sport when your turn comes up. After all, if you get upset, you're probably ruining somebody else's schadenfreude, and nobody wants that.

Sincerely hoping society will accept homosexuals

Michael Toomey

Following the usual indecent proposal, an emotional amalgam not limited to shock, outrage and even vengefulness is typically par for the course. The mental run through of the inherently rhetorical confrontation with our verbal assailant usually conforms to the following; "The nerve of that doofus. What did s/he take me for? Do I look like that type of person? I should've knocked his/her butt all the way to..."

Perhaps I shouldn't generalize, but that's for the most part a good description of my thought process, which was rendered useless in the latest repulsing request I received. Instead of providing the catalyst for a self-righteous tirade, the unsettling proposition I was dealt evoked sincere empathy, unveiling a glimpse of a hidden perspective.

Before I go on, the setting for this interaction must be addressed. After countless Saturday nights spent with my buddy Daddy Yankee and a bag of Doritos, I decided to take matters into my own hands and put up a personal ad on the Internet, in the hope of finding a lovely young lady who could fit well into this tradition. The retellings of the awkward, often horrifying dates friends have suffered through by way of this social device served as my disclaimer to getting too optimistic about prospective online romance.

I'll make no pretense in subverting my initial reaction, asking myself if my picture had perchance captured me at a rather flamboyant angle?

After completing my account, I put my feet up both literally and figuratively, and left my virtual game to work its magic. The next morning, I received an e-mail informing me several messages had been sent to my account. Excited, imagining what kind of person she'd be, young and preppy; older, akin to an '80s groupie, or exotic akin to Yamila Diaz Rahi?

In sheer disappointment I was greeted by several messages sent by gay men, offering without any need for reciprocation, to perform lewd acts on me. I'll make no pretense in subverting my initial reaction, asking myself if my picture had perchance captured me at a rather flamboyant angle?

As that hurdle was knocked over without a faltering step, my mind jumped to a historical connection with its roots in not too long ago. I recalled my experiences perusing the personals on Craigslist, looking for announced DC parties to crash, where I was shocked to find innumerable gay postings where the guys let it be known that they'd unconditionally please anyone, regardless of looks, interests or values.

While the Craigslist ads were impersonal, which allowed me to notice the trend without any real connection to it; the responses my personal page received were specified bids at my affection (of some kind or another) leading to a more thoughtful interpretation. At face value, these offers might be construed as representing the wanton promiscuity of the gay man, a sign of the coming apocalypse to millions living west of Pennsylvania. But that interpretation in no way speaks to what this interactive desperation truly represents beyond its potentially disturbing surface.

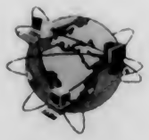
Under the controlled anonymity that is the World Wide Web, persecuted in some way by virtually every facet of society, the gay man finds a venue for his debased identity that is both remarkably safer and easier than trying to decipher the sexuality of a cute guy who might beat him to death for the approach. The Internet's gay population boom is significant enough to infer a societal hypocrisy no one wants to face.

While there are grand gestures made towards the homosexual, in the form of Oscar winning films that influence a viewer's mind until the stop at McDonald's after the show; or in the form of anemic activism, where a signature on a petition represents the universality of politically correct thought rather than real tolerance, we still abhor gay people.

Where lesbianism has been bastardized into a marketing ploy, being a gay man has nothing in the way of pop culture support to help establish a niche. With the only immediate exception being the Abercrombie periodical, there's nothing that aggrandizes male homosexuality in our culture but rather derogations galore.

All too often, men use "gay" as the ultimate abasement, synonymous with impotent and disgusting. Our government doesn't acknowledge the rights of its gay population as equal to those of heterosexuals. He's the boogeyman, the lusty pervert who will make random come-ons to any dude in sight, waiting in public bathrooms to watch your child. We simply don't understand homosexuality, but in spite of our misapprehension it's garnered a distinctly bad rep.

In a parallel universe, that didn't propagate hypersexualism to fuel an endlessly futile pursuit, the gay hot topic would be concluded with a verdict of apples and oranges. But as we live today, where having a surplus of attractive sex partners is just shy of being priority number one, our focus has sharpened to this consuming passion.



There's the argument that homosexuality challenges our conventions to the point where it might bring up the uncomfortable "what if" question, and since that's so hard to deal with in our rigid constraints, we've just got to snuff it out. Does this maybe echo the "if you spot it, you've got it" dictum?

I don't know, but it certainly seems that the apparent frailty of the norm we subscribe to has led us to practically exile the gay people of our nation. We have them hiding on the Internet, huddled in little packs scavenging their way through life, alone and obsolete. They are not people in the eyes of the law and they are not people you'd sit next to on the bus. Of course, some will tell me "My friends, like, would never like, judge someone for something like that," but these are the people who have never hugged a gay guy, have never made lewd jokes to lesbians, haven't a clue really.

Most of America supports gay tolerance simply because diversity and tolerance are totally en vogue this season. What I want to know is when is being genuine going to come into fashion so we can get all of this old fear out of the collective closet?

Some women want equality in sports

Zach Oelschlegel

With the Masters only a week away, golf season is roaring up. Tiger Woods will naturally be the favorite to win, there will be plenty of glorifications of the heralded golf course that is Augusta National by CBS, and no doubt there will be some mild protests outside Augusta for the club's refusal to have women make up any of the 400 or so members inside the gate.

However, the story concerning women inside the clubhouse shouldn't be the lack of female members inside Augusta National, but the possibility of women playing and competing in the Professional Golf Association (PGA) Tour, which currently consists only of men. Rising star Michelle Wie has received exemptions to play the tour, as has Annika Sorenstam.

Male golfers are crying foul over how women should be playing in their own tour since they have a well-established one (the Ladies Professional Golf Association Tour, or LPGA), complete with majors and some star players. French golfer Jean Van de Velde even went as far as threatening to play in the Women's British Open this year as women are now allowed to qualify for the men's championship, but not vice versa.

The short of it, truthfully, is that it is ridiculous for these men to complain about the possibility of women playing in the PGA. The PGA would lose no sanctity from allowing women to be on their tour, as on the contrary it would only further ensure the best competition plays. Men who cringe at the idea of women playing in the PGA Tour usually have little knowledge of sports business.

To begin with, the PGA Tour should not be looked at as a men's league, but an elite league. It should be the place where the best golfers play, regardless of sex. It just so happens that nearly all of the top golfers in the world are men.

When a relative freak of a woman comes into the scene like Michelle Wie, and is capable of doing the things previously only men could do in terms of driving distance, it's downright outrageous to say she must play with inferior players, in an inferior league, with inferior money paid to winners, because she is a woman.

On the flipside, the women's LPGA Tour is not an overall elite league but a women's elite league. The two tours have different target markets, in that people who tune in to watch LPGA events aren't necessarily trying to watch elite golf, but rather women's golf.

It is no secret that women make inferior golfers in comparison to men, due to the fact they cannot hit the ball as long and hard as most men. The LPGA is therefore an inferior league than the PGA, as even men from smaller tours like the Nationwide would still likely be able to smash the players on the LPGA if allowed. All of this is a non-issue, however, since the market dictates that women's golf, not necessarily the best golf, is what people want to see.

With this in mind, when a relative freak of a woman comes into the scene like Michelle Wie, and is capable of doing the things previously only men could do in terms of driving distance, it's downright outrageous to say she must play with inferior players, in an inferior league, with inferior money paid to winners, because she is a woman. The purpose of the PGA is to show the best golf, period, so the sex of the player shouldn't matter.

You might look at other leagues and say women aren't entering those, and I'd say it's because women make far worse overall athletes. It's not rocket science; we've all been to gym class and can remember who the dodgeball targets were. Golfers like Wie and Sorenstam are two of the first who just might be able to hang with the fellas in what up until now has been an entirely male dominated sports world.

It's not sexist in the least to maintain an opinion of general female inferiority in terms of athletics. On the flipside, it's absolutely ridiculous to keep women down in an inferior league if they are capable of more. If PGA Tour members want to call themselves the best in the world, they need to allow the best to play on their tour.

Domestic espionage has a name

Cameron MacPherson

Much of what you are about to read is classified under the National Security Act (15.USC.50). The reason why I even have access to this information, and the reason why I am able to say it without fear of prosecution is one, I do not work for the government and two, everything you read here has been available for many years, if one knows where to look. Even Wikipedia has an article on what I am about to tell you (with only limited information).

My hope is that I can shed light on the nature of this program as the major media outlets are either unable to find concrete information on the subject, or political pressure to release only general details has hindered them from releasing full stories. I am an information technologies specialist as a profession, and I subscribe to circles, along with colleagues of mine, that serve as information hubs which operate behind highly secured connections.

Now that this information is presented, you might want to formally meet the program that is spying on you.

Oftentimes information is posted and shared that pertain to this program, among others run secretly by branches of the United States government. This information domestic spying program isn't just domestic. It involves nearly every member state in NATO and a handful of other nations.

In the late 1990s, in response to difficulty tracking fledgling cyber criminals online, the FBI created a secret program to use pentrap devices and network tunnels through a computer's TCP port to scan and read every e-mail sent within this country at the ISP level. The program was called Carnivore. It existed in secret until a federal court judge wanted to see relevant information in a civil case when an ISP (Internet service provider, in this case Earthlink) sued to prevent the use of Carnivore on their networks.

Officially, Carnivore was set to expire in 2005, but in reality, Carnivore has been obsolete since the late 1990s. This is because in the late 1990s (as all of this information is highly classified dates aren't able to be verified), DARPA (Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency) created a new computer system with the help of IBM. It uses cell-computing technology to make a new generation of supercomputers, code named quantum.

With highly advanced voice-to-text technology, these computers are able to decipher nearly limitless amounts of data and scan them for strings of keywords. All information regarding these strings is highly speculative but they probably include words such as president, Allah and bomb, within realistic conversational scenarios to avoid misunderstandings or deliberate attempts to raise flags.

The quantum supercomputers and voice recognition software are used in conjunction with listening posts set to decipher GSM,9000 and TDMA phone networks nearly worldwide, as well as the remnants of Carnivore to track Internet mail that is not encrypted. Now that this information is presented, you might want to formally meet the program that is spying on you.

Surveillance has a name. Echelon. Run out of the National Security Agency, Echelon has been running in secret since the final years of the Clinton administration. That's right this wasn't Bush's pet project.

But what does this really mean? FISA and the Patriot Act, which it gave birth to, were drafted after Echelon's debut. One might think they are cover legislation to make it seem like the information obtained through Echelon was obtained within the boundaries of the law.

In order to protect this country from extreme threats, perhaps extreme measures must be adopted. The question about whether Echelon exists for our benefit, or if it is simply yet another tool in Big Brother's article, is a question that you and I, the American people, must decide. Maybe now you are informed enough to make your decision.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

LACKING BELIEF IN GOD DOES NOT EQUAL A RELIGION

I am writing because I am very disappointed in David Lawrence's column from March 28th. Mr. Lawrence – a Catholic – spends a great deal of time describing what an atheist believes, atheism's relationship with science and atheists in general. Unfortunately, Mr. Lawrence is terribly wrong.

The problem Mr. Lawrence has is that he lumps all atheists into a group – labeled, conveniently, atheists – and then proceeds to pretend that this label is appropriate and accurate and an effective means of identifying a group of people. This is foolish; atheism is not a belief, period.

Now, I'm sure Mr. Lawrence, with his years of experience as a Catholic, has had plenty of opportunity to study atheism, but for those less-informed, let me describe the atheist faith, as I was an atheist for seven years and am very familiar with the basic tenants.

To qualify as an atheist – and I'm relying solely on my dictionary here – one must disbelieve in the existence of gods. That would be a lack of belief; atheism requires no faith in a godless universe, but merely the lack of said belief.

Dogs are atheists. Rocks are atheists. Babies are atheists, and, if you want to get technical, a lot of Buddhists are atheists. Scientologists are atheists, and hell, I'll bet there are a few Catholic priests that are atheists. All agnostics are atheists (ask an agnostic if he believes in a god: if he says anything except yes that qualifies him as an atheist). Humanists are atheists. There are a lot of atheists in the world.

The starting part of all this, is it means that scientism (Lawrence's religion of science) has nothing in particular to do with atheists; there are many atheists that think that science is the best means to explain the universe (just like there are a lot of Catholics who do, too). Unfortunately, there are many atheists who think that the world exists because an evil space alien has implanted the souls of creatures across the galaxy in human bodies (yes, Scientology).

Being an atheist is just like being able to say of oneself, "I do not have wings." Religious belief is not the default; religion is an addition to an otherwise atheistic human mind. Being an atheist doesn't require specific beliefs, or opinions or organizations. They aren't like Catholics: they don't have churches, a Bible, an evangelism program, rites of passage, songs or anything of the sort.

There are atheists that do things like that – and those familiar with religious debate in general recognize them as anti-theists – but atheists are not collective. They are not an organization or a belief system. They are just regular people that don't have the additional religious belief trait.

To remind Mr. Lawrence: you yourself are like an atheist. To you, the Hindu deities, the Greek myths, the Roman Pantheon and the literally thousands of gods and goddesses that have existed over the millennia are all false. To you, there is only one God. To the atheist, there are none. That is all that separates you from an atheist: you disbelieve in nearly all gods, and the atheist simply disbelieves in them all.

BRING BACK CALIFORNIA'S GREATEST ASSET

We write to make Daily Collegian readers aware of a burgeoning national issue of particular relevance to college students nationwide.

Harvard Professor Marshall Ganz once said, "Young people have an almost biological destiny to be hopeful."

One can only hope that he was right in these times of an unpopular war, allegations of corruption at the highest levels of government and natural and man-made disasters of monstrous proportions. College students have a particular need for issues and causes that inspire hope, with the potential of bringing out the best in our society. There is such an issue on the horizon that we want to share with you, hoping you will become involved.

Over 80 years ago, Congress made a terrible mistake by authorizing the building of a dam and reservoir in Yosemite National Park's Hetch Hetchy Valley. The Valley was the slightly smaller twin sister of the magnificent Yosemite Valley, with comparable booming waterfalls, soaring granite walls and rock formations, wildflowers and a free flowing Tuolumne River.

Since the drowning of the Valley, lovers of national parks nationwide and others have clung to the hope that the Valley might be restored to its natural splendor, described by John Muir as "a grand landscape garden, one of Nature's rarest and most precious mountain temples."

In 1987 President Reagan's interior secretary, Donald Hodel, made a serious proposal to eliminate the reservoir and restore the Valley. Again Congress disappointed, by refusing to fund the necessary studies.

In 2003 UC Davis graduate student Sarah Null published a Masters thesis demonstrating that the reservoir could be removed with virtually no loss of the consumable water delivered to the San Francisco Bay Area. The Null work caught the eye of Sacramento Bee editorial writer Tom Philp.

Philp authored a series of editorials advocating restoration, receiving a Pulitzer Prize for his efforts. Meanwhile, two democratic state legislators asked Gov. Schwarzenegger to look at restoration feasibility.

In September 2004, the national environmental organization Environmental Defense issued its own study, supported by technical and legal reports prepared by outside experts, and reached the same conclusion as UC Davis's Null. In late 2004, the Schwarzenegger administration agreed to review all existing and pending studies relating to restoration.

In September 2005 our organization, Restore Hetch Hetchy, released its feasibility study reaching conclusions consistent with UC Davis and Environmental Defense. Our study included a section examining aspects of restoration of the now drowned magnificent valley, concluding that within 10 years, substantial revegetation and return of wildlife would occur.

The Environmental Defense and Restore Hetch Hetchy studies included documented cost estimates ranging from $.5 to 1.5 billion; surely a small price for a second Yosemite Valley. Former Secretary Hodel believes that these costs can be paid through private and philanthropic donations.

The issue has received significant media attention, including coverage by California newspapers and TV stations. Nationally and internationally, this bold idea has recently caught the attention of Time Magazine, Jim Lehrer's NewsHour, The U.K. Guardian and The Boston Globe.

So, what can you do? Visit www.hetchhetchy.org and become a student member of Restore Hetch Hetchy for only $20, educate yourself, your friends and your family about this growing and exciting national issue, start a Restore Hetch Hetchy chapter at UMass. Most of all, fulfill that biological destiny to be hopeful.

'Caché' lends tension and anxiety

By PETER FRISMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

"Funny Games," written and directed by Michael Haneke, could be considered a treatise against violence in the media and its impact upon the viewers – one of the elements of cinema indelible by the filmgoer or filmmaker. No matter what film techniques are employed to counteract the influence of screen violence upon the impressionable viewer, the underlying message manages to enter the viewer's subconscious and the only solution is not to depict the offensive material. Likewise, in his latest film "Caché" (English title "Hidden"), Haneke explores another element omnipresent in film – its intrinsic aspect of voyeurism.

Georges Laurent (Daniel Auteuil), his wife Anne (Juliette Binoche), and their son Pierrot (Lester Makedonsky) receive vaguely intimidating parcels on their doorstep. The packages consist of videotapes showing nothing but shots of their residence for hours on end, and occasionally a childish drawing accompanying it (childish drawings are always somewhat creepy with unsettling surroundings, according to the same principle that makes clowns scary.) In keeping with the rule that the victims in thriller movies receive no help from law enforcement, the police refuse to investigate the case unless someone is physically assaulted. Soon Georges finds a lead on the tapes, which leads him to the apartment of an Algerian man (Maurice Bénichou) whom Georges had wronged in his youth. The tape of their confrontation reveals Georges's actions to Anne's staunch disapproval, and soon they are at odds with each other – which was perhaps the intention of the perpetrator. Even in the face of this newfound animosity, Georges is more determined than ever to find out who has been threatening his family.

Haneke's reputation for minimalist, austere filmmaking is more apparent than ever, his latest film consisting largely of incredibly long takes of stationary shots mimicking the cinematography and editing of the mysterious videos. The film is so stagnant compared to more typical films of its type that the audience grows uncomfortable, expecting the action sequence that Hollywood has trained them to expect. Does the unbearable tension eventually find a release? Indeed it does, in three seconds of footage so shocking it practically eclipses the scenes before it. As disturbing as this scene is, the viewer will probably welcome the release. He should savor it while he can, as there is no such release for the rest of the film.

The film's opening scene, employing an opening title sequence that is both innovative and why-hasn't-anyone-done-this-before simple, is revealed to be the contents of the first videotape delivered to the Laurent family. From this introductory forewarning that any scene could turn out to be media within the film in the tradition of Cronenberg's "eXistenZ," to its last stationary shot that reveals key information that can easily go unnoticed by an inattentive viewer; the audience is reminded of the inherent distance from which the characters onscreen can be viewed.

While most modern films strive to establish the fourth wall in an attempt to distract the viewer from the fact that she is not actually sharing the consciousness of a semi-omniscient spectator to the film's events, "Caché" emphasizes the distance between screen and audience.

Just as "Funny Games" forced the producers and consumers of film to confront the ugly truth that some censorship of film may be necessary, "Caché" explores the cracks in the façade of every fourth wall. Such a study presents an interesting conundrum for cineastes and pedestrian audiences alike to mull over.

When lying is permissible: the dark side of certain relationships

Lovers Only
Hannah Drake

Although it's generally better to be honest, in the dating world there are certain times when it's much more appealing to fib. This week, Rob and I will reveal the dark side, the little lies girls and guys tell, and what we really mean — because guys are known to be jerks, but girls can be equally as ily.

She says: The most common fibs I've told guys are "I have a boyfriend" and "I don't want a relationship right now." The first one is my favorite, a guy's hitting on me, I'm either not interested or I'm currently interested in someone else, and I know I'll probably never see him again. He can't argue, I don't have to explain why I don't want to give him my number, I don't feel like a jerk and I didn't hurt his feelings. I use the second one when I know the guy is going to know I don't really have a boyfriend and I'll probably see him again. Again, he can't argue, and on the surface I'm not really rejecting him. It's a version of "it's not you, it's me." But what I really mean is, "I don't see you that way," or, "I like someone else."

If I'm not into you but you're into me and I like you as a friend, at some point I'll tell you you're just like a brother to me, or I'll try to set you up with one of my friends, and if you IM me all the time and I don't like it I'll give you the most minimal responses possible, and sometimes I just won't answer.

Other things I'll say maybe we'll hang out, and I keep putting it off, I don't really want to hang out with you. If someone calls me when we're hanging out, and I don't pick up, and then I get a voicemail and I don't listen to it, then it's another guy who I'm interested in. And if I say I'll call you and I don't, I forgot or just didn't want to. I will always call or hang out with a guy I really like.

He says: First a disclaimer. To the dudes at UMass, I'm not selling you out. But after this article you might have to work harder to slide some of those lines past the girl sitting next to you.

So if you've been reading this column for the past two weeks you already have some good insight into the male mind. Girls, you know what we really mean to you when we tell you, "I don't know what I want right now," or when we just don't talk to you as much as you'd like. And if you don't, it means you are pretty hot, a good hookup, (or both) and we're having too much fun with the other girls that we don't want to commit to one. Instead, we drop that line to keep you interested, keep the hookups coming from you and to keep them coming from a few other girls.

It's not a buddy that is calling us when we're hanging out with you and we don't pick up the phone. You girls always seem to call at the most inopportune times.

The number of girls we've slept with? Always a lie.

But for most of us, the most lies seem to get pried out of us in a relationship. Ladies, it's so much easier to lie to you than it is to tell the truth. Here's the thing about us guys, we think way after we act. By the time it comes up, we figure we've already done something dumb enough to get you mad, so lying about it isn't going to change how mad you are. Sure, we know you'll be madder if you find out we lied, but that's the risk involved. You have to look at the risk-reward ratio here from our perspective. If we come out and tell you the truth, it spells certain doom for us. However, if we lie to you about it, there remains that sliver of hope that we can get away from the mess unscathed. The problem with us guys is that we keep messing up, almost like clockwork, and therefore we have to keep telling lies.

And as a tribute to my good buddy, when you hear the line "you're the hottest girl at this party," most likely he is lying (I realize this may be a burn to some girls). However, just realize that if that line is being used on you, he is generally interested in you enough to give it a try.

Conclusion: As you can see, guys and girls aren't so different when it comes to sketchy behavior. The only difference is girls won't straight-out lie. We'll fib, do the little-white-lie stuff. Guys will go all out with the fallacies.

Sharon Stone shows financial instinct with second chance at role

By BOB IVRY
THE RECORD (HACKENSACK, N.J.)

Sharon Stone built her entire career on a fraction of a second of screen time.

You have to admire that.

So why does Stone insist, to this day, that it was her superior acting in "Basic Instinct" that opened the door to fortune and fame, and not the most famous peek-a-boo in cinematic history?

There's no doubt Stone was good, very good, as suspected killer Catherine Tramell. So good, and so friendly, in fact, that a sequel, the imaginatively titled "Basic Instinct 2," blows into theaters Friday.

Legend has it that Stone slapped "Basic Instinct" director Paul Verhoeven when she found out just how much anatomy she shared with moviegoers in her interrogation scene with Michael Douglas.

As she told reporters: "I knew that we were going to do this leg-crossing thing, and I knew that we were going to allude to the concept that I was nude, but I did not think that you would see my vagina in the scene."

Yeah, right.

"Later," Stone goes on, "when I saw it in the screening, I was shocked. I think seeing it in a room full of strangers was so disrespectful and so shocking, so I went into the booth and slapped him (Verhoeven) and left."

Verhoeven did her a huge favor. As far as movie moments are concerned, Stone's "hi-there" cannot be topped. Make a list, any list, of the most sublime micro-scenes from cinema's ancient times to today — and Stone beats them all by a wide margin:

—"Frankly, my dear, I don't give a damn."

—Dil drops her drawers in "The Crying Game."

—"I'm ready for my close-up, Mr. DeMille."

—Bluto's ladder falls backward in "Animal House."

—"I'm melting! Melting!"

—The wine bottle breaks in "Notorious."

—"Stel-la!"

—"You talkin' to me?"

—Phoebe Cates' pool exit — the first time — in "Fast Times at Ridgemont High."

—"She's my daughter! She's my sister! My daughter! My sister!"

—"You either surf or you fight."

—"This is the start of a beautiful friendship."

—Maya explains why she likes Pinot in "Sideways."

Ads for "Basic Instinct 2" acknowledge — and pay homage to — Stone's warm and welcoming manner. They show the apparently surgically enhanced blond bombshell in an unmistakable want-to-see-my-underpants pose — if she's wearing any this time.

You gotta love it. She's 48 and the mother of two. She's trying to survive in Hollywood, and at her age, when you've got it — even if you paid a surgeon to supply it — you're contractually obligated to flaunt it.

It used to be, starlets of a certain age mellowed into more sedate roles or hid their advancing decrepitude from culture vultures by vanishing altogether from the screen. Stone, ever the brazen iconoclast, appears without clothing in "Basic Instinct 2." She goes full frontal, in fact, a dish she shared recently with reporters in Tel Aviv, where she was making an appearance to promote International Women's Day. (Though it's doubtful such an event needs promotion, there's no doubt to millions of moviegoers that Stone is a woman.)

"People are just sitting there going, like, 'I don't care what she's saying. I don't care what she's saying. I just want to know is she getting naked? Is she getting naked in that movie? Is she naked? Nude? Nude? Naked? Do I see her boobies?'" she said. And she laughed. Why not? She's reportedly been paid $14 million to show it all again.

That's Sharon Stone for you. You have to hand it to her. She laughs a lot ... all the way to the bank.

Sharon Stone, the award-winning actress, grabs an ice pick and sets herself for the second chance to play the role that first put her on the map in "Basic Instinct 2."

Oh yeah yeah yeah, New York's flamboyant trio has done it again

By JIM FARBER
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

Bands that hit it big with their debut CD usually set their sound in stone.

Not so for New York's most flamboyant group, the Yeah Yeah Yeahs. On "Show Your Bones," their new second CD, the trio shaded their sound significantly.

The Yeahs' 2003 debut, "Fever to Tell," worked off raw power alone: all concussive drums, searing guitars and screeched vocals. Melody and nuance be damned. Think the middle section of "Whole Lotta Love" writ large.

But for "Bones," the Yeahs sneaked in more tunes, slackened the pace some and gave their arrangements a subtle buff.

"It's a laser beam versus a hurricane," the band's singer Karen O explains. "We're just not the same people we were before."

According to Ms. O, the last three years have seen them go from a band of early-20s kids who viewed the group as a spontaneous lark, to an internationally established rock brand. O herself became an off-beat sex symbol, one recognized enough to be asked by Playboy to pose (she turned them down). She also became a style icon, inspiring FLLEgirl magazine to create a how-to guide for ripping off her look.

At first, such florid attention created an identity crisis for the band. "You start with something simple," the singer explains, "and not at all serious, and then everyone starts taking you very seriously. But you have to go with it. It became a catalyst for real change."

In fact, O and the others had already gone through plenty of changes by that point. Having grown up in an upper middle class family in Bergen County, N.J., the singer, born Karen Orzolek, hooked up with drummer Brian Chase at Ohio's arty Oberlin College. She met guitarist Nick Zinner after she transferred to NYU. As they began to solidify their sound, the group decided to remain a stripped-down trio, with no bass. It was the same m.o., chosen around the same time, by the White Stripes and the Kills, forming something of a "no bass" trend-ette in rock.

"For us, it had everything to do with the dynamic of the three of us," O explains. "We were preserving that special energy."

The band's stoked sound made them stand out from the start. Their primal style seemed to spring straight from the unconscious. In concert, O became a banshee. "I can't tell you what I'm doing when I'm up there," she admits. "After the show, if I see live footage of myself, it's shocking — even for me. I'm in the zone."

The group managed to nail that unfettered style in the studio on "Fever to Tell." Fans worried about whether the group could maintain such a raw sound, and their outsider status, while working with a major label (Interscope). But the album sold nearly 600,000 copies without sacrificing the band's cred.

Still, the Yeahs felt the need to put some distance between their first album and whatever came next — especially if they were going to create something equally fresh.

First, says O, they took time off to work on individual projects, none of which will see the light of day anytime soon. Then, this New York-identified band took the risk of relocating 3,000 miles away to Los Angeles.

"I didn't have any friends out here so I wasn't in any way distracted by a social life," O explains. "That led to a lot of growth and change for me personally. We all began to take music more seriously."

Some critics have cited a different influence on the new CD: Siouxsie and the Banshees. O pleads ignorance. "I feel bad because if she hears this she might think I'm ripping her off and not admitting it," she says. "But I've never been educated in her (music)."

However different the new music may be, O's lyrics remain a rush of barely coherent outbursts. Again, she uses words like they were more notes in the song. "I listen to the music and try to follow it phonetically," she says.

To O, the new album has coherent themes which address "leaving or having been left. It's an album about transition. It definitely has more to do with changes in myself than anything with love."

However many changes she and the band have been through — and however much they've matured — O feels the Yeah Yeah Yeahs have hardly mellowed. "There's more control now," she qualifies, "but not enough to be boring."

Karen O sings away during a performance in New York with her band, The Yeah Yeah Yeahs.

Cutting the purse strings: Parents get help from financial advisers

By KAY HARVEY
KNIGHT RIDDER NEWSPAPERS

Most parents make sure their kids know what they need to about sex by the time they're 20.

But money management?

Now, there's a tough subject, parents of children in their 20s and 30s are saying.

In fact, the financial advice baby boomers told researchers they need most is: "How to help my children become more financially savvy."

That could be because adult children ages 25 and 26 get an average $2,323 per year in financial support from their parents, according to a University of Michigan study. The tab has grown with a trend of "boomerang kids" heading back home to live.

For their parents, there can be more at stake than the TV remote control.

Adult children have become the biggest threat to their parents' retirement security, says Craig Brimhall, a vice president at Minneapolis-based Ameriprise Financial, which commissioned the New Retirement Mindscape survey of baby boomers.

"Parents feel ill-equipped," he says, to change adult kids' money habits, boomer parents said in the survey. That poses a hard question: "Who's going to do it?" Brimhall asks. He and other financial advisers aren't sure exactly how to help. But they know their role is to help clients avoid jeopardizing their financial futures.

"It's not up to us to tell them what they shouldn't be doing, but to ask them, 'Should you be doing that?'" says Brimhall, vice president of retirement and wealth strategies at Ameriprise.

Now, wait a minute here. Boomers' kids have it rough, according to a new book, "Strapped: Why America's 20- and 30-Somethings Can't Get Ahead" (Doubleday) by Tamara Draut. The phenomenon has less to do with poor money management than with skyrocketing housing prices, college tuition increases, depressed wages, increasing health costs and credit-card debt, Draut says in her book.

Brimhall doesn't totally buy that theory. But to whatever degree it's true, he says, there's another big factor. Over recent decades, most Americans' expectations have changed. He sees few young people putting off owning a car, making do in a small apartment or setting their sights on a modest starter home.

"Luxuries have become our necessities," he says. That reality can get parents — and grandparents — who subsidize their offspring caught in the middle. "They're stuck with the job of sorting out the difference between wants and needs."

While some people can afford to give thousands of dollars a year away, he sees many others who will retire with little money to spare. "If you give too much away now, are the kids going to take care of you later?" he asks.

He suggests it's better not to bank on it.

The number of households with children older than 18 still living there grew by 70 percent in the first four years of this decade, according to the 2005 MacroMonitor study for the financial services industry. Living at home while going to college isn't the issue, Brimhall says. It's when they should be off and on their own and still are bunking at home.

It's best, of course, to teach children smart ways to save and spend before they're 20, he says. But if they haven't learned by then, he urges parents to try teaching those lessons whenever they're needed.

"If kids get into trouble on their loans, I don't think parents should necessarily bail them out," he says. "Think about what values you want to pass on — a pattern of consumption or a work ethic?"

There's a time to use tough love. It could sound something like this:

—"I'm your parent. Not your banker."

—"They're your credit-card bills. I'm not going to bail you out."

—"You're trying to be independent. That might mean suffering a little bit."

Financial advisers don't want to judge their clients' values, he says. "But we do want to challenge their thinking."

HELP THEM HELP THEMSELVES

Here are some tactics parents can use to help themselves and their children financially — at any age, if need be:

Don't be an ATM. There are loans for college, cars and homes but none for retirement. Don't put your own financial security at risk to help your kids.

Learn to say no. By always giving your kids money or bailing them out, you are enabling a dependency.

Choose what you'll pay for. Consider helping kids only with certain expenses, such as education, but not such nonessentials as high-priced clothes, CDs and dining out.

Teach basic skills. Arrange a time to work together on balancing a checkbook and managing bills.

Show them how to save. Set up a custodial IRA for children when they get a job to help them save money and watch it grow.

Create a family-match program. Match every dollar your kids save with a dollar of your own in a separate account.

Be a good role model. Most kids learn spending habits from their parents. Be sure you practice what you preach.

Dana's death shocks racers

By Mike Harris
Associated Press

The scarred, twisted remains of Paul Dana's No. 17 Panoz race car lay under a tarp Monday at Homestead-Miami Speedway, the biggest clue in a mystery that may never be solved.

Dana died Sunday after sustaining what officials described as "multiple trauma injuries" in a two-car crash during a warm-up for the season-opening IRL IndyCar Series race at Homestead.

The league plans to look into the possible causes, but the only thing the computers in Dana's car — or the videotape of the crash — is likely to tell them is that the rookie driver with all of three IRL races under his belt kept his foot on the gas until a few tenths of a second before impact.

As for why, the only person who could likely have answered that question was Dana himself. Ed Carpenter's spinning car, which had crashed seconds earlier and glanced off a concrete wall, had nearly come to a halt when Dana suddenly appeared, flying off turn two on the 1.5-mile oval.

It appeared Dana never slowed, bearing down like a 200-mph missile — two hours later, he was pronounced dead. While Dana said he was 30 and listed a 1975 birthday in media guides, there were reports that he was actually 32 and born two years earlier.

The wreck left everyone wondering whether Dana even saw the caution lights flashing along the speedway walls, or heard the words of his spotter, who team officials say tried to warn of the danger ahead.

For years, drivers with little experience — and sometimes little talent — have managed to find rides at the top level of open-wheel racing by bringing family money or a sponsor to the table. And in a sport where big dollar sponsors are few and far between these days, buying a ride has become just another part of the game.

Dana wasn't rich, but he found a way to live his dream of racing cars. He worked at a variety of jobs, including mechanic, racing instructor and marketing representative to pay his way up the racing ladder.

He even wrote about auto racing for several national magazines, including Autoweek and Sports Illustrated.

But Dana, a savvy and glib young man who didn't get serious about racing until he was 20, had found sponsorship in Team Ethanol that he could bring to a team. That's how he got his ride with Rahal Letterman Racing, one of the top teams in the IRL.

He did have some success in the Indy Pro Series, the stepping-stone series to IndyCar, winning one pole and one race and finishing second in the championship in 2004. But anybody in open-wheel racing will tell you it's a big step up from Indy Pro to IndyCar.

Working with Team Ethanol, Dana got an IndyCar ride in 2005 with Hemelgarn Racing.

At the Homestead opener, he finished a career-best 10th. But only 10 cars were running at the end of that race and Dana was eight laps behind the winner.

At the next race, in Phoenix, Dana was passed by the leaders about every eight laps on the one-mile oval before retiring after just 33 laps with a mechanical problem.

He skipped the road race at St. Petersburg, but traveled to Japan for the next oval race, finishing 20th in the 25-car field when his suspension broke after just 56 of 200 laps.

Then, Dana crashed during practice for the Indianapolis 500, breaking his back and missing the rest of the season.

That was the resume he brought to the elite team co-owned by longtime racing star Bobby Rahal and television talk show host David Letterman. Bringing his own primary sponsor with him, Dana replaced highly regarded and considerably more experienced Vitor Meira in the third Rahal Letterman car this season.

Unlike the death of much-beloved NASCAR superstar Dale Earnhardt in the 2001 Daytona 500, Dana's tragic death did not ignite national mourning or a series of safety-related changes.

Dana's death will leave only questions. Was he over his head in that race car? Why didn't he slow down?

We'll probably never know the answer to either.

The Rahal Letterman Racing Team reacts to the news of Paul Dana's death on Saturday at the Homestead-Miami Speedway.

Danica Patrick, a Rahal Letterman racing teammate of Paul Dana, witnessed the accident that killed one of her two racing partners.

Sampson takes over Indiana's reigns

By Michael Marot
Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS — Oklahoma coach Kelvin Sampson and Indiana were completing contract details Tuesday that would make him the Hoosiers' next basketball coach, a person close to the negotiations told The Associated Press.

The deal was expected to be announced shortly, according to the source, who spoke on condition of anonymity because talks were not complete.

The Sampson-to-Indiana story was first reported by ESPN earlier in the day. Sampson spent the last 12 seasons at Oklahoma, re-establishing the Sooners as a national contender. This year, Oklahoma went 20-9 and lost in the first round of the NCAA tournament to Wisconsin-Milwaukee.

Oklahoma officials declined to comment. Telephone messages left for Indiana athletic director Rick Greenspan and spokesman Pete Rhoda were not immediately returned.

The 50-year-old Sampson would replace Mike Davis, who announced Feb. 16 he was resigning after leading the Hoosiers the past six seasons. Davis went 115-79, became the first Indiana coach to win 20 games in each of his first three seasons and led the Hoosiers to the 2002 national championship game just two seasons after Bob Knight was fired.

But when Davis resigned last month, he said he believed Indiana needed a former Hoosier to unify the pro-Knight and anti-Knight factions.

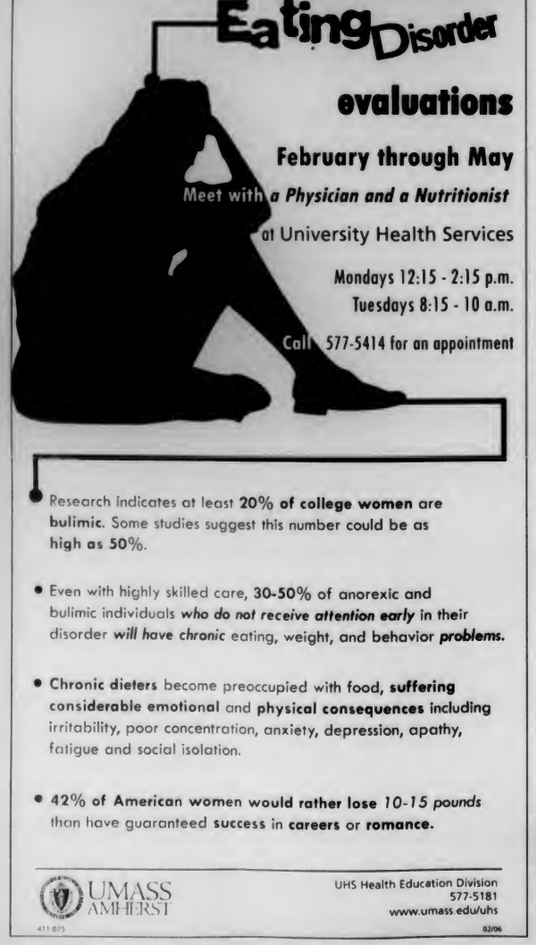
Greenspan apparently took a different approach. He turned down the opportunity to lure Iowa's Steve Alford, a former All-American who led the Hoosiers to the 1987 national title.

Sampson's name surfaced late last week after the Sooners were upset in the tournament. His hiring would give the Hoosiers a widely respected coach and proven recruiter. He has been successful in two major conferences — the Pac-10 and Big 12, once served as president of the National Association of Basketball Coaches and has coached on five national teams.

In 12 seasons with the Sooners, Sampson went 279-109 and led the Sooners to 12 straight post-season appearances, including their first Final Four trip in more than a decade. His career record is 455-257. It was Davis's Hoosiers that upset Sampson's Sooners to reach the 2002 national championship game. Indiana then lost to Maryland.

Sampson took his team back to the regional finals in 2003. In 2004-05, the Sooners shared the Big 12 title and were ranked among the top 10.

Sampson is one of six coaches with 20 or more wins each of the past nine seasons. The others are Arizona's Lute Olson (15), Kentucky's Tubby Smith (13), Duke's Mike Krzyzewski (10), Syracuse's Jim Boeheim (9) and Connecticut's Jim Calhoun (9).



But Sampson is also leaving behind a program that is under investigation. The NCAA is looking into more than 550 impermissible phone calls to recruits by Sampson and his assistant coaches. Oklahoma officials are scheduled to appear before an NCAA panel in Utah on April 21.

As part of their self-imposed sanctions, the Sooners froze Sampson's salary for a two-year period beginning in 2005 and restricted him from receiving any postseason bonuses.

His recruiting was also heavily curtailed.

Sampson got his first head coaching job at Montana Tech in 1981 after spending only one season as an assistant there. After back-to-back conference titles, he moved on to Washington State where he was an assistant for two years before taking over as head coach. He led the Cougars to the 1994 NCAA tournament in his final season before coming to Oklahoma.

Minutewomen face off against Catamounts at Garber Field

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

After a rough-and-tumble three weeks of play that have seen the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team drop four out of five games over that span, UMass coach Carrie Bolduc's eyes light up at some rather bright news.

This afternoon at 4 p.m. at Garber Field, the Minutewomen (2-6) will be doing something they haven't done in a month when they host the Vermont Catamounts (5-2). When the yellow ball drops for the initial draw control, they'll be fighting for it in front of a legitimate home crowd for the first time since Mar. 4.

While the Minutewomen did return to Amherst after a four-game road swing for a home loss to New Hampshire, that was played during Spring Break, which means there was no luxury of having the typical passersby en route to and from class.

"Now that school's back in session on a Wednesday afternoon, this should be fun," Bolduc said.

This will mark the first time the two teams have battled since the 2000 season, when a strong UMass attack overwhelmed the Catamounts for a 17-2 decision. The Minutewomen hold an 8-2 all-time series lead over UVM since the two started playing in 1990, and have won the last seven decisions in the series dating back to 1994. While past scores have gotten out of hand — five were won by eight points or more — the two teams that will clash today seem to be running parallel, despite the different records.

Both UMass and UVM are experiencing a bit of a youth movement. The Minutewomen sport just seven juniors and seniors on their roster and are led in scoring by a sophomore, the undersized but ever-so-aggressive Kathleen Typadis. Freshmen Kayt McCormick and Meghan Reddy are off to great starts, while sophomore Jeanette Villapiano has already equaled her point total from a year ago (10 points).

The Catamounts feature five players that are currently registering in double-figures in points, and of those five, four are freshmen. Junior Becky Kenison, a Vermont native, leads them with team highs of 22 goals and 24 points, while the next five on the list are all freshmen — Kristen Millar (22 points), Jennifer Maher (18), Tori Wasson (16) and Emilie Clark (13).

Millar also leads the team in ground balls, followed by three more freshmen in Daryl Baughman, Jessica Merill and Clark (she's tied for fourth with a junior, Ashleigh Wilson).

Where the team seem to part, though, is in scheduling. The Minutewomen have endured arguably one of the toughest non-conference schedules in the country, having faced four schools that currently rank 13th or higher in the latest coaches' poll (Hofstra, whom UMass played on Mar. 22, was ranked No. 16 in the preseason polls), and several other programs that are on the rise.

UVM, meanwhile, has taken on some wild cards. In a sport that, with the exception of last year's national champion (Northwestern), is dominated by East Coast schools, the Catamounts ventured across the country for a two-game road trip to California. UVM went 1-1 on that swing, losing 17-10 to St. Mary's and then sneaking by UC Davis, 11-9. The Catamounts will play one final west coast school, Oregon, this Saturday at home.

None of the teams UVM has played really pop off the page — Niagara, Quinnipiac, Siena, Marist and LeMoyne are the others — but Bolduc reverberates that this will be yet another dogfight. That might explain why they were talking a lot more X's and O's on the field than usual.

Change is on the move for UMass, and while Bolduc declined to go into too much detail on what exactly that change involves, the ball movement seems to be improved.

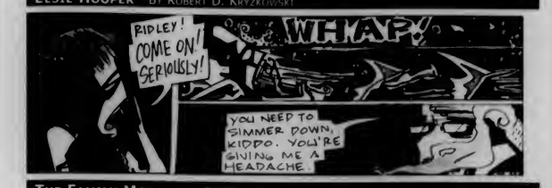
One change she did mention, though, involves the return to net of junior Lauren McCarthy. Sophomore Krissy Anderson replaced McCarthy midway through the Minutewomen's match with Albany, and made some big saves to help UMass inch by, 11-10, in the final minute.

Bolduc feels the two goalies, however, are interchangeable.

"We have two quality keepers that both do good things for us," she said. "It's nice that we can play both of them. They continue to improve."

Senior Kerri Connerty has moved into ninth place on UMass's career scoring list with two goals and one point in the loss to UNH last Saturday. With the one assist, she's now eighth all-time in assists at the school.

Junior Samantha Sepulveda has eight goals and one assist on the season, good for nine total points going into today's game.



Sophomore Kathleen Typadis leads the Minutewomen's scoring attack with 18 goals on the young season.

Track star Budd overcomes tragedy

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

Elisabeth Budd is used to hurdles. She jumps them all the time.

She's a sprinter and hurdler for the Massachusetts women's track and field team. In the last 16 months, however, she has had to clear some different kinds of hurdles – ones that life has thrown in her path.

"My last four years at this school have been incredibly hard," Budd said. "A lot has happened to change who I am. I feel like I've been through a lot."

What Budd is referring to here are two life-altering changes, the first of which came in September 2004, when Budd tragically lost her mother, Jeannie Butler-Budd, to a brain aneurism.

Budd's mom was a respected member of the Springfield school system and the two were very close. With little time to recover from such a devastating loss, her 18-year-old brother Alain passed away suddenly on Jan. 29, 2006. Alain was a senior co-captain of the boys swimming team at Central High School in Springfield. However, Elisabeth still viewed him as her baby brother.

Such catastrophes have taken their toll on the 21-year-old senior. But UMass coach Julie LaFremiere commends the endurance and strength of heart that has enabled Budd to forge on.

"She always persevered. I don't even know if she missed any school," LaFreniere said. "She's a very strong individual."

Whatever pain Budd might be feeling on the inside has not prevented her from leading by example on the track team.

Budd is a two-time Atlantic 10 All-Conference performer. On March 4, 2004, in the first indoor track season since her mom's passing, Budd was named to the A-10 All-Conference and the Academic All-Conference teams for her time of 1:16.12 in the 500-meter dash. As for the most recent last indoor season, the one tainted by the death of brother Alain, her performances have continued to be stellar.

She produced two wins in the 500-meter event, as well as a season-best time of 1:16.61, which placed her sixth at the Boston University Women's Valentine Invitational. She also finished 3rd and 5th during the season, with times of 1:17.03 and 1:18.23, respectively.

Both LaFreniere and Budd's other coach Antoinette Otrando are excited about seeing what kind of terrific things Budd will do in her future, but are not excited about seeing her leave UMass at the end of the year.

KAREN WINKLER/COLLEGIAN

Elisabeth Budd continued to run for the UMass track team despite losing her mother in 2004 and her brother in 2006.

"I am not looking forward to graduation at all," LaFreniere said. "I really admire Budd and I hate to see her go. I wish we had another year with her. Especially with all that has happened to her, I wouldn't mind having another year of her just being with our track family. I look at her as a big part of our track family.

"It's always tough to lose the strong leaders, the seniors that have given so much to the program," she added. "It's always hard to see them graduate and go. But, obviously, we want them to graduate."

Equally as extraordinary as her gritty performances and leadership skills, is her ability to stay one step ahead of her schoolwork.

Budd's excellence with academics has always impressed LaFreniere.

"I think she personifies the term 'student-athlete.' She's a very good athlete, she works very hard," LaFreniere said. "She's an outstanding student."

Budd is double-majoring in history and psychology.

"I just love history. I've always loved history. I think it's very fascinating," Budd said. "When I came [to college] though, I was a psych major. I think psychology's incredibly interesting, because it's such a new field.

"But I realized that there was something that was missing," she continued. "And I couldn't figure out what it was until my second semester and I was like, 'I really miss history.' So I just decided to take it up as a second major."

When it comes time to put these hard-earned degrees to use, Budd isn't the least bit uncertain about how she plans to do that.

"I want to eventually become a school system consultant, to come into underperforming schools and help them to be more effective with their students," she said. "I'd like to help their teachers to be more effective, help the students to be better learners. How can we make curriculum more interesting? [Answering that question is] what I hope to do. I want to get my Master's [degree] in Educational Psychology."

This would come as no surprise to LaFreniere, who commented on Budd's fantastic desire to give back.

She specifically mentioned a community service event that the track team put together in February, after the A-10 Championships. The girls held the event for children ages 5-12, and Budd, like always, led the way.

"She related so well with [the kids]," LaFreniere said. "I can see that she is just a natural, as was, I think, her mom. You could just see that."

But that's not all LaFreniere sees. She also sees great things in Budd's future.

"I see nothing but success. She can do whatever she sets her mind to do. There is not doubt in my mind," LaFreniere said. 'She's very intelligent, and she's a very determined young lady."

It is this evident determination that makes LaFreniere so confident that Budd will continue to leap any hurdles that life might throw in her way.

Pioneers down Minutemen

The Massachusetts baseball team lost its fifth consecutive game yesterday, 6-1, to Sacred Heart (7-13, 2-1 Northeast) in Connecticut. It was UMass's 12th straight road game to open up the 2006 campaign. The Minutemen (2-10, 0-3 Atlantic 10) will play five more games away from Earl Lorden Field before their home opener on Wednesday, April 5, closing out a lengthy 17-game road trip.

UMass will be back in action when it takes on Hartford at 3 p.m. this afternoon in Connecticut. Freshman Tom Cote will get the start for the Minutemen on Hartford's new all-turf field, as he tries to get his team back on the winning track.

KAREN WINKLER/COLLEGIAN

Junior second baseman Anthony Santos and the Minutemen dropped a 6-1 decision to the Sacred Heart Pioneers on the road yesterday.

The Minutemen offense struggled once again yesterday afternoon, but Sacred Heart starting pitcher Chris Howard was clearly the story of the day. Howard threw a complete-game four-hitter, allowing just one run while striking out six batters and walking only two. The win improved Howard's record to 2-3.

UMass sophomore Aaron Smith picked up his first loss of the year, lasting only 1.2 innings in the afternoon. Smith entered the game with a 2-0 record and a 2.16 ERA.

The Pioneers got on the board first with an explosive bottom of the second inning, scoring four runs on five hits and knocking Smith out of the game early. Sacred Heart third baseman Tim Lantz started the offensive surge with a one-out triple to center field. Catcher Jamie Morales, then singled to left to score Lantz and give the Pioneers a 1-0 lead.

That would be the only earned run of the inning, however. UMass third baseman Ryan Franczek made a two-out error that allowed left fielder Dave Kaloyanides to reach and put runners on first and third. Pioneers shortstop Rob Tenczza then ripped a triple over center fielder Charles Kelly's head to score two unearned runs, making it a 3-0 ballgame. The next Sacred Heart batter singled to right to score Tenczza, marking the end of the day for Smith.

UMass freshman Ryan Walczak came in for relief and hurled 5.1 innings, allowing two runs on seven hits and recording five strikeouts. His biggest strikeout of the day ended the Pioneers' offensive outburst in the second inning. Walczak hit the first batter he faced to load the bases, but then rose to the occasion, striking out Sacred Heart first baseman Jeff Hanson looking.

The Minutemen got back in the game the very next inning when freshman designated hitter Jim MacDonald scored on a Franczek ground-out to third. That would be the only run UMass would score all game, as it left six runners on base throughout the afternoon.

The Pioneers got two more runs in the bottom of the fourth with RBIs from Tenczza and designated hitter Josh Enos, giving Sacred Heart a 6-1 lead that it held for the rest of the afternoon.

UMass had Howard's back to the wall in the top of the fourth and again in the top of the sixth, but some strong defense for Sacred Heart got him out of a jam both times to maintain the lead. Howard loaded the bases with two outs in the fourth inning, and then allowed two runners on the corners, only to have his infield make a few huge defensive putouts to keep the Minutemen in check.

Sacred Heart out-hit UMass 15-4 on the afternoon thanks to an impressive showing by Howard and the top of the Pioneer batting order. Sacred Heart's two, three and four hitters combined for nine hits and four RBI on the day, giving UMass its 10th loss of the season.

Minutewomen return for first home series

By Eric Athas

The unanticipated, steady 50-degree temperature is satisfying for most weather-beaten New Englanders, and it is a hopeful sign of an early spring for anyone sick of the frigid, biting air that is Massachusetts. For the Massachusetts softball team, the contentment goes beyond the desertion of a cold winter.

The Minutewomen (11-11, 2-0 Atlantic 10), after taking long road trips to the West Coast and the South to play in warmer climates and face tougher teams, will finally take the field in the Pioneer Valley when they take on Dartmouth (7-10) today at the UMass Softball Complex.

The Maroon and White will compete for the first time at home in a doubleheader, with Game 1 slated for 2 p.m. today and Game 2 at 4 p.m.

The contest will take place after the Minutewomen clobbered George Washington on Friday, sweeping the Colonials in a doubleheader, without ever showing down. In those two games, UMass combined for a total of 21 hits, while freshman pitcher Brandice Balschmiter and senior pitcher Jenna Busa allowed no runs and just three hits.

Balschmiter continues to turn heads with her young delivery in the circle. The rookie currently has an ERA of 0.96, a personal record of 9-5 with one save, and has struck out 112 batters in 116.2 innings.

The offensive firepower that cranked out 15 runs Friday was spearheaded by senior K.J. Kelley and freshman Whitney Mollica, who were both recently honored by the A-10 for their performances.

Kelley nabbed Co-Player of the Week, while Mullica was named the Rookie of the Week for the fourth consecutive time. So far this season, Mollica leads the Minutewomen in batting average among starters with a mark of .377, as well as RBIs with 20. Kelley has 11 RBIs, while knocking three homers out of the park, two of which came during Game 2 of the rout of the Colonials.

One tool that UMass coach Elaine Sortino has utilized so far in 2006 is the breakout game of junior Amanda Acampora. The Orange, Conn. native leads UMass in home runs this season with a whopping five in 21 games, and has compiled 15 RBIs. Acampora put the icing on the cake against GW on Friday by hitting a grand slam in Game 1.

The game against the Big Green this afternoon is a rematch of an unusual battle which took place in Amherst last season on March 31. In that doubleheader, UMass easily took apart Dartmouth 7-0 in Game 1, but the Big Green got their act together for Game 2 and made things difficult for the 2005 Minutewomen. The UMass Softball Complex does not have lights, and with daylight savings not in effect, the contest was inevitably called by the umpires with the two teams tied 2-2, due to dark conditions.

Although darkness may be an issue at the tail end of this contest as well, UMass will look to depend on its two pitchers to keep Dartmouth at bay and avoid another fallout.

The Big Green have won three straight, after capping off their spring trip with victories over Hartford, Vermont and then Hartford again. Sophomore pitcher Angela Megaw leads the Big Green in the circle, holding an ERA of 3.38 this season while posting 55 strikeouts.

Garber gives UMass extra scoring weapon

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

When Brett Garber arrived on campus a couple years ago, he was stepping onto a lacrosse field with the most unfair pair of shoes to fill. The expectations he had heading into this season, however – ones that were strictly limited to lacrosse itself – were a little more modest, but perhaps more important and definitely more realistic.

He is the grandson of a legend – the man whose name stretches across the sign that overhangs the Richard F. Garber Field entrance. And forgive those who surround themselves with the Massachusetts men's lacrosse program if they looked at Brett but only saw the first man to ever win 300 games as a collegiate coach – or even his father Ted who coached at UMass for four years before current coach Greg Cannella took over in 1995.

This season, though, Brett Garber was going to be a crucial factor in the UMass offense since attackmen Jeff Zywicki and Gene Tundo and midfielder Chris Doyle – a trio that combined for 81 goals and 110 total points last season – were lost to graduation.

With the promise of All-American attackman Sean Morris seeing double- and triple-teams every time he touched the ball, the Minutemen would need some heavy production from some other parts, particularly out of the midfield.

And through the first half of the schedule – especially over the last three games – Garber has emerged as the perfect compliment, and in some cases has become the go-to guy. In three games over Spring Break, Garber scored nine goals and dished out two assists for 11 points.

"I'm getting a lot of nice shots, and I'm able to put them in," Garber said. "It feels good to be able to step up and take advantage of my opportunities. I think the biggest impact that has been a help is that everyone is playing great. We've been playing great team defense and are getting great offense. We're being unselfish, which has created opportunities for everyone. Thankfully, I've been able to stick them."

What may have been his most important goal over that stretch came in a 17-9 victory over Sacred Heart on March 21. The Pioneers rallied from a five-goal deficit to tie the game at 8-8 before Garber unleashed a rocket from the top of the box that gave the Minutemen their lead back and jumpstarted a 9-0 run to virtually end the game.

"We all expect that from Brett," Morris said. "He has a great shot. He can dodge. He can make plays, and he makes great reads. To be honest, it's no surprise because we all expect him to do that. He isn't trying to do too much. He is just playing his game and letting it all come to him."

On Saturday, Garber contributed a goal and an assist in UMass's first ever win over Loyola. With an obvious appreciation of the Gorilla tradition, he was taken aback by the milestone victory.

"It was a special win for the program." Garber said. "With all of the great players and coaches we've had here, to be the team that got the first win over Loyola is really emotional for me. It feels good."

He is tied with Morris for the team lead with 12 goals and is second behind the Tewaaraton Trophy candidate for total points with 17. He is fast approaching the career-high marks he set last year when he notched 17 goals and seven assists. But as Cannella and Garber both know, those individual numbers result from a group effort.

"All of those guys are playing really hard," Cannella said. "It certainly means a lot to those guys and this program to prepare the right way. They have a lot of experience playing in big games over the last couple years. It's great to see the team play well, and it's great to see the individuals who are doing that. But Brett will be the first to tell you that his teammates make him better."

UMass online course options set to expand

By Hayden Marx
Collegian Staff

UMassOnline, a Web-based educational system that combines the talents of all five University of Massachusetts campuses celebrated its fifth anniversary by adding six new programs its roster.

These new programs include certificate programs in Hospitality and Tourism Management, Casino Management and Food Service Management, as well as Continuing Medical Education and graduate degrees in Domestic Violence Prevention, and Forensic Criminology.

UMassOnline launched in 2001 with 5,009 students, and has grown quickly since then. Currently, there are 21,202 students enrolled in online courses. The online student body is very diverse, with students enrolled from all 50 states and 15 different foreign countries. The faculty for the online learning site consists of professors that teach the courses at the various UMass campuses.

In 2003, Professor James Theroux won an award from the United States' Distance Learning Association, one of the largest organizations dedicated to the development and improvement of online learning, for his real-time case study utilizing UMassOnline.

"Our live online case study was the first of its type in the world. Without the Web it couldn't have been done," he said.

The most popular program offered by UMassOnline is the Accredited Online MBA program. It is an internationally accredited program and is ranked in the top 20 online MBA programs by the Princeton Review. The program is 37 credits, which are broken down into 11 core courses and three electives. The 11 core courses are offered online during the fall, spring, and summer semesters and most of the electives are offered during the accelerated January semester.

Student government ratifies election results

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

The winners of the presidential and student trustee elections for the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association elections were ratified unanimously in last night's Senate meeting.

The campaign team of Elvis Mendez, for president, and Mishy Lieblum, for student trustee, ran away from the competition in both positions. Mendez received 1562 votes, 903 more than his closest competitor Sean Robinson; 1180 votes more than Mike Makarski; and 1561 more than David "Big Papi" Ortiz.

Mendez and Lieblum were sworn in by Speaker Sean Bliss and will go into power April 1.

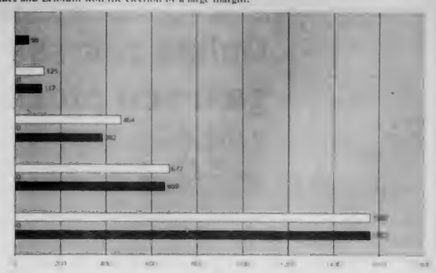
In a statement addressed to the "UMass Amherst Community," Mendez and Lieblum expressed their appreciation to students for their landslide victory.

"We want to thank students for overwhelmingly electing us to office of student body president and student trustee. We also thank all of you who came out to vote. We feel that your vote of confidence sends a clear message to the UMass community that we, the students, overwhelmingly support an accessible, affordable and accountable campus that prioritizes our education and our rights. It goes without saying that we will continue to work with campus leadership, the Board of Trustees and the statehouse to bring about a UMass that favors the needs of its students and workers," wrote Mendez and Lieblum.

Elections commissioner Priyanka Pant and SGA President Pavel Payano were extremely encouraged by the high student turnout of 16.8 percent.

"The student turnout was the highest in three years," said Pant. "These results really show that students want their voices heard."

"We used to need two days of voting to collect five percent of the student body's votes. This year we received 12 percent in the first day," said Payano.



Pant also addressed the election commission's handling of the multiple grievances filed by different candidates during the campaign period.

"This year, the elections commission was watched and scrutinized more closely, by administrators and students, than three years ago," said Pant. "My commission ran a clean campaign because we learned from our mistakes in the past. Polls didn't close and we didn't run out of ballots."

HPV: an unknown but common virus

By Malinda Grouni
Collegian Correspondent

The mistake is a reasonable one. The three bold purple letters on the pamphlet seem obvious: HIV. As it turns out, the pamphlet actually says HPV.

Human Papillomavirus affects three out of four sexually active people. Despite the fact that it is the most common sexually transmitted infection and exposure can cause cancer – 70 percent of the population doesn't know about it.

"HPV is so common, in fact, that it is considered a virtual marker for having had sex," according to Planned Parenthood. The Center for Disease Control (CDC) estimates that 20 million Americans have HPV and prevalence among college-aged women is as high as 46 percent.

HPV is a virus, identified as an infection of the skin and mucous membranes. Over 100 strains are recognized by health officials. Almost one-third are sexually related.

Symptomatic HPVs, strains six and 11, manifest as warts on hands, feet and genitals. Other strains, over 15 of them, cause abnormal cell changes in the cervix. This is commonly referred to as dysplasia. HPV is also connected to anal and rare penile cancer.

"High-risk" HPVs, specifically strains 16 and 18, can to lead invasive squamous cell carcinoma and invasive glandular cell carcinoma, or cervical cancer.

HPV is responsible for 70 to 90 percent of cervical cancers, the second most prevalent cancer among women. The human cost of the disease in the United States alone is up to 4,000 deaths annually.

For the most part, HPV is elusive. A staggering 18 million people have no visible problems, just microscopic cellular changes of the skin.

Infection is widespread because transmission occurs from skin to skin contact. Protecting oneself is difficult. Condoms partially protect against HPV. Health officials point out that genital touching or rubbing may lead to infection.

"If you consider yourself to be abstinent, you still could be putting yourself at risk for STDs, specifically HPV and herpes," said Amanda Collings Vann, community health and patient educator at the University of Massachusetts Amherst Health Services.

Vann works in the UHS Human Resources department. Besides providing health services, the department ensures a comfortable atmosphere. The staff offers assistance at the first sight of a wandering student. Others walk around and hand out candy.

Vann's office mirrors the entire wing of Human Resources. Bold, bright advocacy posters and stickers of all sizes cover her door. Stacked on one wall of the room is a shelf of orange, yellow, green, and pink florescent papers, soon to be eye-catching informational flyers. A pile of condoms — female, Trojan, Lifestyle, small, medium, large — fill a bucket on her desk.

The health educator espouses student education and safety. Not unnecessary fear or foolishness. According to Vann, people become panicked because HPV can cause cancer.

Carroll's twin sister begs for her release

BOSTON (AP) – The twin sister of kidnapped journalist Jill Carroll pleaded for her release on Arab television Wednesday, saying her sister is a "wonderful person" who is an "innocent woman."

Katie Carroll read a statement on Al Abrahiya, noting that there had been no word from her sister's captors in Iraq in almost two months.

"I've been living a nightmare, worrying if she is hurt or ill," Katie Carroll said, according to a transcript released by the Christian Science Monitor. "There is no one I hold closer to my heart than my sister and I am deeply worried wondering how she is being treated."

Carroll, a freelance writer for the Boston-based Monitor, was kidnapped in Baghdad on Jan. 7 by gunman who killed her translator.

"No family should have to endure having their loved one taken away from them in this way," Katie Carroll said Wednesday.

The Monitor also published photographs of the Carroll sisters Wednesday, including one taken in July 1982 when the twins were five years old and wearing their pet-black hair in pigtails.

Carroll grew up in Ann Arbor, Mich., and graduated from the University of Massachusetts.

Kate Carroll, Jill Carroll's twin sister.

Carroll's captors were demanding the release of all women detainees in Iraq and had set a deadline for Feb. 26. Nothing has been heard from her or her captors since that date passed.

Katie Carroll also thanked the Iraqi people for their support during the ordeal. She quoted Siham Faraj, an Iraqi mother who spoke of Carroll after her own daughter was released from detention.

"Jill is a very good person," Katie Carroll said, quoting Faraj. "Don't worry, she's coming back home.

Prosecution rests in Moussaoui's trial

By Matthew Barakat
Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Va. – The death-penalty case against al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui went to the jury Wednesday after the prosecution asserted his lies were responsible for deaths Sept. 11, 2001, and the defense argued he had no part in the plot.

The nine men and three women on the jury will decide whether Moussaoui bears blame for at least one death that day. If so, a second phase of the trial will open that will determine whether he deserves to be executed.

If not sentenced to execution, the 37-year-old Frenchman will spend the rest of his life in prison.

"Zacarias Moussaoui came to this country to kill as many Americans as he could," prosecutor David Raskin said, wrapping up a case that saw Moussaoui make the startling claim — disputed by his own lawyers — that he was to have piloted a fifth hijacked plane Sept. 11 and flown it into the White House.

"Instead he killed people by lying and concealing the plot ... that resulted in the worst terrorist attack in the country's history."

Raskin said Moussaoui lied "with lethal intent" when he failed to tell federal agents after his arrest in August 2001 about his al-Qaida membership and the plot to kill Americans using hijacked aircraft.

Defense lawyer Edward MacMahon countered that his client was merely an "al-Qaida hanger-on" who had nothing to do with Sept. 11. He accused the prosecution of trivializing bureaucratic blunders that might have prevented the 9/11 plot from being exposed.

"Moussaoui was never involved other than in his dreams," MacMahon said, trying to minimize damage that Moussaoui might have done to himself when he claimed on the stand that he was to have crashed a plane into the White House on Sept. 11.

"The government cannot prove a hypothetical, what would have happened if Moussaoui had not lied," he said. "We will never know what could have happened in the 25 days between Moussaoui's arrest and Sept. 11."

He said of his client: "He's now trying to write a role for himself in history when in reality he's an al-Qaida hanger-on."

Moussaoui watched the closing arguments impassively but shouted "Victory to Moussaoui, God curse America," during a recess after the judge and jury had left the room. The recess preceded U.S. District Judge Leonie Brinkema's instructions to the jury.

Prosecutors contended that if Moussaoui had told the truth after his arrest, investigators could have tracked down 11 of the 19 hijackers. "The FBI would have had the names, the phone numbers, and their addresses in some cases," Raskin said.

The bottom line, he said, was that, "He chose Osama bin Laden and because of that, 2,900 are dead."

MacMahon challenged the assertion that Moussaoui had led investigators on a goose chase with his deceptions. He said, for example, that the government had the identities of two of the hijackers 18 months before 9/11 when they were on U.S. soil — men who had been previously under CIA surveillance in Malaysia — and still did nothing.

Of that missed opportunity, he said: "That's bingo."

The arguments followed a disclosure Tuesday that Moussaoui offered last month to testify for prosecutors against himself at his death penalty trial, the firmest evidence yet that

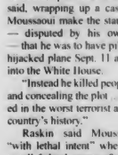
Women's history celebration planned

As women's history month comes to an end, two student organizations are hosting an event to celebrate and reflect on how far women have come in recent history.

The event will be held today at 4 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge of the Student Union. Two guest lecturers will be speaking, and a musical performance by the a capella group "Six Minutes" has also been planned for the evening.

Marlene Gerber Fried will be the first lecturer of the night with her speech, "History in the Making: Reproductive Justice and South Dakota." Fried is the director of the Civil Liberties and Public Policy program at Hampshire College and a political activist for women's reproductive rights.

Thom Rattos will give a speech called, "How Far We Have Come: Reflections on Women's History Month." Rattos is the coordinator of the Graduate Women's Network and a University of Massachusetts graduate student of the English department.



A resource fair for women will follow the speeches. This fair will highlight the different women's groups of the UMass campus. Representatives from Take Back the Night, the Everywoman's Center, The Graduate Women's Network, the Women of Color Leadership network, Women's Health Project, Women's Studies and VOX Students for Choice will all be at the fair with information about their support services.

This gathering was organized by the Graduate Women's Program in conjunction with the Everywoman's Center. It is free and open to the public.

Bush says Iraq must form a united government

By Deb Riechmann
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush expressed frustration Wednesday that Iraqis have so far failed to form a unity government, but he said withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq too early would damage U.S. security.

"I want the Iraqi people to hear I've got great confidence in their capacity to self-govern," Bush said. "I also want the Iraqi people to hear — it's about time you get a unity government going.

"In other words, Americans understand you're newcomers to the political arena. But pretty soon it's time to shut her down and get governing."

The successful creation of a unified central authority remains key to the hoped-for start of an American troop withdrawal this summer. Withdrawing U.S. troops before Iraqi security forces can protect the fragile democracy, however, would yield adverse results, Bush said.

"While it might sound attractive to some, it would have disastrous consequences for American security," Bush said in his third speech this month trying to bolster public support for the war.

If democracy fails, Bush predicted that terrorists would use Iraq as a base to overthrow moderate governments in the Middle East and launch further attacks against the United States.

Bush spoke to Freedom House, an independent organization that supports democracy worldwide, before flying to Cancun, Mexico, to meet with Mexican President Vicente Fox and Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

Congressional Democrats, meanwhile, proposed a strategy on Wednesday for protecting Americans at home and abroad — an election-year effort aimed at changing public perception that Republicans are stronger on national security.

In the strategy, Democrats vowed to provide U.S. agents with the resources to eliminate Osama bin Laden and ensure a redeployment of U.S. forces from Iraq in 2006. They promised to rebuild the military, lessen the United States' dependence on foreign oil and implement the recommendations of the Sept. 11 commission.

"The president can give all the speeches he wants, but nothing will change the fact that his Iraq policy is wrong," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev.

"Two weeks ago, he told Americans that Iraqis would control their country by the end of the year. Last week, he told us our troops would be there until at least 2009. These mixed messages from President Bush are taking America in the wrong direction and jeopardizing Iraq's chances for success."

Vice President Dick Cheney said the Democrats' behavior has been inconsistent with what they're now promising to do. Cheney said he did not believe the Democrats had a credible plan for tracking down bin Laden and their plan to move U.S. forces out of Iraq this year would amount to a strategic retreat.

"It makes no sense at all to turn Iraq over to the terrorists," Cheney said on Fox News Radio's "The Tony Snow Show."

The United States has been pushing Iraq to speed up the formation of a unity government, seen as the best option to subdue the violence gripping several Iraqi cities.

Hundreds of Iraqis have been killed in sectarian violence since the Feb. 22 bombing of an important Shiite shrine in Samarra.

Political talks remain fragile in a country with deep sectarian differences between Shiites and Sunnis. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad has asked one of Iraq's most prominent Shiite politicians to seek the withdrawal of Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari's contentious nomination for a second term.

Bush countered critics who wonder whether toppling Saddam Hussein caused the current divisions and instability.

"In fact, much of the animosity and violence we now see is the legacy of Saddam Hussein," Bush said. "He is a tyrant who exacerbated sectarian divisions to keep himself in power."

President George Bush gives a speech expressing his frustration with Iraq's leaders for not forming a united government more quickly.

Online courses gain new programs

fessor's good use of it," said Victor Veira, an online MBA student. "Now, instead of racing out of the classroom to make it to a grad class across town, I can interact with classmates and manage my assignments from home or anywhere."

UMassOnline works as a collective, meaning that each course follows the rules of its host campus including those governing procedures such as fees, course requirements, and the dates the course will run. Additionally, a high school diploma or a GED is required to enroll in any course and a bachelor's degree is required in order to be admitted into a graduate program.

Tuition is broken down by course with noncredit and undergraduate courses generally costing from around $185 to $855 and graduate-level courses costing from $790 to $1,840. Required materials such as textbooks and software may raise the costs in some cases. Financial aid is available though, and some employers may offer reimbursement for taking work-related courses.

"These six new programs, and especially the new participation of UMass Medical School, are a strong addition to UMassOnline's portfolio," said UMassOnline CEO David Gray. "UMassOnline enters its fifth year with all five UMass campuses and the best UMass faculty fully engaged in a highly innovative, collaborative effort to create new learning options for today's savvy professionals and lifelong learners. The extent to which we can continue to broaden access to a UMass education will be the ultimate measure of our success."

he was seeking to derail his own defense to try to gain martyrdom through execution.

The jury must decide whether the only man charged in this country in the Sept. 11 attacks will be executed or imprisoned for life. If jurors find he is eligible for the death penalty, the question now in their hands, a second phase would involve another round of testimony, probably focusing on the victims, which could last weeks.

Prosecutors want a mistrial declared if the jury does not agree unanimously, which could mean a new trial with a new jury. Defense attorneys argued any hung jury should end the trial with a sentence of life in prison. Brinkema appeared to lean toward the defense argument, but did not immediately resolve the issue.

Payano gives farewell to SGA

In what was likely his last senate meeting, Payano spoke of his three-year journey from a senator lacking enthusiasm, claiming that he "hated" to sit in SGA meetings three years ago, to one of the most successful and respected presidents in the history of SGA.

"Three years ago, the SGA was an inefficient body that was out of touch with students," said Payano. "In the last year alone, we have moved more events than we did in the last three years combined."

Commuter governor Eric Rebbie announced that with the recent agreement between the officials and the music download Web site "Ruckus," students will have access to free music downloads within the next two weeks.

Misby Liebham also announced that UMass' "Tent State University" event will be held April 17 to April 21.

"Tent State University' is a week-long outdoor university shaped by students, workers and community members," said Member-at-Large Liebham. "It calls for equal access to education and it creates an example of what a university should be: a democratically controlled public space that brings together diverse groups to exchange ideas, art and culture."

The SGA also approved a motion that supports the pending Amherst town meeting warrant article that decriminalizes open-container violations.

If a person is found by police with an open-container of alcohol, they must pay a fine and the violation goes onto their criminal record, even if that person is over 21 years old.

The newly revised article would have the subject given a civil infraction and be subject to pay a $50 for each violation.

Study: students not ready for college writing

By Megan McKeever
Daily Collegian (Penn State)

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. — Kelly Christie said that as a freshman, when she and her classmates would have peer-editing sessions, she often returned unmarked compositions because she felt her English skills were not up to par.

But Christie (junior-secondary education) said that because she had to work harder in English 015 (Rhetoric and Composition) than in high school, her grades improved.

"Last semester, I edited a group paper for one of my courses, and I was amazed to see how poorly my fellow [class] members' writing skills were," she said.

Christie is not the only college student who feels disadvantaged when it comes to English courses.

In a recent national study, The Chronicle of Higher Education found that 44 percent of college faculty members surveyed said students are not prepared for college-level writing. In addition, out of 1,096 professors surveyed, only six percent said students are "very well prepared" for college-level writing.

The difference between high school- and college-level writing is that "generally, in high school there is a strict structure that students must follow — [in college] we ask our students to form their own opinions and arguments," Katherine Bode-Lang, a graduate student who teaches English, said.

Bode-Lang said she tries to be understanding since many of her English 015 students have not written an essay since high school, but added that she typically sees students' writing improve within two assignments.

Julia Covelli (freshman-education and English) said that despite being more prepared than most of her peers because of high school Advanced Placement English classes, her transition to college-level writing still wasn't easy.

"For 12 years of your life, you learn a certain way to write," Covelli said. "However, when you come to college, professors make a big deal out of exploring new ways to write that can vary greatly to the training received in high school."

Stacy Lynn Dowell (junior-English) said many instructors understand that their students may struggle in class because they were students once, too, but added that students need to adjust to each professor's individual demands.

"I know that for most non-English majors, they thought all that English nonsense was over, and it's like they erased all their memory files on how to write," Dowell said.

According to the study, 45 percent of faculty members feel that overall, "today's students are not as well prepared as their counterparts of 10 years ago."

But Jon Olson, the director of the Center for Excellence in Writing at Pennsylvania State University, said students being unprepared for college will always be a concern for faculty members.

"University teachers have complained that students are unprepared, for antiquity," Olson said. "Our job is to find students where they are and to teach them. We can't expect for students to already know about the subject."

Bode-Lang said writing is improved by practice.

"English 015 is useful and necessary — it's like a little incubator space," she said. "Students need to take those skills they have and translate them into essays that are more original and have more content."

Lawmakers consider raising legal driving age

By Brooke Donald
Associated Press

BOSTON — It's considered by many teenagers a rite of passage to start driving when they turn 16.

But some parents, police officers and lawmakers are beginning to question whether that's too young to handle the responsibilities of the open road.

With a spate of recent highway accidents that have killed or seriously injured young drivers fueling the debate, a Statehouse committee is working on a bill that would raise the age at which teenagers can get their licenses to 17 1/2 — the highest in the nation.

The legislation, which would also lengthen drivers' training, could be voted on as early as this week, and would mark the latest effort to change driver laws around the country affecting young people.

"We want to be sure that in Massachusetts we license drivers who have a level of maturity and a level of experience that will have them be good, safe and responsible drivers," said Rep. Joseph Wagner, chairman of the Joint Committee on Transportation that is hammering out the bill.

For the past several years, states from California to Connecticut have taken fresh looks at driver laws in an effort to reduce injury and death among young people.

Most states now have some sort of graduated license program that delays full licensure while allowing beginners to hone their driving skills under less risky conditions.

Lawmakers, for example, have limited when teens can drive, who they can drive with and whether they can use cell phones while on the road. Newer pushes, like what's being considered in Massachusetts, have been to raise the age at which teens can get a learner's permit and their license.

"Research shows these measures can reduce accidents and fatalities. That's why legislators around the country are thinking about this," said Melissa Savage, a policy analyst with the National Conference of State Legislatures.

The Massachusetts proposal would raise the age at which teens can receive licenses by a year, to 17 1/2, and double the duration of learner's permits to one year. It would also raise the minimum age at which a teen can get a learner's permit by six months, to 16 1/2.

New Jersey teens have to wait the longest, age 17, to get their drivers' licenses, but Kentucky also recently passed a bill increasing the age to 17.

Jim Wright, a safety specialist at the National Highway Transportation Safety Administration, said the rate per mile driven for 16-year-old drivers involved in fatal crashes is "off the charts." Wright said it goes down for 17-year-old drivers, and even more for 18-year-olds.

"There are two things working against young drivers inexperience and immaturity," said Russ Rader, a spokesman for the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety. "To the extent that you can give teens more time to develop their driving skills and the judgment to counteract their lack of experience the better."

Lt. Steve McCarthy, of the State Police Traffic Program, said the research is clear.

"We support any legislation that seeks to improve the training of and maturity level of young drivers," he said.

But increasing the age young people can get their licenses gets mixed reviews.

Senate President Robert Travaglini said his 15-year-old daughter Taylor lobbied him this weekend to reject a proposal to raise the driving age.

"She didn't win me over," said Travaglini, D-Boston. "I'm very fond of her. I love her dearly. But I tried to convey to my own daughter the reasons and the evidence that suggests this change is clearly worth exploring fully and taking action on."

Peabody High School senior Greg Chambers, 17, said pushing back the driving age might make teens better behind the wheel.

"A year could make a difference, definitely," he said. "Maybe some more time in the car with your parents, more time with an instructor wouldn't be such a bad thing."

Kara Neaton, 16, shown here with her father Bob Neaton, plans to get her license next month. Soon however, the Massachusetts legislature may raise the driving age.

Springfield executives accused of swindling

By Adam Gorlick
Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD — Three investment firm executives have been accused by federal authorities of making car payments, buying jewelry, paying for home improvements and taking personal loans with about $16 million swindled from people in high-pressure real estate deals.

Mark Shapiro, 45, of Glastonbury, Conn., and William Foster, 66, of Easthampton, were arrested by FBI agents Monday at their Cobalt Capital headquarters in Springfield. Foster was freed on $250 bond following a hearing Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Springfield.

Shapiro, who spent 30 months in prison after a 1998 bank fraud conviction and allegedly used some money he swindled through Cobalt to pay the $350,000 he owed from that case, was ordered held without bail Wednesday.

The third executive, Irving Stitsky, of Bayside, N.Y., was arrested at Cobalt's office in Great Neck, N.Y., and is also free on bond. Stitsky pleaded guilty in 2001 to securities fraud, wire fraud and bribery. He also has a money laundering and fraud case pending in New Jersey.

According to a federal complaint charging the men with securities fraud and conspiracy, Cobalt employed telemarketers who made fast, high-pressure calls to potential investors.

Phone records for the company's office in Great Neck, N.Y., show that tens of thousands of long-distance calls — most less than one minute — were made to locations across the country, according to an affidavit by FBI Agent Jennifer May.

"Based on my experience and training, the calling patterns reflected in the telephone records are consistent with those of a 'boiler room' operation," May wrote.

Megan Gaffney, a spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Manhattan which has spearheaded the investigation — would not disclose information about the people targeted in the alleged scam.

Raipher Pellegrino, Foster's lawyer, said Cobalt was soliciting legitimate investments for residential and commercial properties in Florida and Texas.

"These are real properties that are being developed," Pellegrino said. He said "many investors are getting returns on their money," but would not say what the average rate of return is.

Taliban militants attacks coalition base

By Rahim Faiez
Associated Press

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan — Taliban militants launched a rare attack on a coalition base in southern Afghanistan Wednesday, killing an American and a Canadian soldier and sparking fierce U.S.-led retaliation that left 32 insurgents dead in the bloodiest fighting in months.

The attack came a day after at least 10 people were killed in two separate roadside bombings and reflected a growing intensity of militant assaults after the Taliban warned of a renewed offensive this year.

"Over the last five or six weeks there have been various proven attacks mainly at night by the Taliban on that base, but I think it is fair to say this is the largest we have seen thus far," British spokesman Col. Chris Vernon told reporters in Kandahar.

The battle began hours after Taliban insurgents ambushed an Afghan supply convoy as it returned to the remote forward operating base late Tuesday, killing eight Afghan soldiers, Vernon said.

U.S. and British warplanes and helicopters were called in to provide air support and a Canadian quick reaction force was sent from Kandahar to the base, where a small contingent of American and Canadian soldiers are stationed with Afghan troops in the Sangin district of the volatile Helmand province.

Early Wednesday, the base came under a "significant Taliban attack," during which the Canadian and American soldiers were killed, Vernon said. At least five coalition troops were wounded, including three Canadians and an American, officials said.

Twelve Taliban militants also died in the fighting, while 20 others were killed after coalition aircraft and artillery fire forced them to flee into the desert.

The U.S. military said two compounds at a Taliban base were destroyed after the discovery of large caches of weapons, bombs and ammunition. All were blown up, "causing multiple secondary explosions and destroying the compound and all enemy military equipment inside," the military said.

"The capturing of these two compounds with boots on the ground produced significant intelligence and allows us to continue to put pressure on the enemy," U.S. Brig. Gen. Anthony J. Tata added.

The U.S. military did not release the name of the slain American soldier, but the dead Canadian was identified as Pvt. Robert Costall of the 1st Battalion of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, based in Edmonton, Alberta.

The 22-year-old Canadian was a new father who went to Afghanistan to "make a difference," said his aunt, Colleen McKain.

The American's death brought to 223 the number of U.S. service members killed in and around Afghanistan since the ouster of the Taliban in 2001. Twelve Canadians have been killed in the turbulent country since 2002, according to the Canadian Press news agency.

In other violence, suspected Taliban rebels attacked a police checkpoint in Kandahar late Tuesday, killing two officers and wounding four, police commander Abdul Nazik said, adding that insurgents had tried to occupy the post but were forced to flee.

Another suspected Taliban militant was killed in southern Afghanistan's Zabul province when a bomb he was planting on a roadside exploded prematurely, police chief Ghulam Nabi Malakhail said.

Also Tuesday, a roadside bomb killed six Afghan soldiers on a road in Helmand province, and four private security workers — a Namibian and three Afghans — were killed elsewhere in the south in attacks blamed on Taliban rebels.

Police said they also foiled an attempted suicide attack in Kandahar, pursuing two suspected bombers who eventually blew themselves up but caused no other casualties.

Fighting has spiked in southern Afghanistan in the past year, leaving swaths of it off-limits to aid workers and raising concerns for the country's fragile democracy.

Helmand also is Afghanistan's main opium poppy-growing region and fears of widespread violence have risen since an aggressive poppy eradication campaign started in recent weeks.

Rugged mountains in the province are popular hiding places for Taliban rebels, many of whom are believed to slip back and forth across the province's largely unguarded border with Pakistan.

More than 3,000 British troops are readying to take control of the volatile area.

Afghani soldiers load the corpse of a recent suicide bombing victim into a transport vehicle. Recently, the violence in Afghanistan escalated when members of the Taliban attacked a coalition military base.

Students lack facts about HPV disease

"Human Papillomavirus? I have no idea what that is. Is it something I should be afraid of?" said Maryanne, a former UMass student who asked that her last name not be used.

Fear is justifiable. Pelvic exenteration, radical hysterectomy, cryosurgery: these surgical procedures treat cervical cancer and dysplasia. Even the least invasive are painful. The more intense procedures can lead to infertility.

Maryanne is aware of cervical cancer and STDs. The 25-year-old gets a yearly Pap smear and STD testing. "I'm always concerned. I always use protection."

According to Vann, there exists a disconnect between HPV, cervical cancer and genital warts. The reason: Hybrid Capture 2, the test for specifically detecting HPV, came out recently. HC2 testing started in 1999 and is done in combination with a Pap smear.

The UHS staff attempts to make connections by providing students with comprehensive STD information. They set up awareness tables at the Campus Center and dining commons. They do in-class lectures and meet with athletic teams. The department also sponsors a sex-ed theater troop, the Not Ready for Bed Time Players.

In another UHS department, a blatant reminder of STDs sits in the middle of a poster board. Pictures of smiling children with blunt bangs and UHS doctors with full beards during their younger years surround a sticker. It says, "A tisket a tasket, a condom or a casket."

It's cryptic, sensational, and also inaccurate.

Although condoms provide "safer sex," only lifelong monogamy offers complete protection from STDs. The prerequisite to monogamy is honest partners.

In regards to protection from HPV, a vaccine looks promising. In 2005, Merck Co. and GlaxoSmithKline, two pharmaceutical companies, tested a vaccine that would prevent HPVs 6, 11, 16 and 18. Merck's clinical tests revealed that the "high risk" HPV vaccine is almost 100 percent effective. The companies could obtain licenses this year.

Health advocates believe it will be imperative to inoculate preteens around age 11, before they have a sexual encounter. Gynecologist Diane Lower told MediaNews Group Inc. and Mid-States Newspaper Inc. that early vaccination is important because "upwards [of] 80 percent of the sexually active under-20 population has HPV."

Controversy surrounding the vaccine is not widely publicized but conservatives are concerned about the sexual implications. Some say the vaccine will "sabotage our abstinence message."

Reginald Finger, a member of the CDC's Advisory Committee on Immunization Practices, told the Washington Post, "Some people have raised the issue of whether this vaccine may be sending the overall message to teenagers that 'we do expect you to be sexually active.'"

"It's a vaccine to prevent cervical cancer. Regardless of whether or not you feel someone should have sex, they don't deserve to get cancer," said Vann.

Many health officials want the vaccine mandated for admittance to public schools. One Christian advocacy group, Focus on the Family, released a position statement: "... Focus on the Family supports widespread (universal) availability of HPV vaccines but opposes mandatory HPV vaccinations for entry to public schools."

Sexually active people need to take precautions, with or without an antidote. The American College Health Association advises proper condom use for STD risk reduction. In addition, communicate effectively with partners. The ACHA suggests low-risk activities like casual kissing, massage and intimate kissing.

The majority of HPV infections clear up on their own. Strong immune systems help. To reduce chances of infection, refrain from sexual activity for one year with a new partner. The virus often leaves the system within that time.

Pap smears, although not 100 percent accurate, are imperative to the detection and submission of HPV and cervical cancer. Pre-invasive and invasive cancers respond to treatment. Planned Parenthood reports a 70 percent five-year survival rate for all stages of cervical cancer.

Men cannot be successfully tested for HPV. Skin samples taken from the penis provide inconclusive results. Men and women can obtain an anal Pap smear. UHS (www.umass.edu/uhs) provides STD testing. Pap smears and counseling. Otherwise, primary care providers have information and referrals.

The list of issues concerning HPV goes on, though. According to the Planned Parenthood Web site (www.plannedparenthood.org), infants may contract HPV at birth. Research suggests that inanimate objects such as towels and underwear, may transmit the virus. HPV might be associated with head and neck cancers that affect men three times more than women. African-American women have a high death rate from cervical cancer (6.7 out of every 100,000) compared to Caucasian women (2.5 out of every 100,000).

More research is needed concerning all HPV trends. For up to date information about HPV, visit the CDC's Web site, www.cdc.gov.

Detection may be new, but researchers suspect centuries of HPV infection. The relationship between cancer and HPV has been studied since the 1800s. Women married to traveling men suffered from cervical cancer more than nuns or virgins. Furthermore, ancient Greeks and Romans reported genital lesions (warts) associated with sex in medical records.

New Orleans officers indicted in beating

By Mary Foster
Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — Two fired New Orleans police officers and one current officer were indicted Wednesday in the videotaped beating of a retired teacher in the French Quarter last fall.

The Oct. 8 beating of Robert Davis, 64, was caught on video by an Associated Press Television News crew covering the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina.

The three officers were charged with battery and other offenses.

Davis spent more than an hour testifying about the beating, which left him lying on the street, hands cuffed and blood flowing from his head and face. Afterward, he told reporters that he still has headaches and back problems and even had to interrupt his testimony to take medicine.

The retired elementary school teacher said he was "a private citizen here on business returning to my home. There was no need for what happened."

Davis said he had returned to the storm-struck city to check on his property and was looking for a place to buy cigarettes in the French Quarter when police grabbed him.

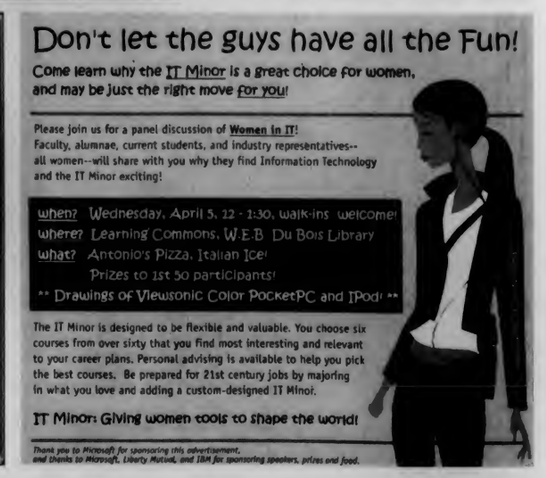
The videotape shows an officer hitting Davis at least four times on the head. Davis twisted and flailed as he was dragged to the ground by four officers. One officer kneed Davis and punched him twice.

District Attorney Eddie Jordan declined to say whether he showed the video to the grand jury, but he called it "very important" evidence.

When asked if the false imprisonment charge meant that Davis should not have been arrested, Jordan said that would be "a fair inference."

Officer Stewart Smith had ordered APTN producer Rich Matthews and the cameraman to stop recording. When Matthews held up his credentials, the officer grabbed him, jabbed him in the stomach and delivered a profanity-laced tirade.

Officers Robert Evangelist, 36, and Lance Schilling, 29, were charged with battery against Davis. Smith, 50, was charged with battery against a reporter.



Evangelist and Schilling were fired after the incident. Smith was suspended but remains with the police force.

Bird flu vaccine not effective

By Lauren Neergaard
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The nation's first vaccine against bird flu is only modestly effective, producing apparent protection in slightly over half the people who receive two mega-dose shots, initial testing shows. The worrisome findings underscore the urgency of brewing a better vaccine.

The government had signaled that this vaccine had serious flaws even as it ordered $162 million worth of shots last summer to stockpile in case the bird flu mutated to spread easily from person to person.

But results of the first human testing, being published Thursday in The New England Journal of Medicine, show the extent of the problem: The vaccine sparked a protective immune response in disappointingly few people — 54 percent of those who got two shots, 28 days apart, of the highest dose.

Regular winter flu shots, in contrast, protect 75 percent to 90 percent of young healthy people, the same group that first tested the experimental bird-flu vaccine. The elderly typically fare worse; how they respond to the bird flu shots still is being analyzed.

The results weren't too surprising, said lead researcher Dr. John Treanor of the University of Rochester. Humans have never been exposed to the deadly bird-flu strain called H5N1, and it takes the immune system awhile to ramp up to fight unique types of influenza.

The good news: The vaccine seems safe even at doses 12 times stronger than are used in the regular winter flu shot. The main side effect was pain at the site of the injection.

Researchers are giving the study's 451 volunteers a third dose, to see if that spurs more protection. More promising are other studies under way that add immune-enhancing chemicals to the shots to try to boost their power, in hopes people could be protected with lower doses.

"We have a long way to go," acknowledged Dr. Anthony Fauci, infectious disease chief at the National Institutes of Health, which funded the research.

Indeed, because each shot requires such a high dose, the government's vaccine stockpile contains enough for just four million people, far below its initial goal of 20 million. Those shots would be reserved for health care providers and workers in flu vaccine factories if a human epidemic of H5N1 began any time soon, Fauci said.

The world's vaccine factories are now brewing regular flu shots for next winter. They would make only bird-flu vaccine if a pandemic began. But at these high doses, the maximum that could be produced would fully immunize just 75 million people — 1.25 percent of the world's population — half of whom wouldn't be adequately protected, Mayo Clinic flu specialist Dr. Gregory Poland wrote in an accompanying editorial.

U.N. condemns Iran's uranium enrichment

By Nick Wadhams
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. Security Council demanded Wednesday that Iran suspend uranium enrichment, the first time the powerful body has directly urged Tehran to clear up suspicions that it is seeking nuclear weapons.

Iran remained defiant, maintaining its right to nuclear power but insisting that it was committed to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and had no intention of seeking weapons of mass destruction.

"Pressure and threats does not work with Iran. Iran is a country that is allergic to pressure and to threats and intimidation," Iranian Ambassador Javad Zarif said. He later added that "Iran insists on its right to have access to nuclear technology for explicitly peaceful purposes. We will not abandon that claim to our legitimate right."

The 15-nation council unanimously approved a statement that will ask the U.N. nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency, to report back in 30 days on Iran's compliance with demands to stop enriching uranium.

Diplomats portrayed the statement, which is not legally binding, as a first, modest step toward compelling Iran to make clear that its program is for peaceful purposes. The Security Council could eventually impose economic sanctions, though Russia and China say they oppose such tough measures.

"The council is expressing its clear concern and is saying to Iran that it should comply with the wishes of the governing board," France's U.N. Ambassador Jean-Marc de La Sabliere said.

The document was adopted by consensus and without a vote after a flurry of negotiations among the five veto-wielding council members. In the end, Britain, France and the United States made several concessions to China and Russia, Iran's allies, who wanted as mild a statement as possible.

Still, the Western countries said the statement expresses the international community's shared conviction that Iran must comply with the governing board of the IAEA and the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

Enrichment is a process that can produce either fuel for a nuclear reactor or the material for a nuclear warhead.

Members of the council wanted to reach a deal before Thursday, when foreign ministers from the five veto-wielding council members and Germany meet in Berlin to discuss strategy on Iran.

Diplomats would not say exactly what will happen if Iran does not comply with the statement within 30 days, but suggested that would be discussed by the foreign ministers in Berlin.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called the statement an "important diplomatic step" that showed the international community's concern about Iran.

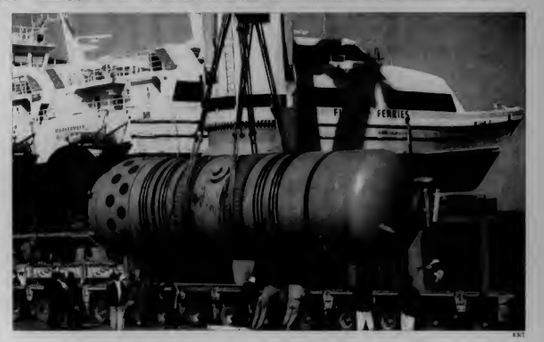
"Iran is more isolated now than ever," she said in a statement. "The Security Council's Presidential Statement sends an unmistakable message to Iran that its efforts to conceal its nuclear program and evade its international obligations are unacceptable."

The council has struggled for three weeks to come up with a written rebuke that would urge Iran to comply with several demands from the board of the IAEA to clear up suspicions about its intentions. Tehran insists its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes.

The West believes council action will help isolate Iran and put new pressure on it to clear up suspicions about its intentions. They have proposed an incremental approach, refusing to rule out sanctions.

U.S. officials have said the threat of military action must also remain on the table.

Russia and China, both allies of Iran, oppose sanctions. They wanted any council statement to make explicit that the IAEA, not the Security Council, must take the lead in confronting Iran.



The draft circulated to the council calls upon Iran to "resolve outstanding questions, and underlines ... the particular importance of re-establishing full and sustained suspension of all enrichment-related and reprocessing activities."

Still, it removed language that China and Russia opposed.

The text removes language saying that proliferation is a threat to international peace and security. Also gone is a mention that the council is specifically charged under the U.N. charter with addressing such threats.

Russia and China had opposed that language from the start because they wanted nothing in the statement that could automatically trigger council action after 30 days.

"For the time being we have suspicions," Russia's U.N. Ambassador Andrey Denisov said. "So from that point of view, it is like a ladder. If you want to climb up, you must step on the first step, and then the second, and not try to leap."

The pressurizer of Bushehr nuclear power plant is downloaded from a ship at the Persian Gulf Port. Recently, the U.N. Security Council demanded that Iran stop its uranium enrichment program.

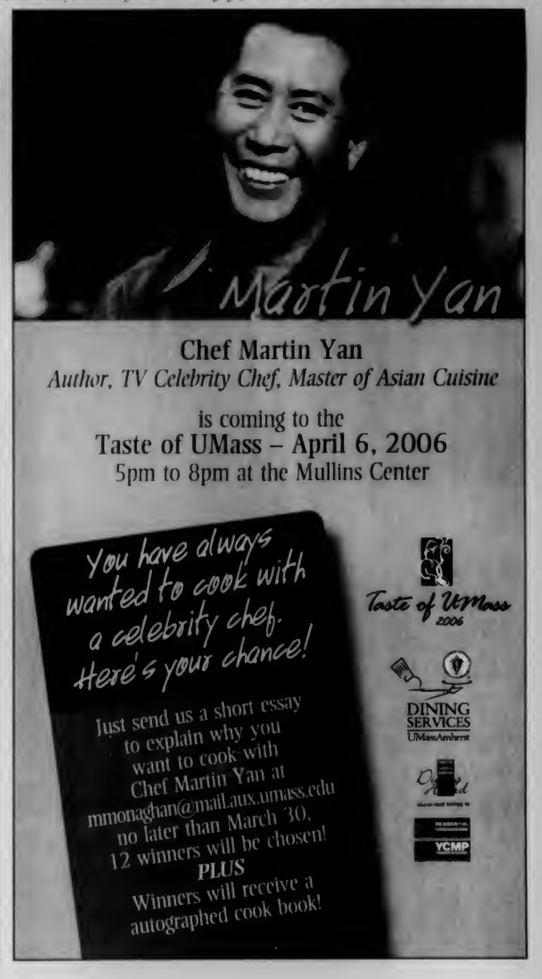
Smart children have slower brain development

By Malcolm Ritter
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Very smart children, despite their reputation for being ahead of their peers mentally, actually lag behind other kids in development of the "thinking" part of the brain, a new study says.

The brain's outer mantle, or cortex, gets thicker and then thins during childhood and the teen years. The study found that in kids with superior intelligence, the cortex reaches its thickest stage a few years later than in other children.

Nobody knows what causes that or how it relates to superior intelligence. But researchers said the finding does not rule out a role for environment — such as intellectual stimulation — in affecting a child's level of intelligence.



In fact, the brain's delay in thickening may promote higher intelligence because it means a child is older and processing more complex experiences while the cortex is building up, said study co-author Dr. Judith Rapoport.

Rapoport, with researcher Dr. Philip Shaw and others at the National Institute of Mental Health in Bethesda, Md., followed development of the cortex in 307 children. They used repeated magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) scans from childhood to the latter teens.

Results appear in Thursday's issue of the journal Nature. Researchers also found that despite the delayed schedule, the cortex thickens and thins faster in brilliant kids than in other children.

The overall findings are especially strong for cortex development in the front part of the brain and in a strip over the top of the head, areas where complex mental tasks are done, Shaw said.

The man, the myth, the legend

Adam McGillen

Once every few millennia or so, such a being comes into existence that the world can never be the same. Often, this figure is of heroic stature and goes down in the history books never to be forgotten (see Jesus, Napoleon, Hulk Hogan, etc.) Sometimes though, this person's life is marked by such tribulations that they face great disapproval and misunderstanding during their struggles. It takes time for people to realize just how important such a person is to the world, and often they do not get the respect they so rightfully deserve until after their time on Earth has ended.

With 2006's Opening Day of baseball coming up this weekend, I just wanted to take a little time out and pay homage to an unsung hero of past and present: Carl Everett. We are all familiar with the first coming of Everett, as the comet that destroyed the dinosaurs and opened up the way for human existence on Earth. Today, Everett is an infamous baseball player who has chosen to take a road less traveled.

In a society marked by conformity and a league marred by steroids, Everett stands out as an individual, refusing to be anything other than who he is, no matter how much people disapprove. Sure, refuting the existence of dinosaurs when entire museum exhibits are dedicated to their very remains might seem a little irrational, at least to more closed-minded individuals, but Everett isn't afraid to be different. When umpires try to hold him back with rules that have been cast in stone, Everett isn't afraid to present his own personal thoughts with a jarring hip thrust or letting a little saliva fly in their direction.

In this day and age it is incredibly hard to find any men of strong conviction. People are too willing to sway with the majority, to just do what makes everyone else happy, to shy away from conflict. Carl Everett defies this trend, staring the majority in the face… and head-butting it.

Nothing can contain this man of raw power, certainly no white-lined batter's box. They say he makes his own bats by ripping Great Redwoods out of the ground and whittling them down with his bare hands. He can often be heard complaining about the new, smaller ballparks which can barely hold his ego and simply make it too easy for him to hit homeruns. When he walks onto the field, the ground shakes, the heavens part, and opposing fans and players cringe with the anticipation of the utter destruction this colossus can bring. He carries his bat like a scepter and speaks as an infallible messiah.

Despite skipping practices, he still manages to frequently belt home runs. He knows just how good he is and he isn't afraid to show it, whether it is by flipping off opposing pitchers or making an exaggerated cup adjustment in their direction. Entire club houses can't even contain this road warrior, as he has moved ten times between organizations over his career, including an incredible six times since 2001.He has racked up more miles than Moses.

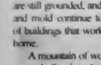
All this being kicked around is not because Everett is not a nice guy. While in Boston he would frequently invite the entire team to his house for dinner, though only a few may have showed up.

What makes Everett so infamous is the same as what makes him so great. While Barry Bonds was injecting himself with various performance-enhancing drugs, while Hollywood actresses were getting breast implants and facelifts, while government representatives were seeking legislation to satisfy their own ends, Everett stood up to tell the world that it was not going to change him.

In this day and age it is incredibly hard to find any men of strong conviction. People are too willing to sway with the majority, to just do what makes everyone else happy, to shy away from conflict. Carl Everett defies this trend, staring the majority in the face… and head-butting it. Everybody has an opinion, but Everett has an opinion on everybody, and everything.

When Congress began hearings on steroid use in baseball over a year ago, Everett was open as always when asked to comment. "We have a war going on — I have family, in that war — yet we're talking about steroids … If everybody in the world got on steroids, we'll still lose more kids to a war than we will from steroids." Everett in '08.

Jose Canseco is a "bitter, ignorant individual."



Beloved Wrigley Field, home of the Chicago Cubs, should be "imploded."

How can you not love a man like Carl Everett? Talk to most people today and you'll notice how easily their opinions change depending on the crowd they are with. Talk to Carl Everett and he'll hit you with the same forceful opinion every time. He won't back down, no matter whom he's with or what the odds are against him. Everett is a society of one, a true individual. When Voltaire said, "I may not agree with what you say, but I will defend to the death your right to say it," he was talking about men like Carl Everett.

Former teammate Ryan Dempster couldn't have said it better: "Carl Everett is the best player in the major leagues. Just ask Carl Everett."

The battle of New Orleans

Adam DeSimone

New Orleans has been destroyed. Blight and grief are pervasive and every day a battle is being waged to rebuild what has been lost. However, we are losing this battle. Areas 10 times larger than Amherst have been untouched since Katrina and hope is fading fast. Ghost towns have become the norm.

Trees lay on houses, windows are shattered, roofs are caved in, cars are still overturned, power lines are still grounded, and cockroaches and mold continue to multiply in tens of thousands of buildings that working class Americans use to call home.

A mountain of work needs to be done. The city is currently limping along and praying that we have not forgotten it. Yeah, I wish I was exaggerating, but lives have been ruined and telling anything but the raw, ugly truth would be an injustice and an insult to the forgotten citizens of New Orleans. I hope by writing this I will inspire action so that relief may be provided, construction may resume, and Americans can come to terms with this nightmare.

Entire neighborhoods do not have the essentials of life. Running water, electricity, gas, and even patched roofs are all luxuries for which many are no longer accustomed to.

When driving around the city, piles of rubble are despairingly conspicuous. Entire neighborhoods do not have the essentials of life. Running water, electricity, gas, and even patched roofs are all luxuries that many are no longer accustomed to. Instead, in many neighborhoods you are more likely to see houses blown off their foundations and slammed into an adjacent home. The Federal Emergency Management Agency provided trailers for immediate relief, but these are of little comfort. Besides the fact that the city requested over 40,000 units and received barely over 4,000, these temporary residencies have become permanent places of dwelling. To excuse these people's suffering by pointing to FEMA trailers — as some have tried to do — is appalling.

How could this have happened? How could an entire city be forgotten and left to rot? Answer: bureaucracy. As you read this article, tens of thousands of insurance claims are completely gridlocked. Government contracts and resource allocation have become so overly litigious that progress is not only virtually nonexistent, but a logistic impossibility. This problem is magnified by the fact the city's infrastructure is paralyzed from a crippling loss of income and the upcoming mayoral elections. As a result, rather than giving aid to the needy, millions are being spent to procure votes and maintain the status quo.

However, this is why the tale of hope must be told. As politicians, lawyers, and other rent-seekers prowl and scavenge, the human family has opened a new front in this battle. Right now, and for years to come, the city needs hands. It needs volunteers to go down to New Orleans and gut houses and remind the poor that there are people who still love them and will trek and labor for their wellbeing. Grassroots organizations thrive when bureaucratic ones are idle, and for the past few weeks they have enveloped the city. College students by the thousands have gone down on spring break and donated their time. While their labor isn't a cure-all, it has helped to restore basic dignity to those who are meek, old, and forgotten.

For spring break I had the privilege of being able drive to New Orleans under the leadership of the Catholic Newman Center and the Civic Interfaith alliance. Altogether, some 120 of us met the locals, listened to their stories, were humbled by their tears, shocked by their living conditions, angered by the government's response, and were, perhaps, as empathetic as possible.

As impossible as it is for any of us to wrap our minds around the complete level of human suffering left in Katrina's wake, I will leave you with the story of a man named Joe, whose house my team helped gut. Joe had lived in his one-story lower-middle class house for over 35 years. During the storm he left his house because his daughter had begged him to do so, and, at 75 years of age, he preferred to escape the immediate chaos of the hurricane's aftermath. As the storm passed and the levy behind his house failed, his home was plunged under 11 feet of water and sat for three weeks before the waters ebbed. When he returned home all of his life's endeavors had been destroyed. When my group met him, his eyes told us that he was distant, dazed and absolutely defeated. He was in every way dead and seemed to be waiting for the next life to come — because this one was simply too unbearable to deal with.

Please, if it is in your power, contact the Newman center, the Red Cross, the United Way, or any other organization that sends volunteers. The need is unprecedented. It is urgent, and with your time you can help one person, one family, and one city recover what it has lost. We have not lost this battle yet, but New Orleans needs hands, and we all have two of them to give.

A warning to all: today is no ordinary day

Gilad Skolnick

While today might seem at first glance like just an ordinary day, I assure you that it is quite the contrary. History has marked this day as a day plagued with unfortunate events, a day which has been riddled with curses. It's a sad day, a day worthy of some sort of grieving or sulking.

After all, it was on this exact day in 1999 that our beloved fashion model Fabio was riding a roller coaster when his face slammed into an innocent goose flying about. The goose has never been the same, not only physically hurt but most likely psychologically traumatized. Just imagine the look on that goose's face when it suddenly turns and sees a Fabio face zooming straight at it at 100 mph. It probably froze, captivated by his eyes; I assume it just couldn't look away. If only it had waited another minute to leave that pond.

Fabulous Fabio ended up needing nose surgery to overcome this goose assault. It was on this very day, seven years ago, that the childhood hero for many was destroyed, that the lives of many were shattered as the person they had grown to admire viciously attacked a goose, and some would even go as far as to say that he lost to it. Ever since then I have avoided geese at all cost, and when necessary, wear a heavy scarf over my face when in the vicinity of our campus pond.

Our nation was put in great peril on this very day as some nut shot then-President Reagan in the chest, but due to advanced modern surgery, Reagan survived. A sketchy Vice President Bush Sr. briefly took command of the country, but luckily Reagan survived. He would go onto eventually win the Cold War for us against the evil reds by brilliantly expanding our deficit and splurging on unnecessary arms.

The would-be assassin John Hinckley, Jr. was apparently a lover of historic traditions, trying to keep the curse of Tecumseh going. From 1840 every president elected in the 20 year cycle died while he was still president, which means the person who was president in 1840, 1860, 1880, and so on died while in office. As we all know Roosevelt, who was president in 1940, died in office, Kennedy was president in 1960 and died in office, so Reagan who was president in 1980 was supposed to die in office. Luckily this curse was put to an end due to Hinckley's Cheney-esq marksmanship.

Not to mention exactly on March 30 in 1867 when Alaska was purchased by the US from Russia. Papers dubbed this Seward's Folly, as over two cents an acre was wasted on this useless land. Since then Alaska has been dangerously under-populated with people and overly infested with violent wildlife, such as the unreasonable Caribou, with their sharp pointy weapon-like antlers and their tendencies to take over oil-rich land areas.

Some even point to the root of sadness attributed to this day on Prince Wilhelm George of Sleeswyk-Holstein-Sonderburg-Glücksburg, who on this very day in 1863 is chosen as King George I of Greece, forever torturing Greek historians with impossible, obscenely long names to memorize and spell. George I opened Greece's 1896 Olympics but was assassinated by some nut.

I say Hymen Lipman's invention of a pencil with an attached eraser in 1858 on this day is among the worst thing that has happened on this day, encouraging countless generations of youngsters to be careless, make mistakes, and ditch the much more graceful pen. His invention led to an unexpected surge in pencil usage, resulting in unneeded splinters, cuts, lead and graphite poisoning, and the loss of many fine trees. I am sure if he had known of the consequences of his escapades, Hymen wouldn't have been so drawn to experimenting with wood.

Or perhaps it was the creation of the Florida territory on the 30th of March, 1822 in the US that plagues this day, an event that just puts salt in the wound. The creation of the unfortunate territory of Florida, which led eventually to the creation of the state, had led to the subjecting of tens of thousands of innocent Americans to terrorizing attacks from the ferocious manatees that plague the Floridian waterways.

Furthermore, Florida has served as a hotbed of rodent propaganda, spearheaded by Walt Disney and his company, who have done so in an effort to make the mouse into something "cute."

Furthermore, Florida has served as a hotbed of rodent propaganda, spearheaded by Walt Disney and his company, who have done so in an effort to make the mouse into something "cute." Generations of Americans have had their opinions of an animal that helped spread the bubonic plague in Europe, wiping out a third of the population, perverted by such awful propaganda.

What are the chances that just on one day in history, six so very terrible things would happen? Two or three are plausible, but six is beyond mere chance: it is obviously a cursed day. It is just urged to all that you are especially vigilant today when crossing the street, and remember to look both ways. Be especially careful about taking candy from strangers or talking to them, and stay away now more than ever before from such menaces as geese and Florida.

All that gray area

Jennifer Lane

Abortion: this lonely word makes my skin crawl. The war makes me feel rage, and yet I have a tender spot. Feminists: I don't like any of them. (Okay, maybe a few.) Wal-mart is one of the best places to shop, but maybe some of those activists have a point.

The point is there can only be two solid opinions in these situations. With the society that we live in, not everything can always be black versus white. There are too many gray areas and people haven't had a chance to explore those areas without eventually having to choose between black and white.

Take abortion, for example. I believe that sometimes it's necessary. I am a woman and it is a woman's choice whether or not to have the baby. But I am also a Christian and sometimes I believe that it's wrong. I have two opinions, so how can I be truly pro-choice or pro-life?

Life is like that all the time. It's not just these huge issues that lie in media we read everyday. We have gray areas in our own personal future, our past and always in our present moments. Sometimes I have trouble deciding between Cheerios and Lucky Charms, but I forget about the Frosted Flakes that are lying in the middle. What is the right decision to make? What will help me now and in the future when there are only a few "acceptable" opinions?

What is the right decision to make? What will help me now and in the future when there are only a few "acceptable" opinions?

Life can be just that: gray. In fact, those who believe in only black and white have a closed opinion and a closed-eye view of the world. Their eyes are wide shut and they need to push through to the other side, where there is light on both issues. Each viewpoint in the world has good ideals, or they wouldn't be an issue in society.

The people protesting Wal-mart have a point. I was going to write an entire article on how much I don't like most protesters. It was going to be on how unnecessary it is to protest naked on a common or place signs in my building about how awful Wal-mart has always been. But then it got me thinking that they may be valid in some ways. It takes a brilliant amount of courage, knowledge and understanding to do what they do.

These people take the issues that they believe in and they broadcast them to the world. It's obnoxious at times, but when I'm 70, I'm still going to be telling the naked activist story. It's not something that will ever leave me. So although I don't always believe in them, I appreciate where they could be coming from during some of their protests.

The protesters are similar to some of the feminists I know. I usually say a lot of their ideals are out of control and over the top. I'm the type of person that likes making cookies and bringing sandwiches to my boyfriend when he's at work. I like the idea of eventually having some flexibility in my job so I'll be able to be a good mom in the future.

The feminists believe an unequal society should be equal. However, some things can never be fully equal. Women can have children and men can pee standing up. I understand that the feminists want women to have certain rights, but some things won't ever change.

I say I don't like activists, feminists, pro-anything pertaining to the war. And yet I'm friends with all those people. One of my good friends left for Iraq this past Friday. I'm going to send him packages, notes and letters to let him know that we all love him. I'm going to contact him as often as I can to make sure he's going to come home safe. So in a way, if I support him, there is a part of me that supports what's going on over there. I'm very pro-troops and always antiwar. In actuality that doesn't make any sense. That is why we need a gray area "representative."

There are only two large parties in the United States and I identify with both of them. I've been brought up to be very a conservative protestant Christian. I am, however, a semi-liberal theater major and I have a lot of unique friends. Each opinion that I have can be wishy-washy because of my values and daily influences. I have many friends and people I know who are in the same situation.

Black, white and gray issues each deserve a fighting chance and some light shone on their existence. So even though abortion can be wrong, it's lonely. Even though the war is tough, I'm praying. Even though I want to be a mother, I want the rights I deserve. And even though the activists hate Wal-mart, I still think they have great prices.

I say I don't like activists, feminists, pro-anything pertaining to the war. And yet I'm friends with all those people.

'V for Vendetta' Slices the box office

By Jeffrey Horowitz
Collegian Staff

It seems to be the right time for a return of comic book heroes. "Batman Begins," "Sin City," "X-Men 3," "Spider-Man 3," "Superman Returns" and now "V for Vendetta." V, a less familiar superhero, comes from a more mature line of comic books that demonstrate creative ideas and serious drama. Brought to life by Alan Moore, it's a futuristic look on how government could be at another time. It creates a Britain that is ruled by a dictator, a society where rights are limited, the press is monitored, and everyone is being watched.

It's not as though these kinds of governments have never existed and people like V have never rebelled. This is a concept that has been filmed and written to death, but "V for Vendetta" makes it feel fresh. The reason V is a unique superhero — other then his pitch-perfect eerie looking mask — is that comic book superheroes have rarely gone after fascist governments or corrupt societies. V not only disregards crime, he encourages it.

In the year 2020, America has been ravaged by a deadly virus and when chaos ensues, a ruthless dictator (John Hurt) overtakes Britain, first promising a cure and then a stable and controlled society. As time passes, his rules get increasingly unreasonable and within a matter of years the freedoms and liberties of a people are being choked away. There are strict curfews, censored televisson programs and a corrupt police force that imposes their own brand of punishment.

Citizens are forced into loyalty and anyone who disobeys the government is abducted, tortured and eventually killed. Their influence on the people is mainly exacted through their control of the press and their relentless surveillance. Through the news, they report stories of chaos and crime outside the walls of Britain because the dictator screams, "I want them to remember why they need us." Through their constant surveillance there is a relentless fear because they are always listening.

Only V (Hugo Weaving) decides it is time to end this rule. He blows up buildings and kills government agents. To keep things calm, the news reports that the buildings were scheduled for demolition and that the death of the latest government agent was caused by a stroke. It is not until he breaks into the air waves and confesses to the acts that anyone is sure he exists. He invites everyone to help him on the 5th of November to overthrow parliament and that is when the hunt for V begins. Detective Finch (Stephen Rea) is assigned to the case. He closes V down after another government agent that have sketchy pasts start mysteriously dying. Soon then the terrorist acts in film is about the detective discovering the truth about the masked man's past and how this government came to exist.

I have yet to mention Natalie Portman. She is the lead on the marquee of names. She plays Evey Hammond, a young girl who is nearly raped by corrupt cops until V saves her. She is brought into his world and finds him fascinating. She doesn't fully understand or support his cause until she becomes another victim to the very government he attempts to overthrow.

V is actually a third string. The [illegible] are Detective Finch and Evey, and the [illegible] their journey in learning what V already [illegible] realize this dictatorship must fall. The [illegible] by Rea, who must emerge into a [illegible] recognizes he's been serving an [illegible] still holds hostility toward V, who is [illegible] a terrorist, but a terrorist for good [illegible]

Portman is fine. She's more than just the [illegible] ing actress that fans [illegible] love with the hero because she [illegible] must [illegible]

Silversun picks up good rating

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Coming out of California, Silversun Pickups have begun to emerge on the national scene thanks to their debut LP, "Pikul." At times sounding like what the music early Smashing Pumpkins would make if they were founded today, and often sounding simply like an indie band that plays by their own dreamy, spacey rules, Silversun Pickups is a welcome breath of fresh air, even if they still have a few slight holes in their repertoire.

Coming out of the gate with the angsty, angry "Kissing Families," Silversun Pickups don't sound initially impressive; in fact, the chord progression recalls the Verve Pipe's power-ballad "The Freshmen" sped up to alterna-rock pacing. The track that follows that, "Comeback Kid," still sounds like a band that listened to too many Smashing Pumpkins records, though it is a bit catchier then its predecessor. If the record was to end there it would probably stand as a largely unimpressive, though in no way offensive, release by a young band. Those two songs hint at subtleties, originality, and innovative songwriting but never quite reach their marks.

Silversun Pickups
'Pikul'
Dangerbird Records
Rating 7/10

Luckily, the record does not end there. For the remaining tracks, Silversun Pickups proves they are not simply a band to watch — but a band to watch out for. Meshing dreamy melodies, courtesy of both male and female vocal parts, and raw, noisy guitars, Silversun Pickups is most definitely informed by the shoegaze movement but has moved decidedly away from it. The songs on "Pikul" are fully developed, every inch crawling in sound and atmosphere, but are never dense or suffocating. "Bookmart Devil" and "The Fuzz" are perfect ways to establish the band's sound to a new listener, smooth, almost sunny, but with a sly, dark edge. "Creation Lake" is a far quieter track, an example of just how delicate the band can make their music.

However what is easily the centerpiece of "Pikul" is "… All The Go Inbetweens," an almost eight-minute epic that is intriguing, powerful, and wholly original. It's a capsule of exactly what Silversun Pickups is capable of and a preview of the promise they offer. While all of "Pikul" has an original feel and sound, "… All The Go Inbetweens" is something of a masterwork; buzzing guitars nip at the atmospheres of the verse while the vocals create a subtle panic that is overwhelmed with the warm ease that characterizes the band's vocal style. As far as album climaxes go, it is hard to find something to dislike with what is ostensibly the final track on "Pikul."

The album's actual ending comes with an untitled secret track and while it doesn't exactly match the massive highs that the previous song grabbed with effortlessness, it isn't a disappointment either.

Silversun Pickups may be young but it is already clear that they deserve far more acclaim and attention than they have been getting. While dozens of generic bands are topping charts and finding fame and fortune, it seems it is always the lot of the truly original, exciting bands to be looked over by the masses; hopefully Silversun Pickups will be an exception.

Nine Black's new album lame

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Coming out of England, Nine Black Alps has a distinctly American sound, informed mostly by Nirvana and the grunge revolution of the early-to-mid '90s, though hints of the post-post-grunge wave (i.e. The Vines) creep into the music more often then they should. "Everything Is," the band's debut album, has already proven to be a success in their native land and has begun to make a splash stateside. Unfortunately, for the most part, Nine Black Alps simply provide the generic, cookie-cutter, quote-unquote alternative rock that followed in Nirvana's wake.

With slick, polished sounds and safe, predictable songwriting, Nine Black Alps seem determined to keep on driving stakes into the once mighty genre. What once stood for individuality and operating outside the corporate-rock playground has long become the standard for bland modern rock. Nine Black Alps is nowhere near the treacherous watered-down-to-the-point-of-drowning terrain of Nickelback, Creed and their counterparts, but they do walk the fine line that has sunk countless grunge imitators. Singer guitarist Sam Forrester's made-for-radio vocals propel the opening songs, "Get Your Guns" and "Cosmopolitan," the latter a predictable if well-intentioned attack on the titular magazine, and establish exactly what Nine Black Alps set out to do.

Later songs like "Unsatisfied" and "Shot Down" simply continue to drive the point home: "Everything Is" lacks any semblance of diversity save for the requisite acoustic numbers — and everything from the lyrics to the chord progressions to the guitar progressions all sound as if they were concocted from the same formula in the post-grunge laboratory.

Nine Black Alps
'Everything Is'
Interscope Records
Rating 2/10

Self-loathing and angst are well accounted for and Forrester makes sure to incorporate plenty of the gun violence imagery that his worked so well for other bands without checking twice to see if he actually has a clever lyric on his hands to cut to the chase; 99 percent of the time he doesn't. "Just Friends" pushes the limits of acceptable songwriting in the wrong direction.

For all its faults, "Everything Is" does have a few bright spots. "Not Everyone" seems more influenced by The Pixies and Sonic Youth and, while it just feels like a witless rip-off of those groups, it is a bit refreshing to see that Nine Black Alps' CD collection at least stretches beyond just the most obvious artists of the alternative generation. "Invisible" is flat-out catchy, a high-energy track that could propel an album full of more thoughtful, less bland modern rock, sadly, it just stands as the sole bright spot on an otherwise dull album.

Nine Black Alps is not the worst thing to happen to modern rock music, in fact, they are far from it. However, "Everything Is" simply brings nothing to the table that hasn't been done thousands of times before by far better bands. It's almost enough to make one long for the days of Candlebox.

Hailing from Manchester England in 2003, the band is influenced by The Beatles, Pixies, and The Flaming Lips.

Animated films' new popularity

By Jack Mathews
New York Daily News

During a bus trip to the Alaskan set of a 1983 Disney live-action movie, I got into a conversation about the declining status of animated movies and boldly predicted to the Disney executive sitting next to me that the genre was about to become extinct.

For a while, I was a sage.

Not a single animated feature was released in the U.S. in 1984, and the five released in 1985 sold less than $50 million worth of tickets combined.

Then, in a blur of blockbusters that began with "Who Framed Roger Rabbit" (1988), we saw Disney's resuscitated animation division churn out the instant classics "The Little Mermaid" (1989), "Beauty and the Beast" (1991), "Aladdin" (1992), and "The Lion King" (1994), followed by Pixar's first soldier in the computer-animation revolution, "Toy Story."

In 2001, 10 years after "Beauty and the Beast" became the one and only animated movie ever nominated for Best Picture, the Academy decided to give the animated feature its own category. The first winner: "Shrek."

How healthy are animated movies today? Well, in 2004, the top five animated films sold more than $1.1 billion worth of tickets in the U.S. and Canada. The three films nominated for Best Animated Feature that year outgrossed the five live-action nominees, $858.6 million to $401.5 million.

And in 2006, 22 years after the shutout of '84, the major studios, along with the new Weinstein Co., plan the wide release of at least 14 new animated features. "Hoodwinked" and "Doogal" have already been released, and animation's first box-office sure thing — "Ice Age 2: The Meltdown" — opens Friday.

Where heads were down two decades ago, people in animation today are as cheery as investors in a bull market.

"I think people will look back at this period as the Golden Age of animation," says Yair Landau, vice chairman of Sony Pictures Entertainment, whose animation division will release its first in-house computer-animated feature ("Open Season") in September. "There used to be one studio putting out animated product; now, there are multiple entities."

IDT Entertainment is one of several new independent companies dedicated to computer animation. Its first feature — "Everyone's Hero" — will be released by Fox in September.

"This is a very exciting time," says Janet Healy, IDT's president of animation. "I feel like we're at a moment where we're reinventing the medium again."

Healy has been at the forefront of every major technical breakthrough in the last 20 years. She worked for George Lucas' Industrial Light & Magic, then worked on computer animation at Disney, and followed its animation guru, Jeffrey Katzenberg, to DreamWorks.

She says the big change driving the current boom in animation is the breakdown in resistance of veteran animators to the new computer technology.

"Technology is not even a discussion anymore," she says. "We have enough qualified, off-the-shelf software and fast machines to tell whatever story we want. Whatever images we imagine, we know we can make."

While computer animation dominates the field, it's not the only medium. None of last year's Oscar nominees were computer-animated. The Oscar winner, "Wallace & Gromit: The Curse of the Were-Rabbit," and Tim Burton's "Corpse Bride" were done with models and stop-motion. The third nominee, Hayao Miyazaki's "Howl's Moving Castle," was traditional hand-drawn cell animation.

This year, we'll see two movies — "Monster House" and "A Scanner Darkly" — where the computer animation is done over live-action performances, creating images that are both cartoonish and photorealistic.

But, as virtually everyone interviewed for this story agrees, the medium is not the message — the message is.

"Pixar's CG is fantastic, but their movies work because they know how to tell stories," says Spaz Williams, who directed the upcoming "The Wild." "I look at 'South Park.' It's the worst animation technique in the world, but the stories are great."

As you scan the list of animated movies opening this year, you're struck by the star wattage of their casts.

"It's great fun for the actors," says Sandra Rabins, who heads Sony Pictures Animation. "It doesn't take a lot of time. They don't have to go through hair and makeup and sit around waiting for lighting."

And they can work in front of their kids if they want.

Charles Solomon, an author, journalist and animation expert, knows all the cycles of animation's history and says the only thing new today is the technology.

"I'm just old-fashioned enough to think that good stories are what makes good animation movies," he says. "And good animated movies stay on the shelves forever."

As for Arlene Ludwig, the Disney exec to whom I foolishly predicted the end of animation all those years ago, she refuses to gloat.

"I knew you'd come around," she laughed when I called to offer a long overdue retraction.

In second season, 'Desperate Housewives' is at a dead end

Created by March Cherry in 2004, the cast of Desperate Housewives includes Teri Hatcher, Felicity Huffman, Marcia Cross, Eva Longoria and 2006 Oscar nominee Felicity Huffman.

By Marisa Guthrie
New York Daily News

What has become of the ladies on our favorite cul-de-sac? It feels like only yesterday that we were basking in the conspiratorial glow of their relatable problems and insecurities: the choice between career and kids; the brutal epiphany that only one of you was committed to the marriage; those humiliating post-divorce romantic missteps; the pain and frustration that come from being labeled a slut. (You know who you are, Edie.)

This year, the Desperate Housewives have become a tad too desperate, leaving fans scratching their heads.

Lynette has turned into a status-quo corporate cog, engaged in a predictable office turf war with husband Tom. Susan is too narcissistic to be believed, and she's apparently now engaging in health-care fraud (thank you very much for becoming part of the skyrocketing health insurance premium problem, Susan); Gabby and Carlos have taken selfishness to new lows; and Betty Applewhite and her problem child proved utterly disposable.

To borrow from the network's promotional tag line — it's just not so juicy.

"The clever wit of last season has been flushed down the toilet in favor of silly slapstick," wrote one fan on the reality TV world.com message board. "Last season this show was more cerebral. Now, it's just stupid."

"Desperate Housewives" premiered to glowing reviews and truckloads of magazine covers. The show was an immediate hit that put faded TV starlets Teri Hatcher, Marcia Cross and Nicollette Sheridan back on the rag-mag radar and yanked Eva Longoria out of the B-movie basement.

But a backlash began when creator Marc Cherry seemingly wrote himself into a corner by tying up the mystery of Mary Alice Young's suicide with a neat little bow.

"They raised the bar so high [in the first season] that it kind of lends itself to disappointment," says Brad Adgate, senior vice president of research at Horizon Media.

"It's like you get a rock band together and they put a fantastic first album out because they spent 20 years working on it and then it's like, what do you do for a follow-up?"

What you don't do, say fans, is introduce new characters (the Applewhites) and then fail to imbue them with any intrigue.

"Where are the Applewhites, AGAIN," wrote an exasperated fan after a recent episode in which Betty and her sons failed to register "Either include them in the plot line or just have them move away. The whole thing is ridiculous and tiresome now."

The show is also falling victim to that annoying reality of network television: the rerun.

"I'm sure ABC and Marc Cherry would love to do 52 episodes, but it just is not practical," says Bill Carroll, director of programming for Katz Television Group. "I think viewers are frustrated. With a serialized drama, you want the story to move along."

Indeed, like starved castaways on a desert island, desperate fans lapped up the first new episode in nearly a month when ABC, surely in an effort to rain on "The Sopranos'" premiere parade, scheduled (oh, happy day) a new episode.

And thank goodness for Bree, the queen of sublimation.

"It's totally believable that Bree would insist she doesn't have a drinking problem, but go to AA for 'appearances,'" wrote a fan on the Television Without Pity message board. "I loved how that played out."

Ah, but for every delectable trip to the Van De Kamp funhouse, there is ... Susan.

Teri Hatcher's solipsistic singleton is quickly becoming the cul-de-sac killjoy.

A sampling of fan reaction:

"Susan is my least favorite character."

"Susan is about as deep as a puddle."

"I loathe Susan with a capital HATE! Can't stand her. Wish her spleen would wander to her heart and kill her. She's a horrible, selfish person, and an even worse mother."

Well, that smarts.

To be fair, the show is still holding steady at No. 4 in the Nielsens and raking in more than 22 million viewers for new episodes. And even competition from the breathlessly hyped return of "The Sopranos" didn't put a dent in "Desperate Housewives'"

Sunday-night coffee klatsch. But it remains to be seen if the show can build some momentum leading into the final weeks of the second season. And then there's an entire third season to worry about.

"I'm not trying to trash Marc Cherry or anything," says Adgate, "but the story lines are not as crisp as they were a year ago. They're going to have to come up with something next year that's going to draw more interest with the viewers and get them engaged with the show again."

Because no one wants to be a one-hit wonder.

Here are some signs of series' sluggishness —

Baby and Mama Drama: Attempts by Gabrielle and Carlos (Eva Longoria and Ricardo Chavira) to find a baby to adopt have not left fans with that warm and fuzzy feeling.

Betty Who?: Fans reacted with a collective yawn to the addition of Betty Applewhite (Alfre Woodard) to Wisteria Lane and her boy-in-the-basement story line.

Me Time: Teri Hatcher's Susan has taken navel-gazing to new depths. Her recent sniveling over Mike had the pungent whiff of the pathetic.

Automatic: The formerly intriguing Mike (Jamie Denton) is stuck in a loop: Reach into cupboard; remove gun; hold gun near face; sneer; repeat.

Work It: Tom and Lynette (Doug Savant and Felicity Huffman) are embroiled in a tedious interoffice power struggle.

Three TV homes away from homes:

Waiting for "Desperate Housewives" to recapture its mojo can be a bore. But there are some alternative sources for frothy thrills.

—"Footballers Wive$," Sundays at 10 p.m. ET on BBC America

The tagline of this British import — "Everyone plays dirty" — says it all. Unlike "Housewives," which seems to be struggling through an identity crisis, this prime-time soap revels in its high-camp, lowbrow excitement. Kidnapping, suicide, death by anorexia, botched plastic surgery, pregnancies and half a dozen deaths a season — "Wive$" is a Cheez Whiz thrill ride that knows how to shock. (And because it's on cable, it can show naked butts and sexual devices that Rex Van De Kamp could only fantasize about.)

—"The Real Housewives of Orange County," Tuesdays at 10 p.m. ET on Bravo

The real-life wives living in the Coto de Caza gated community in Southern California revel in their "me-ness." The minutiae of their lives — Botox, breast implants, $100,000 cars, afternoons at the club and marathon gossip sessions — is so much more over-the-top than anything you'll see on "Desperate Housewives." And that's exactly the point.

Vicki, Kimberly, Jeana, Lauri and Jo would be fast friends with the "Footballers Wive$." But we're not so sure about those other "Housewives."

Says executive producer Scott Dunlop: "The rumor is that the 'Desperate Housewives' cast has a picture (of the 'Real Housewives') hanging up and they're throwing darts at it."

—"Suburban Shootout," Wednesdays at 9 p.m. ET on Oxygen.

The women of Little Stempington have some real skeletons in their walk-in closets. This UK import chronicles the turf war between power-hungry housewives who run an illegal hormone operation out of their perfectly appointed homes. "Desperate Housewives" meets "The Sopranos," this series is filled with fisticuffs, explosions and more gunplay than a "Rambo" movie.

UM faces Penn State

The Minutemen enter Saturday's contest winners of their last three games and will need to be on top of their game when they face the Nittany Lions, as Penn State has won three of its last four games, including an 11-6 victory over ECAC foe Fairfield last Saturday.

"Penn State is a really good team," Cannella said. "They have great athletes and great size. They have some really talented guys. It's an overall well-rounded team."

The Minutemen have benefited from a favorable home schedule in the early goings, as they have played five of their seven games at the friendly confines of Garber Field. The trip to Happy Valley is by far the longest thus far for the Minutemen, as it is the first game they will play outside of New England this season.

Another issue the team will have to deal with is playing on the natural grass at Jeffrey Field. While the players prefer playing on grass, this game required a change in the team's routine, as this week's practices were held on the lower Boyden fields.

Cannella does not expect the field to have a negative effect on the Minutemen.

"You just prepare for it the best way you can," Cannella said. "So we've been practicing this week on grass. Hopefully the field at Penn State won't be in as bad of shape as the field we have here."

Junior midfielder Brian Jacovina has registered nine points on three goals and six assists this season for UMass.

Final Four an ACC reunion

By Chuck Schoffner
Associated Press

For the Atlantic Coast Conference, the road to the women's Final Four was as easy as counting to three.

OK, maybe not so easy, but the journey still ended with three.

In an unprecedented achievement for a conference, ACC powers North Carolina, Duke and Maryland all are headed to Boston for the national semifinals Sunday. Never before has one league advanced so many teams so deep into the NCAA tournament, now in its 25th year.

The outsider is LSU, which hardly needs an introduction to Final Four audiences. The Lady Tigers of the Southeastern Conference are going for the third straight year, the only team standing in the way of an all-ACC final.

"LSU's got to feel like the Lone Ranger," ESPN analyst Nancy Lieberman said.

Notice anyone missing? Yep, neither Tennessee nor Connecticut, who have won a combined 11 national championships, is in the field. It's just the second time in the last 12 years that at least one of them failed to make the Final Four. Six times in that stretch, they both made it.

Tennessee was eliminated by North Carolina in the Cleveland Regional final. Connecticut lost to Duke in front of a pro-UConn crowd in the Bridgeport Regional final.

Even without the sport's two marquee programs, this is an impressive group.

Each has won at least 30 games. Duke (86-2), Maryland (83-5) and North Carolina (82-6) are the three highest-scoring teams in the country. LSU is one of the nation's top defensive teams and has Seimone Augustus, the only unanimous All-American and last season's national player of the year.

It's also a Final Four of favorites. North Carolina, Duke and LSU all are No. 1 seeds, while Maryland is a No. 2. What's more, they held four of the top five spots in the final AP poll, with North Carolina finishing No. 1.

An underdog? Not in this bunch.

North Carolina (33-1) meets Maryland (32-4) in the first semifinal at TD Banknorth Garden, putting the Tar Heels against the only team that beat them this season, Duke (30-3), a 30-game winner for the sixth straight season, will carry the ACC banner against LSU (31-3).

"We've felt like we've had a great conference for the last two years," Duke coach Gail Goestenkors said. "It may be the best conference in the country from top to bottom. But until you can back it up and get teams to the Final Four and win the national championship, it's all talk."

North Carolina is the only ACC team that has won the NCAA championship, taking the title in 1994. This is the Tar Heels' first trip to the Final Four since then.

They've done it with a fast team that pushes the tempo at a breath-sapping pace on offense and rattles opponents with a swarming, trapping defense. The fastest of the fast is All-American Ivory Latta, the team's pocket-sized point guard who made one key play after another down the stretch against Tennessee.

"She's the engine that makes our offense go," North Carolina coach Sylvia Hatchell said.

North Carolina's '94 championship team also relied on a speedy point guard. You might know her better from another sport: Marion Jones.

Maryland earned the program's first Final Four trip since 1989 with an incredibly young team. The Terrapins start two sophomores, including second-team All-American Crystal Langhorne, two freshmen and a junior.

The thing is, they don't act their age.

"What makes this team so special is the fact that they don't take any of it for granted," Maryland coach Brenda Frese said. "They understand the big picture. There is no guarantee for us next year. They understand that."

Maryland beat North Carolina 98-95 in overtime at Chapel Hill on Feb. 9. Their third meeting this season will come a month after the Tar Heels beat Maryland 91-80 in the finals of the ACC tournament.

That familiarity does simplify one task.

"We both have our scouting reports already done," Hatchell said.

Duke is making its third Final Four trip in five years and fourth overall. Under Goestenkors, the Blue Devils have won ACC regular-season and tournament championships, they've been ranked No. 1 several times and they've won a game at the Final Four.

Now, they've got another chance to add the one thing they're missing: a national championship. This is why the team's star, Monique Currie, passed up a chance last spring to go the WNBA.

"We took a huge step making it to Boston," Currie said. "We've tried to keep that in the back our minds all season. It's finally here. We can get closer to what we want to do."

That same goal has driven LSU, which has a chance to double up because the men's team also made the Final Four. The Lady Tigers are 0-2 at the Final Four, losing to eventual national champion Baylor last year after blowing a 15-point lead.

"You want to go out on a high note," said Augustus, a senior and the nation's leading scorer. "It's a great opportunity to play the best ever."

Minutewomen end losing streak

strong in the second half, scoring five more unanswered goals to give the Maroon and White a dominant 14-4 lead with eight minutes remaining in regulation. The two teams would exchange goals in the next few minutes of action, but Vermont gave UMass a scare late in the game.

The Catamounts scored four straight goals in the final 2:46 of the game, with Millar's fourth of the contest coming with 1:20 left in regulation. It was all a tease, however, as UMass sophomore Jeannette Villapiano put the game on ice with a goal of her own just 20 seconds later.

McCarthy picked up her second win of the season, making nine saves and allowing only four goals in just over 37 minutes of action. Sophomore Krissy Anderson replaced McCarthy almost halfway into the second half, making three saves and allowing five goals in 23 minutes of play.

Senior Kerri Connerty tallied two assists in the game to tie Barbara Forbes for seventh all-time in career assists and moved into ninth place all-time in career points with 117.

UMass out-shot Vermont 29-27 and had 10 different goal-scorers in the win. Both teams were even in groundballs with 24, and in draw controls with 14 each.

UMass will be back in action when it hosts Boston College at 1 p.m. on Saturday at Garber Field.

The Minutewomen have only one more game to play before they begin Atlantic 10 play, and with half of the regular season already over, the team knows how important it was to grab a win against a strong Catamounts team.

"We needed it," Bolduc said. "It was good to play everyone. It was good to get that W before A-10 play. We only have one more non-conference game, so this one feels good."

Duke president urges patience

By Emery P. Dalesio
Associated Press

DURHAM, N.C. — The president of Duke University met Wednesday with students who feel his suspension of the lacrosse team during a rape investigation was not enough, urging them to be patient while police look into the matter.

"I don't want to say I'm satisfied, but I will say that what happened in there makes me feel like we're moving in a good direction," sophomore Bridgette Howard said after the roughly hour-long session.

The meeting between President Richard Brodhead and a few dozen students was closed to all media except Duke's student newspaper.

Brodhead suspended the highly ranked team from play until the school learns more about accusations that team members attacked an exotic dancer hired to perform at an off-campus party. The alleged victim, a student at nearby North Carolina Central University, has told police she was pulled into a bathroom, beaten, choked and raped by three men at a March 13 party, where she and another dancer were hired to perform.

Police collected DNA samples with a cheek swab from 46 members of the lacrosse team last week; the 47th player, the only black member, wasn't tested because the victim said her attackers were white.

No one has been charged, and the team's captains have said the tests will clear players.

News of the attack has sparked days of protest at Duke and in Durham, culminating Tuesday in Brodhead's decision to suspend the team. He stressed the suspension was not a punishment, but a response to the inappropriate nature of playing while the investigation is ongoing.

Those comments led about 100 students to approach Brodhead after Tuesday night's announcement and demand his administration deliver a stronger response.

"We understand that the legal system is that you are innocent until proven guilty," said sophomore Kristin High. "But people are nervous and afraid that these people are going to get away with what they did because of a wealthy privilege, or male privilege, or a white privilege."

Their protests led to Wednesday's meeting inside the campus' black cultural center, where participants said Brodhead urged patience as police continue to investigate.

Graduate student Michelle Christian complained Duke is continuing to downplay the alleged attack.

"They need presidents, they need administrators, they need faculty, to tell them that it was wrong behavior and that they are not going to be coddled because they are athletes, because they come from privileged backgrounds, because they have money," Christian told Durham's WTVD-TV.

The Duke lacrosse team has come under fire recently due to a rape investigation following a party held at an off-campus house on March 13. The team will be suspended from play until the matter is resolved.

Sampson ready for job

By Michael Marot
Associated Press

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — The opportunity to coach at Indiana was enough to finally lure Kelvin Sampson from Oklahoma.

Now he faces the pressure of returning one of America's most prestigious basketball schools, Indiana, to elite status.

The school scheduled an introductory news conference for Wednesday afternoon. Stephen Backer, a former Indiana trustee, said Sampson was on his way to the campus.

Sampson told his former players about the change Tuesday, the same day Hoosiers players also learned of the pending move — even as the two sides continued working out details on a contract and an NCAA investigation continued into Oklahoma's recruiting practices.

"It was definitely tough for him to do," freshman forward Taylor Griffin said. "It would be tough for anybody."

Last week, Sampson said he spent the previous 12 years dismissing rumors he was leaving for other jobs. Among those interested were North Carolina State and Illinois.

But with an NCAA investigation looming and one of college basketball's top schools calling, Sampson couldn't say no.

"I think any time you've got an opportunity to coach at a top-five program, you've certainly got to take a long, hard look at it," said IPFW coach Dane Fife, a former Hoosiers player who was consulted by athletic director Rick Greenspan during the five-week search that began after Mike Davis announced last month he would resign at season's end.

Oklahoma officials wouldn't confirm the departure, and phone messages left for Greenspan and athletic department spokesman Pete Rhoda weren't immediately returned. No news conference was scheduled, either.

Still, the news leaked. ESPN first reported the move Tuesday afternoon. Then a person close to the talks, who requested anonymity because of the continuing negotiations, told The Associated Press an announcement was expected shortly.

Later, the relative of one Indiana player said her nephew called Tuesday afternoon after Indiana's players were informed.

"He's looking forward to meeting him and getting to know him," said Stephanie Gilbert, the aunt of Hoosiers guard A.J. Ratliff who helped raise him in Indianapolis. "He seems pretty happy."

Ratliff initially declined to comment but later appeared to confirm the move when talking with television crews in Bloomington.

"He's shown that he can win at Oklahoma, so I think he can come here and do the same," he said.

The 50-year-old Sampson, AP's Coach of the Year in 1995, replaces Davis, who went 115-79 in six seasons as head coach. He was the first coach in school history to win 20 games in each of his first three seasons.

Davis also led the Hoosiers to the 2002 national championship game two seasons after Bob Knight was fired. Indiana beat Sampson's Sooners in the Final Four to reach the title game before losing to Maryland.

The early successes, though, couldn't overshadow Davis' failures. Indiana missed the NCAA tournament in 2004 and 2005 before returning this year. The Hoosiers went 19-12 in Davis' final season and reached the second round of the NCAA tournament before losing to Gonzaga.

Sampson's new task: winning national titles at Indiana.

"I played against his team in the Final Four and what I noticed was that they played the right way," Fife said. "They were disciplined, hard-nosed and tough. If Indiana fans want to get back to being tough, I think he's the right guy."

Sampson leaves Oklahoma amid an investigation for possible recruiting violations. The NCAA is looking into more than 550 impermissible phone calls to recruits by Sampson and his assistant coaches. Sooners officials are scheduled to appear before an NCAA panel in Utah on April 21.

As part of their self-imposed sanctions, the Sooners fined Sampson's salary for a two-year period beginning in 2005 and restricted him from receiving any postseason bonuses. His recruiting was also heavily curtailed.

Kelvin Sampson (left) was named head coach of the Indiana basketball team on Tuesday. He will be in the shadow of legend Bobby Knight (right).

Wilson willing to go to minors, with hopes of returning to Sox

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Enrique Wilson is willing to go to Triple-A Pawtucket with hopes of rejoining the Boston Red Sox during the season.

"I don't have a choice," the utility infielder said Wednesday. "If something happens or somebody gets hurt, I think I'm going to be [in Boston] but I've got to wait and go to Pawtucket and work hard and wait for my chance."

Manager Terry Francona said the Red Sox told Wilson they'd like him to go to Pawtucket, although he hasn't been sent there yet. Alex Cora is Boston's utility infielder and is hitting .227 in six games after playing for Puerto Rico in the World Baseball Classic.

Wilson appeared in 15 games with just 22 at bats last year for the Chicago Cubs, but played all four infield positions. He signed with the Red Sox during the offseason as a non-roster player but his contract does not allow him to choose free agency rather than go to the minors.

He started his major-league career in 1997 with Cleveland, where he and Manny Ramirez became friends, and moved to Pittsburgh in 2000 before playing for the New York Yankees from 2001 to 2004.

He has played more than 100 games in a season once, in 1999 when he played 113 with the Indians.

In 17 exhibition games, he's batting .278 with one homer and four RBIs.

"I'm happy to be here and with this team that can be in the playoffs every year," Wilson said. "There are a lot of veteran guys."

Red Sox infielder Enrique Wilson said yesterday that he is willing to play for Triple-A Pawtucket, with the hopes of getting called up to the big leagues.

Red Sox third baseman Mike Lowell will be the team's starter to begin this season despite an unproductive spring training at the plate.

ROSTER NEWS

First baseman Hee-Seop Choi sat out Wednesday's game with a left hamstring injury suffered during Boston's 10-5 loss to the Cincinnati Reds on Tuesday night as the Red Sox appear intent on sending him to Pawtucket.

Righty hitting Kevin Youkilis will start on opening day Monday at Texas, Francona said. His backup is lefty J.T. Snow.

"I think Youk has had a great spring," Francona said. "He's still commanding the strike zone but his swings get more aggressive."

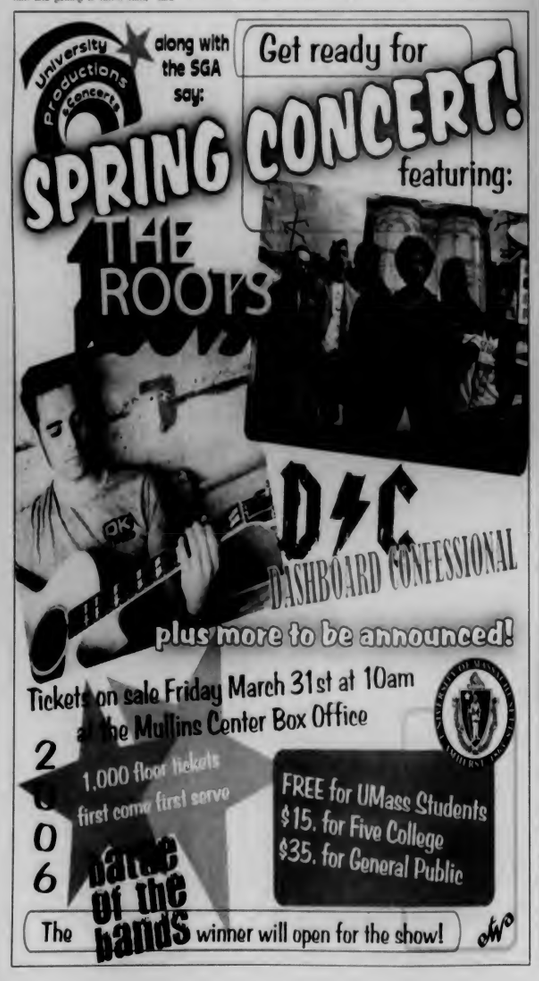
The 25-man opening day roster is expected to include pitchers Curt Schilling, Tim Wakefield, Josh Beckett, Matt Clement, Keith Foulke, Mike Timlin, Jon Papelbon, Julian Tavarez, Rudy Seanez, David Riske and Lenny DiNardo, catchers Jason Varitek and Josh Bard; first basemen Youkilis and Snow; infielders Mark Loretta, Alex Gonzalez, Mike Lowell and Cora; outfielders Ramirez, Coco Crisp, Trot Nixon, Wily Mo Pena and Adam Stern, and designated hitter David Ortiz. Francona has said pitcher David Wells will start the season on the disabled list and be activated before his scheduled first start April 12.

STICKING WITH LOWELL

Third baseman Lowell has been better with his glove than his bat, but Francona said he's not worried about his hitting.

"I think he's going to do fine," the manager said.

Lowell is coming off one of his worst seasons since he began playing for Florida in 1999 after appearing in eight games with the New York Yankees in 1998. He had career-lows last year of a .236 batting average and eight homers and drove in 58 runs.



This spring he is batting .267 in 17 games with no homers and one RBI. In Wednesday's 3-2 win over Pittsburgh, he had an infield single, a strikeout and a walk.

"He's a very good defensive player, solid guy. He'll take a walk and he's not going to hit fourth," Francona said. "There's a lot of times when guys come out of April with not a stellar batting average, but you know they're fine."

FOULKE SETBACK

Keith Foulke had the poorest of his three major-league relief outings Wednesday. He allowed his first hit, a single by Jeromy Burnitz, and a blast by Joe Randa that Ramirez caught for the third out as he crashed into the left field wall.

"I thought he left a couple of changeups up" in his only inning, the fifth, Francona said. "I don't think he was quite as sharp as he has been. He'll bounce back."

Minutemen travel to take on Nittany Lions

BY DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Prior to last Saturday's meeting with Loyola, Greg Cannella, the coach of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, made a concerted effort to motivate his team to play what he refers to as simply, "UMass lacrosse."

Cannella's efforts proved worthwhile, as the No. 7 Minutemen (6-1, 1-0 ECAC) got back to playing the physical brand of lacrosse he favors in the 14-9 win over the Greyhounds at Garber Field.

With another formidable opponent on the docket this weekend, one might expect Cannella to employ the same motivational tactics of a week ago. But Cannella is aware that such demonstrations are only effective when they are well-timed and not overused.

This is not to say that Cannella expects to see an uninspired team in maroon and white in Saturday's matchup at Penn State (3-3, 1-1 ECAC) at noon, it's just that he feels it is up to his players to get themselves fired up.

"I can't do that every game," Cannella said. "I think the players have to ride not only their own emotions, but each other's emotions. Coming out of that [Loyola] game they have an idea of their potential and where they can be."

It's a mystery to Cannella why the Minutemen lost their edge early in the season, but he knows that his squad cannot afford to have it happen again.

"I don't know," Cannella said about the cause of let-up. "Maybe you can point to the youth on the team; maybe it's complacency. You hope it's not, but that's something that's very hard to guard against — feeling like because I put on this jersey we're going to go out there and play well.

"In the landscape of college lacrosse it's not like that anymore. You have to show up and play your game every time out."

Even if the Minutemen had gotten away from playing "UMass lacrosse," it's not as if it showed, save for a 9-8 home loss to Albany on March 14. But with the challenging ECAC schedule now underway, Cannella knew the Minutemen would need to step up their game, and he was encouraged with the way they responded last weekend.

"We certainly had to remind ourselves of who we are and how we want to play," Cannella said. "It's great to see a team that is able to respond. That's a good sign of a team that really cares about what they're doing."

See MEN'S LAX on page 9

Senior attacker Sean Morris and the Minutemen take their show on the road this weekend as they travel to Penn State to face the Nittany Lions Saturday at noon.

Penn State a different team this time around

Forgive the Penn State Nittany Lions if they weren't on the top of their game during last season's April 2 meeting with the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team.

Just seven days before one of the most fun lax rivalries took center stage in Amherst, Penn State senior captain Michael Jacober's parents and younger brother were killed in a tragic plane accident when they were traveling from Florida to State College to see their son take the field against Fairfield.

Jeff Howe

With funeral services to attend, all of the traveling and little time to practice, the Nittany Lions came to UMass without any semblance of a routine schedule and a very heavy heart, and that added up to a flat showing.

The Minutemen steamrolled through Penn State 18-8 that afternoon and dealt the Jacober-less squad its fifth loss of the season against just two wins.

"They had a horrible week," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "It was a terrible tragedy for the Jacober family and for the lacrosse family. One of their guys really suffered. Certainly, it was a really hard week for them to come here, probably not practice all week and then play a game."

Don't blame the Minutemen. They were in the process of kicking off an eight-game winning streak that would take them to the NCAA Tournament's quarterfinal game. But Penn State may not blame them for anything because it was PSU's final dropped decision of the season, as it went on to win its final seven games to sneak into the NCAA Tournament before losing in the first round to Maryland.

Looking back on the condition of that 10-goal loss, though, and Penn State has all the motivation it may ever need to defend its home turf when the Minutemen pay a visit to State College on Saturday.

Plus, with a 3-3 overall record, the unranked Nittany Lions are once again looking for that one win that can jumpstart their season. They were just a week away from doing that against UMass last year so the veterans in the lineup like Brian Boyle, Nate Whitaker and John Erenus should be better prepared to handle a situation like this.

If that isn't enough, this is still one of the finer rivalries in the ECAC between two proud lacrosse programs.

"The UMass and Penn State game is always a really competitive game," Cannella said. "We're two similar schools as state universities and large schools. Certainly, they feel that they have the leadership and the ability to come out and beat us."

So, perhaps needless to say, if you think 18-8 is on this weekend's plate, you're greatly mistaken. This isn't to say Penn State is going to come out on Saturday and have its way with things. After all, the last time UMass made the trip to State College, the Maroon and White rocked PSU 17-8.

These two teams are growing to become pretty familiar with this situation. And with UMass stressing the importance of keeping its grit on a consistent basis on top of Penn State's urge to dispel the memories of last season's meeting, it will take everything these teams have to offer to walk off the field with a victory this weekend.

UM falls to Hartford

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Amongst the ubiquitous gravel, dirt and rubble scattered across the Hartford University athletic fields yesterday, a baseball game between the Hartford Hawks (2-17) and the Massachusetts baseball team — was played on the Hawks' brand-new, field-turf diamond.

It was the first time baseball graced the Hartford campus in 20 years. But the Hawks' historic day — which featured players from past graduating classes throwing out the first pitch — didn't end well for the Minutemen (2-11, 0-3 Atlantic 10), who dropped their fifth consecutive game, 6-2, to Hartford yesterday.

UMass	2
Hartford	6

UMass takes on its next opponent on tomorrow at 3 p.m. in Richmond, the first game of a three-game series with the Spiders.

The Minuteman bats were dormant, tallying only five hits, two came in the first inning and both runners were stranded; UMass went hitless until the ninth inning when three players — Bryan Garrity, Joe Cotone and Andy Teutken — ripped singles and got the Minutemen their only two runs of the afternoon.

"We were getting ourselves out," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "We were pressing too much at the plate. We're hoping to hit instead of sitting back, seeing the ball, throwing our hands and staying behind the ball. They're adjustments that each individual has to make."

Sophomore Ryan Franczek batted in the two-spot to start the game and laced a single to right field in the top of the first inning. The next hitter, shortstop Lou Proietti, followed with a single to left, putting runners on first and second with one out.

However, back-to-back strikeouts — first baseman Bryan Adamski and Garrity — ended the inning for UMass, and proved to be a microcosm of the Minuteman offense yesterday.

After the first-inning singles, the Minutemen didn't reach base until the ninth: Garrity and Cotone led off with singles, and second baseman Adam Tempesta drew a walk to load the bases with nobody out.

"We had three really good at-bats in the last inning where we stayed back, stayed behind the ball and got extension," Stone said. "That's the only way you can really hit good pitching — pitchers that can locate inside and outside with breaking balls."

Left fielder Travis Mumsey was next, and he hit a worm burner to second base which the Hawks quickly turned into a double play. That effectively ended the day for the Minutemen, who went down looking when lead off man Derrick Durepo watched strike-three into the catcher's mitt.

"We just got ourselves out in a lot of situations, transferring weight forward too much, trying to do too much," Stone said. "Even when we're taking pitches, we're landing hard on our front foot. You can't hit from that position."

The Hawks had lost their last 13 games going into yesterday's contest, but the combination of power hitting and errorless fielding had UMass on the run from the start of the game.

In the second inning, starting pitcher Tom Cote ran into trouble after striking out Hartford's clean-up hitter, Cote left a pitch up in the zone to Eric Price, who took it deep over the left-field fence for the Hawks first run.

Cote left a changeup over the middle for the next hitter, lefty Derek Litke, who hit a lined shot over the right-field fence, completing the back-to-back showing for the Hawks' five-six hitters.

Stone wasn't pleased with the pitching effort yesterday, citing location as the culprit for the sub-par performance.

"[The first home run] was a 1-2 pitch," he said. "We know what the count is and I call the pitches, it is just a matter of location. We want them to miss six-to-eight inches outside on that. Our location hasn't been good.

"We gave 1-2, 0-2 base hits that cost us runs again. We get up in the count and then give in to them. It's tough to win ballgames when you do that. I know we have young pitching and I think they're going to be pretty good, but it's taking a while for that to happen."

All three pitchers who took the mound for the Minutemen yesterday were freshman — Cote, Mike Dicato, Al Jardine — and inexperience could have played a role in the tight situations, especially when UMass was ahead in the counts.

"We threw all freshmen today, and until they get used to competing at this level they are going to make mistakes," Stone said. "Those things that they got away with at the high school level they are not going to get away with this year."

UMass sweeps doubleheader

BY ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts softball pitcher Jenna Busa had to tell somewhat of a fib to her teammates during the team's dismantling of Dartmouth in a doubleheader yesterday. Between innings, Busa and catcher K.J. Kelley would tell their teammates that UMass was losing 8-0 during Game 1, and losing 20-0 throughout Game 2.

UMass	8
Dartmouth	0
Dartmouth	0

The two seniors did this to keep the competitive spark going in their squad, because in reality, the Minutewomen routed the Big Green at the UMass Softball Complex 8-0 and 20-0. Busa and Kelley were making sure that the team did not feel too immortal yesterday afternoon.

"When we hit like this, it just creates a momentum in the game, and we become very unstoppable," Busa said.

The Minutewomen return to conference play this weekend, facing La Salle tomorrow in a doubleheader, beginning at 2 p.m., and taking on Fordham Sunday, beginning at noon. Both contests will be away from Amherst.

The hits came heavy all afternoon yesterday, but no more than during the bottom of the fourth inning of Game 2. With the Minutewomen already beating Dartmouth 8-0, Kelley was brought in on a walk, and the bases were loaded, as sophomore Stacy Cullington entered the game. Cullington then began a scoring frenzy, by knocking one deep to left field, and recording a grand slam.

Everyone followed the offensive trend and got in on the action, with double-RBIs by Whitney Mollica, Michea Holness and Kelley. A home run by freshman Emily Wehr came in only her second at-bat, and Samantha Salato capped off the inning with another homer, which increased the Minutewomen's advantage to 20-0.

UMass coach Elaine Sortino understands that bats can come alive at any moment in a contest.

"Hitting is contagious," Sortino said. "It's kind of the nature of the game, because people kind of pick up on each other."

Busa kept the defense in check and allowed just two hits, while striking out two in five innings, and feels that the defense is coming around in 2006. As a team, UMass hasn't allowed a single run in four contests, and Busa was able to get out of a jam at the end of Game 2, closing out the fifth inning with the bases loaded.

"At the beginning of the season, we weren't ready pitching-wise, our defense wasn't ready and we were still making routine balls look like they were jumping through rings of fire," Busa said. "Right now I think we still have a lot of things to work on, but we've come such a long way and I feel more comfortable on the mound and with my defense than I did at the beginning of the year."

Busa's counterpart and understudy, freshman Brandice Balschmiter, was on the mound in Game 1 and set the tone for the afternoon defensively, going five innings, allowing just two hits and recording four strikeouts.

With Balschmiter not giving the Big Green anything at all, Mollica jumpstarted the offense in the second inning of Game 1 with a rocket to leftfield, which nearly cleared the fence and drove in two runs, putting the Minutewomen up 4-0.

It wasn't until the fifth inning that UMass was able to get on the board again. After junior Amanda Acampora was hit by a pitch, sophomore Lauren Proctor dropped one behind second base, and put two on for UMass. Salato tripled to centerfield, and Procter was waved in by Sortino, building the UMass lead to 7-0.

Senior Lesley Ferrara put the contest away, bringing in the final run, and ending the game in the fifth inning. Both games ended after five innings due to the league's mercy rule that says a contest will not continue if one team is leading by eight runs after five innings.

The Minutewoman offense has been strong as of late, outscoring their opponents 43-0 in the past four games, including the 20-0 whipping of Dartmouth yesterday — a UMass single game record.

Mollica leads the team among starters in batting average with a mark of .378, as well as 23 RBIs. Acampora has knocked a team-high five homers out of the park this season, while the team has totaled 17.

The season is officially underway and Busa knows that since the team does not have to play as many national contenders as it did during the first half of the season, the team's confidence level will be given a boost.

"My confidence is a lot higher now, just because we're not playing teams as high caliber as the teams we were playing," Busa said. "When you have a great amount of confidence in a game, you do much better than if you don't."

Senior second baseman Kristi Stefanoni was 1-for-3 with a run scored and an RBI in the Minutewomen's two wins over Dartmouth yesterday.

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team snapped a three-game losing streak by defeating Vermont 16-9 yesterday afternoon at Garber Field. The Minutewomen (3-6) tallied their highest single-game goal total of the season in the win.

UMass	16
Vermont	9

Vermont (5-3) scored four of its nine goals in the final three minutes to cut UMass' lead down to just six with 1:21 remaining in regulation, but it was too little too late for the Catamounts, as UMass held on to win its third game of the season.

Freshman Holly Drown led the Minutewomen with a career-high three goals in the win. Drown's presence on the field paid dividends for UMass, as she had missed the previous two games due to an inflamed ribcage. UMass coach Carrie Bolduc was pleased to see her versatile freshman back in action.

"It's important for us [to have Drown back]," Bolduc said. "She's a midfielder for us, and she can play both ends. She certainly adds depth to our team."

Vermont controlled the ball to start the game, and put a good amount of pressure on junior goaltender Lauren McCarthy and the UMass defenders. The Catamounts ended their early attack with a goal from Kristen Millar just over two minutes into the game, giving Vermont a 1-0 lead. Millar had an impressive showing on the afternoon, finishing the game with four goals and one assist.

UMass then began playing very aggressively and caused a number of turnovers, which led to five unanswered goals in the next five and a half minutes, giving the Minutewomen a 5-1 lead. Another Vermont goal by Millar was followed by a 4-2 UMass run to end the first half.

The Minutewomen out-shot the Catamounts 18-12 in the first 30 minutes to head into halftime with a 9-4 lead.

Freedom for kidnapped journalist

Released American hostage, Jill Carroll, shown in the above photo in the news office of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian in 1980. Carroll was handed over to the Iraqi Islamic Party office in Amiriya by an unknown group yesterday.

Jill Carroll freed, safe and unharmed

University of Massachusetts alumna Jill Carroll, the American journalist who was kidnapped in Iraq on Jan. 7, was freed Thursday morning after 82 days of captivity.

"I was treated well, but I don't know why I was kidnapped," Carroll said in a brief interview on Baghdad Television yesterday, wearing a green head scarf and a gray Islamic robe.

Carroll was on her way to interview prominent Sunni Arab politician Adnan al-Dulaimi in a dangerous western Baghdad neighborhood, on assignment for the Boston-based Christian Science Monitor, when gunmen ambushed her car 300 yards from Dulaimi's office. Her translator Allan Enwiya was shot and killed.

Carroll appeared begging for her freedom on three videos that were broadcast on Arab television, the last of which was released on Feb. 9.

An insurgent group, the Revenge Brigades, claimed responsibility for the attack and threatened in two videotapes to kill Carroll if all female detainees in Iraq were not released by Feb. 26.

U.S. policymakers refuse to negotiate with terrorists, and the insurgency's demands remained unmet as the deadline passed.

On Feb. 28, Iraq's Interior Minister Bayan Jabr said Carroll was being held by the Islamic Army in Iraq, an insurgent group that freed two captive French journalists in 2004.

Over a month of silence later, Jill's father Jim woke at 6 a.m. yesterday in his North Carolina home to the phone ringing. "Hi, Dad. This is Jill. I'm released," he heard his daughter say.

"It was quite a wakeup call, to say the least," he said. "I was glad to see her on TV this morning. She's apparently in good health and mentally strong and we're all very pleased about that."

Carroll was dropped off near a branch office of the Iraqi Islamic Party at about 12:15 p.m.

She "introduced herself as Jill Carroll — and gave us a written letter in Arabic that asked the Islamic Party help her," Alaa Maki, a party member, told reporters.

Students, faculty elated with news of release

The University of Massachusetts played host to a media frenzy yesterday, after release of Jill Carroll, a freelance journalist for the Boston-based Christian Science Monitor and former UMass student, after nearly three months of being held captive in Iraq.

Concerned students and faculty shared in their elation upon hearing the news of Carroll's safe release.

"I can't even describe how thrilled I am," said Karen List, professor and chair of the journalism department. "I've been waiting for this day for 83 days. My heart feels lighter after hearing she's safe."

"I was freaking out," said Amber Vaillancourt, a sophomore Journalism major at UMass. "My mom called me at 7 a.m. She just said 'Good news, Jill's free.'"

Student Government Association President Pavel Payano was thrilled with the news of Carroll's release.

"I'm happy that our prayers have been answered, and that she's coming home safe and sound," said Payano.

Carroll, 28, who graduated from UMass in 1999 and was working as a freelancer for the Christian Science Monitor, was handed over to the Iraqi Islamic Party office in Amiriya, western Baghdad, by an unknown group. She was later turned over to the Americans and was taken to the heavily fortified Green Zone.

UMass officials held a press conference in the Fine Arts Center that was accompanied by approximately 15 news organizations.

While speaking at the press conference, List expressed her surprise upon hearing the news of her release.

"I didn't really believe it until I actually saw her speaking this morning in Baghdad," said List.

Michael Busack, Editor-in-Chief of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, said Carroll has been an inspiration to reporters working for the campus newspaper.

"It was tough, to have to go bed every night thinking, this could be me in a few years," said Busack, a senior. "She had enough guts to face danger."

"It's a nice mixture of joy and relief," said Matt Vautour, former Collegian editor, expressing his emotions towards Carroll's release. "I don't think the real emotional weight of it will hit me until later."

Over 100 people gathered on the UMass campus on Feb. 16, 2006 in a rally organized by Massachusetts Daily Collegian to support Carroll's release.

List, who's been in contact with Carroll's twin sister, Kate Carroll, said the rally would hold a deep meaning with Carroll upon her return.

"Jill's sister Katie actually said to me that the- rally, what happened at UMass, will mean more to her than anything else," said List.

"That makes every sleepless night worth it," said Busack, who did the majority of the organizing of the Free Jill Rally.

Carroll described as dedicated, inspired

Three months ago, Jill Carroll's name dominated the news world following her kidnapping by a group of Islamic militants. Yesterday, her name made headlines again when she was freed after 82 days of captivity. However, Carroll's famous capture is just one facet of the person Carroll is.

Carroll was born in 1977 in Ann Arbor, Michigan, where she later attended Huron High School. She then attended the University of Massachusetts Amherst where she began to prepare for her career in journalism.

Amy Sidoti, Carroll's old roommate, remembers that Carroll showed great dedication in all she did. Sidoti met her when she was on the UMass water polo team. However, Carroll "knew where she wanted to go... She quit swimming because she needed to start her journalism career," Sidoti said.

Carroll joined the staff of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian in 1998 and worked as a reporter and news editor.

"She lived and breathed and ate at the Collegian, and got home at two in the morning, and I would only see her on the weekends because she was at the Collegian the entire time," said Sidoti.

Others who know Carroll also spoke about her complete commitment to her work.

"She was a complete and total bundle of energy in here. It was very easy to get Jill fired up about stuff, and she loved being here. She loved journalism. She was saying back then she wanted to be a foreign correspondent," said Matt Vautour, one of Carroll's longtime friends and a former Collegian sports editor.

Ryan Benharris, a Collegian columnist during Carroll's time at the paper added, "She was a tremendous writer. I remember her editorials, her presence in the news room. She was just a very memorable person."

Karen List, the chair of the UMass Journalism department and one of Carroll's former professors, said that Carroll often expressed her desire to become a foreign correspondent.

"Jill didn't 'ultimately' want to become a foreign correspondent.

car to the party headquarters, where she was met by American officials and journalists and given gifts, including a Quran, according to the Associated Press.

"I don't know what happened," Carroll said in the televised interview. "They just came to me early this morning and said, 'OK, we are letting you go now.'"

Carroll emphasized that she was treated well in captivity. "It's important people know that — that I was not harmed," she said. "I was kept in a very good small, safe place. They gave me clothing, plenty of food. I was allowed to take showers, go to the bathroom when I wanted. They never hit me or even threatened to hit me."

She did not know where she was being held. "I once did watch television, but I didn't really know what was going on in the outside world," she said. "One time they brought me a newspaper."

Jill's freedom came only a day after her twin sister Katie made an appeal for her release, calling her sister an "innocent woman." The sisters spoke on the phone yesterday.

"She called me because she remembered my number. I was dreaming that this would be the way I'd find out — that she'd call me in the middle of the night like this," Katie said, according to the Monitor. "She sounded great. I just want to thank everyone who's prayed and given us support through this time, and we're obviously looking forward to some private time with Jill."

"I'm just happy to be free. I want to be with my family," Jill said in the interview.

Jill grew up in Ann Arbor, Mich. and graduated with a Bachelor of Arts in journalism from UMass Amherst in 1999, where she also worked as news editor of the Daily Collegian.

After graduation, she worked briefly for the Wall Street Journal. When she was laid off in 2002, she moved to Jordan and began working for the Jordan Times.

She immersed herself in the culture and learned Arabic. In an article published last year in the American Journalism Review, Carroll wrote that she wanted "to learn as much about the region as possible before the fighting began."

"There was bound to be plenty of parachute journalism once the war started, and I didn't want to be a part of that," she wrote.

Since she has been in the Middle East, Carroll's work has appeared in many publications, including the Monitor, AJR, U.S. News & World Report, and the Italian News Agency.

UMass journalism professor Norm Sims, who taught Carroll in two classes, said even when she was at UMass she "would take on stories that other people backed away from.

"She was undeterred by complications, very accurate. She could be empathetic with people," he said.

Unlike most Western reporters, who are unable leave the Green Zone in Iraq, Carroll moved through the streets of Baghdad, telling stories that were rarely covered by mainstream media. One article she wrote for the Monitor, titled "Ordinary Iraqis bear brunt of war," told the story of a family that was physically, emotionally and financially devastated by a car bomb 17 months earlier.

"Jill was going out and reporting on the streets and speaking Arabic to people. That's the right thing to do, and it got her abducted," Sims said. "Jill represents the reporting problem that has grown up in this war, where if you do the right thing you put yourself at tremendous risk."

Although Jill is free, Iraq remains the most dangerous place for journalists. As of Jan. 4, more reporters have been killed in the Iraq War than in 22 years of conflict in Vietnam, according to Reporters Without Borders. At least 86 journalists and media assistants have been killed in Iraq and 39 others have been kidnapped since the war started in 2003. Three Iraqi reporters are currently held hostage.

Karen List, another of Carroll's former journalism professors, said Jill's emphasis on the good treatment she received was unsurprising.

"Telling the reporter, 'This is what you need to emphasize,' that is so her," List said.

News of Carroll's release has been met with jubilation, relief, and gratitude.

"Jill is a courageous young journalist who embodies the highest ideals of her profession ... The entire University of Massachusetts community, including the faculty members who taught Jill, and the classmates who studied with her, are thankful for the efforts of all parties who worked so tirelessly to secure her release," said UMass president Jack Wilson.

A Pentagon spokesperson said the U.S. military did not pay a ransom or have any involvement in her release. The Monitor also said it was not aware of any monetary negotiations connected to her freedom.

"We're not shading. We're not hiding. We're just saying what we know. And to our knowledge, no one was paid by anyone," said David Cook, the Monitor's Washington bureau chief.

Instead, Jill's release has been attributed to the global outpouring of support, especially in the Middle East. The Jordan Times ran an editorial on Jan. 16 titled "Our Jill" that praised Carroll's "sincere admiration for Arab culture and utmost respect for the Arab people" and said her kidnappers "could not have chosen a more wrong target." Iraq's state television aired ads in February calling for her release.

A large photo of Carroll was hung outside the city hall in Rome, and Parisians held a rally at the Eiffel Tower for her release a month after she was captured.

At UMass, students and faculty attended a rally on Feb. 16.

"This is something that people have across the world worked for and prayed for and I think we are all very pleased and happy to hear of her release," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in a statement yesterday.

It remains to be seen how Carroll will react to the publicity.

"She's in an awkward situation. She went over there to cover this story, and then she became the story," Sims said. "My hope is that she had the opportunity to talk to her captors. I know if she did then she's got a story that can tell us a lot about them. She had the opportunity to talk with people that nobody else can interview."

List agreed that Carroll would not be comfortable with all the focus on her as an individual reporter.

"That really is going to become a big part of her story right now," List said. "My sense is that somehow she will take the spotlight off herself and somehow she'll use this experience to further illuminate what's happening to Iraqi people."

"I turned on CNN and they were reporting that she was safe," he said. "I got up, showered, and I've been doing interviews all day since."

Busack expressed his desire to meet with the woman who "has changed his life as a young journalist."

"I can't imagine what she's going through right now, but at some point, when she's ready I think it would be a privilege to meet the woman that I have such a deep respect for."

"It's a time to celebrate and rejoice," said Shaqullie Onikoro, a UMass student. "An American has had her life spared."

"I was shocked at first, and then amazed. I'm just really happy for her, all that she's gone through, especially since she's so passionate about it, and the people over there," said journalism major, Tammi Munn, a UMass senior.

"It's been a really tough semester so far, so I don't think any news could've made me any more happy than knowing that Jill got to come home safely," said Vaillancourt.

Some students contended that the entire Carroll ordeal has brought the campus closer together.

"There has been so much tension and unnecessary fighting on campus," said Mallary Kohlmeyer, Chair of Student Affairs. "But throughout it all, the entire campus has always supported the safe release of Carroll. I hope her release is something we can use to build on making this campus a better place for students."

She wanted to be a foreign correspondent now.

"She told me this on the first day of the first class she ever had with me. I tried to tell her that these were positions that you worked up to after years of zoning board meetings. I didn't know at the time she wasn't listening to me," List said in January.

This passion and dedication to her chosen profession that Carroll showed throughout college was reflected in the way she tackled her professional work.

Carroll worked with the Wall Street Journal as a correspondent in Washington D.C. before she became a freelance reporter for the Boston-based Christian Science Monitor in 2003 and moved to Baghdad soon after. She covered the war in Iraq from the point of view of the average citizens who lived there.

Nancy Youssef, a correspondent in Iraq with Knight Ridder News Service, told the Detroit Free Press that Carroll is "an exceptional journalist who is dedicated to telling the story of the Iraqi people."

Youssef says that Carroll immersed herself in the culture of the people she was covering. Carroll learned Arabic and studied the traditions of the Iraqi people. When working on the streets of Baghdad, Carroll even wore the traditional Muslim dress and headscarf.

COURTESY / MASS DEP.

UMass professor Karen List.

The following piece was originally published in the Daily Hampshire Gazette on Jan. 24, 2006. It has been republished with permission.

"Our Jill" was the headline on a recent editorial in the Jordan Times pleading for the release of the paper's former reporter Jill Carroll, who was kidnapped in Iraq on Jan. 7.

But before she was their Jill, she was ours.

Jill graduated from the journalism program at the University of Massachusetts in 1999. She told me on the first day of her first class with me that she wanted to be a foreign correspondent. I explained to her that those positions went to long-time reporters on large newspapers who had paid their dues covering zoning board meetings. I didn't know at the time that she wasn't listening to me.

After graduation, Jill worked briefly for the Wall Street Journal, then moved to Jordan where she worked for the Times while she studied Arabic and the culture of the Middle East. She has covered the war from Baghdad from its beginning as a freelancer, writing for many publications including the Christian Science Monitor.

In the best journalistic tradition, Jill covers the war not from her hotel in the Green Zone and armored cars, but from the streets. She moves through Baghdad wearing traditional Arab dress, blending in, speaking to Iraqis in their own language and giving voice to their stories.

Jill wrote recently in American Journalism Review that she went to the Middle East on her own because she would rather have jumped off a cliff than cover zoning boards. She prepared herself in depth to tell the most difficult story of our time, and despite the growing danger that she chronicled, she stayed with it for the love of that story and of the Iraqi people.

Karen List

For those who wonder why Jill was in such a dangerous place when she didn't have to be, the answer lies in her commitment to honest, compassionate journalism and her understanding of its significance in the world. If reporters like Jill were not in Iraq, we Americans would know only what the government wants us to know. And that is not enough when a war is being fought in our name.

Jill talked about journalism as a noble calling in the last paper she wrote for me in Journalism Ethics, for which she had interviewed a reporter from the Philadelphia Inquirer.

"At the end of the interview, I got up and danced around my kitchen," she wrote. "Journalists are not afraid to ask tough questions or risk themselves to get out the information people have a right to know. I believe reporters are humble crusaders with hearts of gold, mouths of sailors and pens full of unstoppable ink."

My comment in longhand at the end of her essay reads: "This paper is so great that now I'm going to jump up and dance around MY kitchen."

She'd developed that respect for journalism in part through her hard work as a UMass Daily Collegian reporter covering student government. Her reporting described some raucous meetings in detail, and those present were not always happy with her coverage.

In Baghdad, Jill didn't have to cover student government or zoning boards. She wrote about Iraqi families who had lost their homes. She wrote about Iraqi children trying to learn in damaged and desolate schools.

Last April, Jill wrote a beautiful tribute to an American woman who had been killed as she worked to get accurate counts of civilian casualties in Baghdad. Marla Ruzicka, a friend of Jill's who like her was 28 years old, died when she was caught between a suicide bomber and a military convoy.

"The only thing we can say now is at least she died doing what she wanted, doing what she really, really believed in," Jill wrote in the Monitor.

"If she were still here, she'd be most worried now about her driver's family and who will take care of all the other Iraqi families she was working with. She would point out, this happens to Iraqis every day and no one notices or even cares."

Jill, too, is doing what she wants to do. And like Marla, Jill would be uncomfortable, I think, with the media spotlight on her. One of her friends describes her as "aggressively humble." She is heartbroken I know over the murder of her translator, Allan Enwiyah, and worried about his family.

Jill's own family, her mother, Mary Beth, father Jim and sister Katie have shown tremendous strength and resolve in their quest to have her returned safely to them. She's always been their Jill.

But since 1997, she's been our Jill too. And we can't wait to see her again and to see her work enlightening the world. When that happens, you can bet we'll all be dancing in our kitchens.

Students held out hope for safe return of UMass grad

By Dan O'Brien

The following is a reprinted version of an article that originally ran in the Daily Collegian on Februrary 16th, 2006.

A crowd of over a hundred people rallied on the University of Massachusetts campus Feb. 16 in a show of support for kidnapped journalist and UMass graduate Jill Carroll, learning more about the woman whose now-familiar face has graced newspapers and televisions for more than five weeks.

"She has a passion for telling the story," said Karen List, a journalism professor at UMass, who first met Carroll when she was a student.

Carroll, who received a bachelor's degree in journalism from the University in 1999, became a foreign correspondent not long after graduation. She worked for publications such as the Wall Street Journal, the Jordan Times and most recently, the Christian Science Monitor as a freelance reporter.

Before her graduation, Carroll was the news editor of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian from 1998 to 1999.

Carroll was kidnapped Jan. 7 by a group calling itself the Revenge Brigades. Since her abduction, her hostage takers have demanded the United States to release eight female Iraqi prisoners. The U.S. has since released five, but claims the women's release had nothing to do with the kidnappers' demands.

Last Saturday, a message to the media said Carroll would be killed if her abductors' demands were not met by this Saturday. The U.S. has reiterated that they will not negotiate with terrorists.

The rally, which was sponsored by the Collegian, focused less on the latest demands of Carroll's captors, and more on the hope that Jill will return home unharmed.

"The statistics show that for most of these situations have happy endings," said Matt Vautour, a friend of Carroll, former Collegian editor and current sports writer for the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Supporters of Jill Carroll rallied for her safe release in February.

List spoke about the reporting Carroll was doing as a journalist up until the time she was kidnapped, which included writing a story about an Iraqi family's devastation following a car bombing.

That article, which was published by the Christian Science Monitor last April, explained how a 3-year-old girl still couldn't move her legs 17 months after the bombing destroyed her house, which she shared with 26 family members.

"Their story would not have been told had Jill not been there," List said.

Before stepping down from the podium, I reminded the crowd to "hold her in your hearts."

SGA official brings students back to the polls

By David Fonseca
Collegian Staff

Morris Singer strolls through the Commuter Services office in the University of Massachusetts Student Union with a relaxed sense of purpose. He fields calls from students on his cellphone, prints documents to be signed by members of the Student Government Association and browses his laptop for contact information needed by his colleagues with ease. Yet his relaxed demeanor on a Tuesday morning in March belies the great responsibility he's been granted as Student Government Coordinator of Student Engagement. It's his job to prove that, if given the opportunity, UMass students will actually vote.

With voting rates usually falling between one and two percent of the population between the ages of 18 and 24, the odds are stacked against him. And, with his first chance of proving himself coming on an April 4 town election full of issues and candidates with which students are mostly unfamiliar, his chances of success don't look much stronger. However, Singer is still confident. His position has called upon him to beat the odds before. And, he's done it.

Upon being appointed Coordinator of Student Engagement by the SGA Singer made it his first priority to bring a polling station to UMass where students from all across campus could vote, an initiative that had been bound up in red tape for nearly two decades.

"Student's have been talking about the need for an on campus polling place since the late 1980s," said Joanne Levenson, Director of Commuter Services.

In 1995 a polling station was brought to Hampden Dining Hall in the Southwest Residential Area through the joint effort of the SGA, Commuter Services and then Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Tom Robinson.

Southwest, which according Levenson was chosen for the polling station because of its high population of students and large representation of minorities, was divided into subdivisions of districts four and 10 and offered a polling station where both students and town citizens could vote. However, when the census board declared in 2000 that Southwest was its own district, it was forced give up its polling station.

"It's really too bad. It mitigated tensions back and forth between students and town residents," said Levenson. "And, it would have saved us a lot of money.

Even after being defeated by the census appeal committee, student's still pressed for an on campus polling place. They got their wish just in time for the 2004 Presidential election with the establishment of a new polling place at New Africa House located in the Central Residential Area. Here, students from Central and Orchard Hill for the first time could vote for local, state, and national elections without going off campus. However, it wasn't until the fall of 2005 that the UMass Votes campaign, a joint effort between Commuter Services, The Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG), and the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy, was able to bring a polling station to the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union where students from all across campus can vote.

Singer is humble about his accomplishment, and admits that the establishment of the polling place is only the first part of his job.

"In the long term I see this not just as an establishment of an on campus polling place, but the change of the political environment," Singer said. "When we got the polling place my work was just beginning. My job is to educate. We've got to give students a stake in the election."

However, others are less quick to downplay Singer's accomplishment. Not only was his campaign able to convince Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano to unfreeze $60,000 of SGA funds to rent the voting machines amidst his standoff with the SGA, he also acted as a liaison between the town of Amherst and the Students of UMass, who have often been painted as adversaries in the past.

"I would say the town's people I have met are largely non-judging. After events like Hobart ho-down, the riots in Southwest, and the general noise disturbances, I can see how they would be upset. But, I think any student who puts himself out there in the town is going to be received pretty positively," Singer said.

Now Singer is focused on the future, and his task of overcoming the political apathy that has become endemic among his fellow students.

"We are trying to teach students the value of civic engagement," said Singer. "Students don't vote, that's a fact. But, you have to look at why it's a fact. Students don't vote so candidates don't look at their issues. And, because those issues are not on the agenda, student's can't be bothered to vote," he added.

Both Singer and Levenson are hoping this year's campaign, which could boast up to 20 student candidates, a warrant article on the decriminalization of open containers and three ballot questions that could affect funding to the University, will encourage students to get out and vote.

"In the past the largest number of student voters have come out for the issues of decriminalization of marijuana," said Levenson. "People might say that that's sad, but people vote for the issues that affect them.

Melville Hall wins MASSPIRG's Residential Energy competition

By Teresa Franco
Collegian Correspondent

Students of Melville Hall congregated in the Southwest Horseshoe at the University of Massachusetts on Wednesday evening to celebrate their victory in the "Residential Hall Energy Competition."

The competition, put on by MASSPIRG, took place from Monday, Feb. 27 through Mar. 16. The object of the competition was for the residence halls to conserve as much energy as possible during the three week period. This encompasses how well the buildings conserved their energy sources such as computers and lights. MASSPIRG was impressed with the results.

Central dorms Greenough and Baker were runner-ups to Melville, which was a surprise win.

"Melville was the underdog, and everyone expected one of the residence halls in Central to win," Marni Woasserman, a UMass student and intern of MASSPIRG said. She also mentioned how pleased she was with each and every one of the dorms, and says MASSPIRG intends on having the competition every semester.

A large amount of Melville residents were present to celebrate their unexpected win in the beautiful weather with free food, and live music. The bands SUV, and Busted Vacuum both played for the crowd and an environmentally friendly hybrid car was on display exposing the students to more ways of conserving energy.

The Campus Climate Challenge has spread to 156 college and university campuses across the United States. The ultimate goal of the challenge is to reduce campus' global warming pollution level as low as possible. Global warming is the cause for extreme weather disasters such as Hurricane Katrina and contributes to the spread of tropical diseases. The challenge is a step in the right direction towards lowering the odds of future incidents from happening.

MASSPIRG hopes to get over a thousand universities involved by the year 2008. Colleges and Universities are already starting to gain benefits from the competition. Smith College recently made a decision to get 100 percent of their energy from clean energy. UConn developed tough energy efficiency standards for all new building construction and Oberlin College in Ohio has created a free in city bus route.

Event has become an outlet for students to become more conscience of managing their energy sources. MASSPIRG encourages students to become more active in the conservation of energy daily by taking part in organizing and attending Clean Energy Forums on campus, volunteering at MASSPIRG's numerous campaigns, and working with faculty and administrators to share ideas for conserving energy in their buildings.

More info on the project or the MASSPIRG organization can be obtained at masspirgstudents.org.

Faculty Senate updates plan to fight plagiarism

By Mike Sancis
Collegian Staff

Members of the University of Massachusetts Faculty Senate received an update Thursday on the status of the University's participation in a program to streamline the detection of student plagiarism.

Stanley Hertzbach and W. Curtis Conner, Co-Chairs of a Committee on Student Plagiarism formed in November 2005, informed the full Senate of ongoing negotiations with two plagiarism detection services currently being marketed toward educators, Turnitin and MyDropBox. Both services will be provided to the University in trial periods scheduled to run until September 2006.

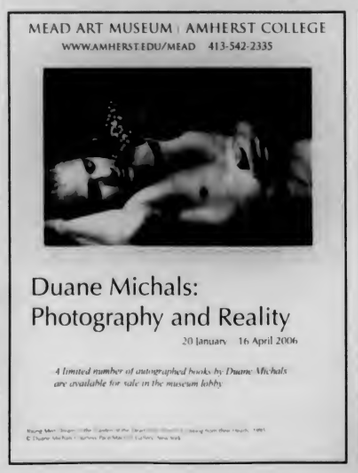
Marketed as a vast database of scholarly material, to be matched with voluntary submissions by the students themselves, Turnitin's stated purpose is to automate the now common Google searching used by instructors to detect plagiarism in student papers. Full adoption of the service has been undergoing consideration by the Committee since October. Since then, according to Hertzbach and Conner, UMass has been negotiating with the company over concerns regarding student privacy and the service's efficiency.

Feedback from faculty was encouraged, and some members of the Senate expressed displeasure with the proposed adoption of either service.

Linguistics professor John McCarthy called Turnitin "a deeply flawed program" that generates a "gigantic rate of false positives"—meaning that trial submissions by some students have detected plagiarism where there in fact was none. McCarthy blamed this on Turnitin's inability to distinguish between formatting, such as quotation marks and works cited pages.

Marta Calás, a professor in the School of Management, expressed concern that the any such detection service would further complicate the grading process. "It is almost like we are creating another layer of bureaucracy on top of what we already need to do with grading papers," she said.

Hertzbach reminded those attended that, if implemented, neither Turnitin nor MyDropBox would be mandatory for instructors. In October, the annual cost of Turnitin to the school was estimated at $20,000. MyDropBox, while its cost was not mentioned at the Senate meeting Thursday, in September asked Boise State University for an annual fee of roughly $8,300 in September, compared to $14,600 requested by Turnitin.



The Senate also approved an impromptu motion by Brian O'Connor, Senate Delegate to the Board of Trustees, expressing "relief and happiness on the release of alumni Jill Carroll from being held hostage in Iraq, and we wish her and her family the best."

Lieutenant Colonel David T. Vacchi, a member of the Senate and a professor of Military Leadership in the ROTC Program, was the featured speaker at this week's meeting. During a PowerPoint presentation on the history, present, and future of ROTC at UMass, Vacchi expressed pride that the UMass ROTC program is currently ranked No. 17 of 272 schools nationally.

UMass President Jack Wilson will address the next Senate meeting on Thursday, April 13.

Collegian welcomes back Jill

Collegian staff members look back on Jill's illustrious tenure at UMass, look back on the 83 long days, and look forward to her return home.

To the staff of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, Jill Carroll is an icon. Since Jan. 7, 2006, for 82 days, all of us have followed the story of the 1999 UMass graduate. When the moment finally came yesterday morning, when the good news began to spread like wildfire, every editor for the Collegian rejoiced that our icon is in safe hands.

From Jill's days as a hard-nosed reporter for the Collegian, where she acted as a true government watch-dog, to her admirable days more recently reporting overseas, she has been a model journalist, with traits that each member of the Collegian staff hopes to one day obtain.

What is striking about Carroll's work as a reporter in Iraq is that she is always out for the truth. While some reporters are covering the broad picture, Jill covers the details. Forget complex politics and vague issues that the average glamour-journalist might subscribe to — it is apparent from reading Jill's work for the Christian Science Monitor that Jill's concern lies in the people.

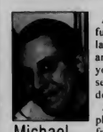
While some reporters spend their time in a hotel in the safe areas afar from the action, Jill is persistent about finding the truth on the streets of Baghdad.

It is these particulars that we pay close attention to here at the Collegian, and have since Jan. 7, 2006. Because, what Jill Carroll does is not taught in a classroom or read in a book. Her skills and attitude are intangible, and the Staff of the Collegian will always strive to someday utilize the reporting traits that we have learned from re-reading Jill's work over the past 83 days.

What is striking about Carroll's work as a reporter in Iraq is that she is always out for the truth. While some reporters are covering the broad picture, Jill covers the details.

For the singular reason that Jill once graced the newsroom of the Collegian, it is truly an honor to spend late nights putting together this 116 year old publication.

The last time a staff editorial was written regarding Jill Carroll was about a week after she was kidnapped in January. At that time, the Collegian newsroom was hopeful, but anxious. Since the news was released yesterday morning, the newsroom has lit up with feelings of jubilation. Tapping our fingers on the keyboard and making contacts for today's issue, we were all inspired — and still are, because we all know that Jill Carroll once was here, tapping her fingers on the keyboard through the wee hours of the morning, making phone calls and covering the Student Government Association.



Those tidbits are all us inspiring journalists need in order to get excited about this profession that does now and will always consume our lives. Just knowing that a reporter like Jill is out there drives all of us, and it will drive us for years to come, now that Jill is safe and our icon is free.

The Collegian staff would like to extend our complete elation at the release of Carroll, and look forward to her reports from Baghdad. We admire her fortitude and strength, as well as her family's ability to stay sturdy through the past 83 days.

Setting the tone for a new generation

Editor-in-Chief reflects on Carroll's influence

Michael Busack

As young journalists, our painted future is often bleak. The money is lame, the hours are nearly illegal, and the respect is nonexistent. So, you might ask, "What would possess someone like you to enter a dead-end career?"

Almost three months ago, I got a phone call very early one morning from a Boston television station. The sputtering voice hurriedly asked me if I had a few minutes to talk about Jill Carroll.

Now, I had heard of the legends of the Jill Carroll and Casey Kane days down at the Collegian, but I had no idea what this had to do with me. I wiped the sleep out of my eyes only to hear the clearly unprofessional journalist say "Oh, you didn't hear? Jill was kidnapped in Iraq."

As the next few weeks progressed, I found myself drawn into this story that had become increasingly haunting by the day. The world around me was up in arms about this young girl, this UMass graduate, this Collegian alumna, that had been snatched away while reporting in Iraq.

Some of the current Collegian crew read through some of Jill's college articles one night, trying to pick through our close connection to our stolen sister. We pointed out some of Jill's work and talked about her guts as a reporter. She covered the Student Government Association as a beat, which is not the most popular group to have to cover, to say the least. Jill did so with careful precision. She chased leads, worked issues, and though sometimes she caused controversy, she told the true story.

I remember that night going home for the first time and feeling that punch to the gut. It was my office that Jill wrote these passionate stories just years ago. "How could she end up in this situation so quick?"

The next obvious thought that comes to mind is "this could be me in a few years."

It was then that the fire began to burn. I felt this natural anger. Where was the University's voice in the international cause for Jill's release? We couldn't hold our breath and wait for a major effort from the administration, so the young journalists that people like Jill paved the way for decided to do our part.

We couldn't hold our breath and wait for a major effort from the administration, so the young journalists that people like Jill paved the way for decided to do our part.

The rally was emotional. Not for a moment did we think that we would have a true affect on Jill's release, but, we did know that we could have a chance to keep her in people's hearts and minds. For a day we tried to get a hold of every media outlet we could. We talked and talked at length about every inspiring detail of Jill's story. I hope if not then, now Jill feels our support for her.

As I revisited the timeline of Jill's career to this point, I could see that she never lost touch with her amazing ability to tell the story. Karen Test, the journalism department head at UMass, told me that from the first day of class, Jill aspired to become a foreign correspondent. She got it.

As I said, journalism often lacks in the public department. However, if there is one thing that Carroll has re-taught me, it is that journalists have the power to trigger change. A journalist is given the forum to educate and inform the public. In this, Jill did exactly this. Whether it was her stories that gave voices to the Sunni voters or her accounts of a Thanksgiving dinner with marines stationed in Iraq, Jill's stories have made their way into our hearts.

Yesterday, I was a sick editor. I was up until the early morning, not feeling well at all. Just after 8 a.m., my cell phone rang. I answered only to hear my father on the other end. "I just heard on the radio that Jill Carroll was released today," he said.

Every ounce of sickness drained from my body and the greatest form of adrenaline kicked in. It's a time for celebration. We are ready for Jill's return and not a second to early.

So this is my formal invitation. Jill, if and when you read this, I owe you a beer during your next visit to Amherst. You have responded what I have about all of this. You gave me that extra push for graduation. I hope you can understand how much you and your story has meant to all of us young men at the Collegian.

Thank you and welcome home.

New immigration Bill

Wesley Miller

Several days ago, in capital cities across our country, thousands of Latino Americans took to the streets in protest of the new immigration bills being passed through congress. HR 4437 is the result of years of debate over immigration reform and the materialization of an issue that has long divided lawmakers and the American people.

The new bill seeks to naturalize millions of illegal immigrants and stop the flow of migrant workers over the Mexican border. At first glance, this looks like a step in the right direction and in some respects it is. Unfortunately, the new bill and subsequent bills being presented to Congress today by Sen. Bill Frist fail to take into account that this is a highly nuanced issue with many different routes of approach and that the new bill is a familiar step backwards in establishing a national identity for the Latin American people.

With an estimated 12 million illegal immigrants now in the United States and discontent among native-born Americans growing, the legislation introduced has been a long time coming. HR 4437 entails that in order for illegals to apply for citizenship, they must have been living in the US since before 2004, they must pay a fine of 1000 dollars and any back taxes due, learn English and obtain employment. After working six years, they are allowed take the citizenship and pay another fee. The whole process takes a minimum of 11 years.

Along with increasing restrictions on naturalization, there will be major buildup of border security and several new laws criminalizing illegal immigrants. HR 4437 includes a call for a 700-mile wall to be built between Mexico and the US. If Senator Bill Frist's Bill passes this week, the Department of Homeland Security will not only be given the responsibility of forming a huge task force on our border, but also for the border between Mexico and Guatemala. Both bills give the DHS liberty to extradite any immigrant caught within 100 miles from the Mexican border without appearing before an immigration judge beforehand and would change illegal immigration from a violation under civil law to a criminal offense.

Though the majority of Americans have been pushing for immigration reform for some time, interest groups have managed to temper developments this drastic. Immigrant labor is driven by supply and demand. Employers need workers to fill jobs that native-born citizens refuse to do. The reason we have a 99-cent Gordita at Taco Bell is because there are people behind it who are willing to work for almost nothing to make it.

Employers need workers to fill jobs that native-born citizens refuse to do. The reason we have a 99-cent Gordita at Taco Bell is because there are people behind it who are willing to work for almost nothing to make it.

Immigrant labor makes our economy run.

Americans are quick to accuse migrant laborers of taking their jobs, not paying taxes and ruining the economy. In fact, a far more dangerous threat to job security is outsourcing. These new policies are hypocritical when we consider our position in the world; we are quick to sing the praises of globalization, encouraging free trade throughout the Americas, but reluctant when we see the results of it in our own country.

When a migrant laborer has the opportunity to come to this country and earn ten times the paycheck they do in their home country, chances are they're going to take the risk. Many don't realize that almost 25 percent of the Mexican economy comes from migrant labor in the United States. But in order for those workers to make enough money to support their families, they must live in poverty and evade taxes. Taxing their already meager wages would ruin the incentives for them to work the labor intensive and often dangerous jobs they are forced to take. So far, lawmakers have understood this fact; in 2005, only three employers were fined for using immigrant labor.

The new solution given us by Congress is to create large amounts of military and bureaucracy, while creating a new fugitive class of Americans. Though I don't tend to believe in conspiracy theory, it's obvious that the Department of Homeland Security needs something to do other than sit around twiddling their thumbs. If Frist's bill is actually passed, it will mean huge amounts of funding and recruitment, not to mention some legitimacy after Katrina. Costs for processing new visas and deporting illegals could be astronomical. The taxpayer would of course flip the bill for all of this.

The new bills will somewhat temper the exploding immigrant population and give some relief to those areas where the problem is greatest, but they are far more negative when we consider them along with the more nuanced issues which include national economy, xenophobia and our views of globalization. They are not so much a solution as a precursor to a potentially very problematic issue in the coming years.

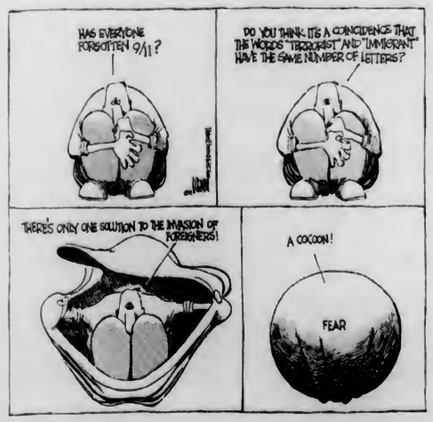
That's just like, my opinion, man

Kevin Pascucci

In writing my first column for the Editorial Opinion section, I found it appropriate to discuss the topic of opinions. In today's society, no two people think exactly alike. Everyone has grown up differently, experienced different things, and from that formed their own set of opinions. While this may seem pretty obvious and basic, there is something that most of us forget to do, and that is to respect the opinions of others.

With our country divided on so many issues, whether it is the war in Iraq, gay marriage or reproductive rights, it's important that we remember that not everyone thinks the same way about things. Too often in this country, it's easier to judge people and look down upon them when their opinions of things differ from our own. Rather than taking the time to get to know someone, we automatically become turned off to that person because of the way they feel about something. In America, everyone is supposed to have the right to choose to believe in whatever they want to, as well as feel however they want to on major issues. Why is it then that people in this country are persecuted or looked down upon every day for their personal thoughts and beliefs?



With our country divided on so many issues, whether it is the war in Iraq, gay marriage or reproductive rights, it's important that we remember that not everyone thinks the same way about things.

To illustrate my point, let me use an example from my own personal experience. I recently attended a concert to see one of my favorite punk bands. I have been listening to punk music ever since my freshman year of high school, and one of the things that I have always loved about it is that it encourages people to form their own thoughts and opinions, regardless of what other people might say. While I was at the show, the band played one of their new songs, which was entitled, "You're Wrong." In the song, the lead singer basically lists off a number of beliefs or opinions that people may have and commences to say that if you believe in any of these things, you're wrong. Not only did the song bother me, but the lead singer also went on to call out a not-so-popular group in this country: Christians. He said that they were the cancer in this country, and that if anyone in the audience happened to fall into this category, that they should leave his show. I personally am a Christian, and when he said that to a cheering audience, I could only feel like I was about to be attacked by a psych ward. I've been to many shows, and I have never once felt like I wasn't wanted there. This time around, I did. Now, I can see why he would have such an opinion towards Christians. Does that make him responsible for some horrific things that have happened in the name of Christ, and have become a rather oppressive and judgmental force in this country. But to lump them all together because of a title is unfair.

I am not a Republican, I'm against the war, I believe in the separation of church and state, and I'm not a conservative by any means. On top of all that, I have chosen to follow Christ, and I certainly don't agree with everything that comes out of the mouth of every Christian. But I would disagree with anyone who would denigrate me for those things, merely on my opinion.

To those who would judge, it's easy for us to label people because of what they believe or similarly, insanity to know how they live because of what they are. Each of us is different, and should be allowed to hold whatever opinions we choose to. We can learn from each other, but often fail to do so because we let our pre-conceived ideas get in the way. Instead, we choose to dismiss them as ignorant, making it a matter of "us" be them." Opinions are important, but should never get in the way of us trying to understand each other. It's unfair to believe that everyone should think like we do. To overcome this and the same way, I think, we should be pretty boring society. If we all could just learn to respect the opinions of others, no matter how different from ours, we could be a little bit better for it. As divided as this country seems to be right now, a bit of tolerance would be a pretty good start.

Jill,

When I got up yesterday morning, it was like every other since you were abducted. I fed the dogs, put on the coffee, got the newspaper and turned on the television for the local news. I sat down with my coffee and started reading the article about your sister pleading for your release, when all of a sudden I could hear over the television "Breaking news. Jill Carroll has been released." Should I believe it? Could I believe it? I was glued to the TV, and when I saw it on the Today Show, that's when I believed. "Jill is really free," I said to myself. I had tears and goosebumps and felt an overwhelming sense of joy and relief. "She's safe! She's free! Thank God!"

So Jill, it's time to take it easy for a while. Enjoy your family and if you ever come back to this campus, please come visit me.

Affectionately,
Marty Pappas

JILL CARROLL, A WITNESS TO HOPE

One artist pays respect to the freed journalist

BY ALEX BUTLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When the Director of Student Craft Center Paula Hodecker first heard that UMass alumna Jill Carroll was being held hostage in Iraq, she immediately went right to work. As the facts were still flowing in, Hodecker was planning a small tribute in some artistic way that might capture her respect and admiration for Carroll.

"I felt such a connection, right away. As a fellow alumni, I can respect her not only as a student, but also as a journalist," Hodecker said. "She was a person who wanted to spread truth. She was a living saint, and I needed to show my appreciation through what I do."

And the respect is very apparent. A circular, 20-inch wooden icon, featuring a photograph of Jill Carroll published in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, was the final result. As a mixed media piece, the artwork is a collaboration of wood, paper, glass, stones, all centering around the picture of the now-freed journalist. One of the most flooring aspects of the piece, however, is the blue theme that is consistent all the way through.

"[The blue] represents the sky, water, and has definite Catholic roots," Hodecker said. "It was originally part of a prayer altar, but then I moved it to the foundation you see now. Honestly, as all of this was unfolding, I was becoming less and less hopeful about humanity. I found Jill to not only be a beacon of truth, but of hope as well."

The original was quite small, and in fact remains in the center of the work, but it quickly evolved. Blue, white, and grey stones were added as a "halo" featuring, immediately surrounding the photograph. It then continues to expand outward, past a wooden frame and finishing with four bright blue arrows on the four corners.

"One thing I kept in the back of my mind was simply, 'Please, do not let this turn into a memorial piece.' On the weekend of the first deadline, I was finishing up the piece. No matter what happened, I wanted to keep the piece as a tribute to her as a person. My prayers, along with everyone else's, were of protection for her."

Hodecker said her initial instinct was that of Jill's parents.

"My first reaction was, 'Well, let's go get her, then!' But this shows the importance of what she was doing; reporting about the truth. It was an important and courageous move to go in the first place."

As far as furthering her influence, Hodecker hopes it will flower.

"I can only imagine how she will use this experience on a global level, enhancing her role as a model," Hodecker said.

The honoring blue piece is part of a series by Hodecker called "Drowning in the Tears of Abraham."

"I plan to keep it with the collection as of now," she adds.

Certainly, it can be said that the work, no matter where the artwork is seen, the impact will be felt with a full heart.

Paula Hodecker's mixed media work "Jill Carroll, a Witness to Hope" shows the connection of community that never faded while Jill Carroll was held captive in Iraq since January 3, 2006.

What A Woman Is

Original column by Jill Carroll

This column was first released in the 1999 Summer Orientation issue of the Daily Collegian. The target audience was the incoming freshman, and the paper used it's powerful writers to cover hot, important topics. Jill led the charge with the view of women in our growing society.

BY JILL CARROLL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

I want to be a stripper. I really do. It would be good to do it just once. One night. Of course, I probably won't, but why do people think I would be degrading women if I did take it all off while dozens of pitiful boys throw their money at me? At least it would be a job where a woman wouldn't be making 70 cents to every man's dollar. And every one of those sucker's dollars in my g-string would be one dollar less in a man's pocket and one more in a woman's.

If I choose to do it of my own free will with a healthy mental and emotional state and it's what makes me happy then why not? Lord knows it pays better than being a reporter.

But maybe my modesty would get the best of me when the music starts (bow chicka bow bow). So what if I, dare to say it on a college campus, became a housewife? I could just take my degree in journalism and admire it while I vacuum the rug and make the kid's lunches. That's it. I'll dedicate myself to properly raising the next generation. I'll be part psychiatrist, nutritionist, doctor, chauffer and chef.

But oh! What a waste of my hard-earned piece of paper.

Everyone is so proud of themselves and their degrees and "enlightenment," but give me a break. What's so enlightened about telling people they can't choose occupations and lifestyles that make them happy?

If you want to get buck naked while wrapped around a brass pole and keep it all on while climbing the corporate ladder, I say go for it. You're the only ones who have to live your life so do what makes you happy.

But, of course, this only applies to women who have the option to choose what they want to do in life.

Choices are what give freedom. Prisoners are without choices, victims are without choices and what a coincidence that choice is just what conservatives are trying to take away from women.

For the lucky individuals who have choices, here are some rules to live by to help make the right ones. Keep in mind this is not an Ann Landers column.

- The secret to success in a career is, (drum roll please), doing what you get paid for. I know, not mind-blowing but it's surprising how many people don't do it. Showing up on time, doing your job thoroughly and not calling in sick will do wonders for a career. Bosses will do back flips when they have reliable, productive employees.
- Read.
- If the person you love makes you feel guilty, bad about yourself or powerless, that isn't love. Two words: Get out.
- Read.
- Remember, size 12 is normal.
- Read.
- If a professor is explaining why women can't be CEOs, mathematicians, or in the military, challenge it. There may be women in the room who believe what the old wind-bag is saying.
- Read.
- Remember, you only live once, so eat chocolate. The world's supply is rumored to be exhausted in the next 20 years so stockpile now.
- And maybe I forgot to mention it but, read.
- For god's sake turn off the TV.

Why waste time just to be told to buy things, look pretty and be submissive?

And what does it take to be pretty? To be feminine?

It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure it out, anything like that makes you weaker.

High heels, passivity, excessive thinness, a soft voice, avoiding conflict, approval seeking, pantyhose, playing dumb, waiting your turn? Stop me any time here, but this looks like a formula for failure.

How seriously can someone who is teetering around in three inch heels, a mini skirt and talking in a mouse-like voice going to be taken? All the things that are qualities of beauty in women are also qualities of powerlessness.

But beauty is the ultimate goal because it's the primary criteria women are judged on.

Let's summarize. To be beautiful you have to be thin (not some muscular hulk), agreeable but not too outspoken – and you have to be beautiful to be loved. Is it just me or is there something psychotic about the whole thing?

Men have to be smart, fast, strong, aggressive and assertive to be attractive. Funny, but the last time I checked, those are traits that might get you somewhere.

So start up the music and call me a stripper, because I'm a feminist and I'm fixin' to change what being a woman is.

Carr adds little to Bulger case

BY SEAN T. GARDINER
SOUTH FLORIDA SUN-SENTINEL

"The Brothers Bulger: How They Terrorized and Corrupted Boston for a Quarter Century" by Howie Carr; Warner ($25.95)

If you don't know who the Bulger brothers are, imagine if mob boss John Gotti's brother, Peter, instead of being a two-bit hood, had been the most powerful politician in the state.

For almost 30 years that was the situation in Boston, and it's this relationship author Howie Carr examines in "The Brothers Bulger: How They Terrorized and Corrupted Boston for a Quarter Century."

Beginning in the 1960s, William "Billy" Bulger rose through the clannish morass of Boston politics to eventually become the state Senate president at a time when budgetary laws bestowed upon that position an inordinate amount of power. At the same time, James "Whitey" Bulger, through an unholy alliance with a neighbor who grew up to be a corrupt FBI agent and the blood-thirst of a serial killer, quietly began systematically eliminating his rivals until he was left as the city's pre-eminent gangster.

At first, Bostonians met the good-brother, bad-brother scenario with amused acceptance; after all, every Irish family has a black sheep. And for much of his criminal career, the myth was that "Whitey" was strictly old-time, making his money off gambling and other traditional rackets while barring, on the threat of death, drug dealing in his neighborhood of South Boston. Whitey's myth morphed to legend when he won the state lottery, taking a share of a $14 million pot in 1991.

Three years later reality caught up with the Whitey Bulger mystique. With his corrupt FBI handlers retired, a serious investigation was finally launched into the city's top gangster revealing he was a drug dealer, the lottery was a money laundering scam and, worst of all for many from his "Southie" neighborhood, Whitey was a "rat." For decades Bulger had been an informant, helping the FBI bring down Boston's Italian mob; and, in return, they protected him, pinning many of his murders on his rivals.

Whitey's story by now is well chronicled. The story has been sustained by Bulger's now-11 years on the lam, and several Whitey books have been published including one released after Carr's by former Bulger henchman, Kevin Weeks, titled "Brutal: The Untold Story of My Life Inside Whitey Bulger's Irish Mob."

But what makes Carr's book potentially a standout is its look at what role the comparatively good brother played in protecting the bad brother. For years it was speculated that Billy, given the power he wielded, must have helped Whitey. Given the book's title and Carr's reputation as a muckraking columnist for the Boston Herald, it was a fair assumption that Howie had finally got the goods on Billy, the diminutive man he for years berated as the "Corrupt Midget."

Unfortunately, no such connection is made in the "Brothers Bulger."

Instead, much of what Carr writes about Billy is regurgitated scandal or repudiation of claims Bulger made in his 1996 memoir, "While the Music Lasts: My Life in Politics." And you'd have to be a Boston political junky, of the '70s and '80s no less, to keep up with, much less care about, the dizzying number of politicians Carr introduces who Billy either conspired with or victimized.

Similarly, when it comes to Whitey, Carr provides a lengthy hit-by-hit account of the murders he took part in but very little new reporting. In fact, in promoting the book Carr focused most on the revelation that as a teen Whitey turned homosexual tricks for money. But three-quarters of the way through the book we find out the accusation isn't new. It was made by a former drug dealer Whitey set up for arrest, Eddie MacKenzie, in his 2003 book, "Street Soldier: My Life as an Enforcer for Whitey Bulger and the Boston Irish Mob."

In general, the book's style is reminiscent of someone telling a long, disjointed story in which the teller keeps interjecting bits and pieces he forgot before getting back on track. Which is not to say that Carr's book isn't entertaining in parts, especially if you haven't read much about Whitey.

But ultimately "The Brothers Bulger" comes up short (no pun intended) on brother Billy.

Carr's book offers no insights to the Bulgers' relationship and no smoking gun to prove Billy helped his older brother.

Sure, during his career Billy appears to have openly run a patronage mill, tried to re-district rival politicians out of business and might have taken a kickback or two, as Carr re-asserts. But Carr comes no closer than a Congressional committee investigating the Boston FBI in 2003 did in establishing that Billy, by then the president of University of Massachusetts, had helped Whitey.

Arab Strap hints of fame, future

BY DUSTIN FOX
DAILY NORTHWESTERN

With the limelight focused on the recent explosion of British bands on the alternative rock scene — the Arctic Monkeys, Editors, and Hard-Fi (not to mention thousands of others) — it's easy to look to England as the de facto center of the "alternative music universe."

Combine this with previous pond-jumpers like Coldplay, Radiohead and Oasis, and it's almost impossible to ignore the fact that even though Britain may not control our tea or our stamps, it definitely controls our airwaves, iPods and CD players.

Because these bands are pouring out of the land of crumpets and cricket, it's easy to ignore the musical products of their UK neighbor, Scotland. But a recent influx of Scottish bands from the flourishing Glasgow scene, such as Franz Ferdinand and Belle and Sebastian, makes it hard to deny that Scotland is a highly productive center of music as well.

Enter Arab Strap — the post-folk duo of Aidan Moffat and Malcolm Middleton. With tales of drunkenness, sloppy sex, and even sloppier relationships (college mainstays, if you will), Arab Strap mixes profound, intense lyrics with sparse guitar and drum-machine instrumentals.

"Scotland is not a big country at all, and if you are in a band and interested in music, Glasgow was always the place to be," Moffat says. "All the music is there."

In the mid-1990s, Arab Strap emerged as one of the new bands on the Scottish scene. Originally from Falkirk, Scotland, a small town between Glasgow and Edinburgh, Arab Strap's members were presented with a geography crisis. "There really isn't anything going on musically in Edinburgh," Moffat says. "It was a very easy decision to go (to Glasgow)."

But geography wasn't the only thing to bring the duo together, according to Moffat. Middleton and Moffat's shared love for Chicago-based Drag City Music Label, home to artists like Jim O'Rourke, Smog and the Silver Jews, allowed the pair to bond.

"When I got a little bit older, I got a job at a record shop," Moffat says. "I used to take home LPs and give them a listen to. A couple of these CDs were from artists on Drag City."

Now it is Arab Strap's records that are displayed on the shelves. In their latest album, 2005's "The Last Romance," Arab Strap puts a twist on their usual tone. In the beginning, the new album seems like a dreary, downtrodden tale of drunkenness and romantic stupidity. In fact, that's what every album in the Arab Strap catalog sounds like, according to Moffat. But what separates this release from the rest of their albums is its surprisingly pleasant end.

"The album is a concept album," Moffat explains. "It starts fairly obvious (but) there is a happy ending for a change. There usually isn't a happy ending in the Arab Strap world."

But it doesn't always end happily in the Arab Strap world, as evidenced in the band's 1996 debut album, "The Week Never Starts Round Here." Its first single, a haunting track called "The First Big Weekend," received heavy airplay in England. It was even eventually used in the background of a Guinness commercial.

Throughout their next albums, 1998's "Philophobia" and 2000's "Elephant Shoe," Arab Strap gained a large fan base throughout the U.S. and Europe, yet failed to make a transition from their smaller label, the Chemikal Underground (known as Matador in the United States), to a larger one.

In 2001, "The Red Thread," named after an Eastern philosophy that believes that soul-mates are linked by an invisible red thread through time, was released to rave reviews. After a short hiatus, the group released another album, "Monday at the Hug and Pint," in 2003, loosely based on an evening at a local pub. This album saw a return of the usual Arab Strap-style debauchery and regret.

Arab Strap continues to produce the somber music that litters the everyday lives of pub rats, anti-heroes, and lovers without a chance. Moffat's wry Scottish accent continues to spout lyrics to the likes of "If there's no hope for us, then there's no hope for anyone. What chance can they have, if even you and me just can't have fun."

It seems that Arab Strap turns doubters into rabid followers through the mix of shared emotion, dark music venues, and a healthy flow of alcohol.

Only 'Da Vinci' mystery left: how to avoid it

BY JEROME WEEKS
THE DALLAS MORNING NEWS

"The Da Vinci Code" has become publishing code for "print more money."

It certainly has meant "print more books." Now it also means "print movie tickets, paperbacks, store displays, posters." Think of a ticker-tape parade with all that paper raining down: Dan Brown's controversial thriller about a murdered art curator and a centuries-old Vatican conspiracy is going to generate heaps of paper in the next two months.

And a lot of it will be green.

In the U.S., "The Da Vinci Code" will be released Tuesday in a 5 million-paperback run.

"It's the biggest release in soft-cover that I can remember," said Russell Perrault, director of publicity for Anchor Books, the paperback publisher. In comparison, the popular Harry Potter novels have been released in softcover printings of 2 million or so.

Brown's novel is already the best-selling adult novel in hard-cover _ ever. It has sold 12 million copies in the U.S. alone, more than 43 million copies worldwide.

It has been translated into 44 languages and spawned dozens of nonfiction books criticizing Brown's use (many claim misuse) of early Christian history, French folklore and art criticism.

It has also inspired its own faddish genre of puzzle-filled thrillers that draw on historic frauds or religious legends, such as "The Last Templar." Three of the top 10 books on today's New York Times best-seller fiction list are "Da Vinci Code"-like novels.

And all this is happening before the Hollywood movie has even opened. The Ron Howard-Tom Hanks film adaptation of "The Da Vinci Code" opens in the United States on May 19, two days after premiering at the Cannes Film Festival.

Normally, no publisher would think of releasing a paperback edition yet, even three years after "The Da Vinci Code" first came out. The hardcover is still racking up plenty of sales, enough to remain parked on the best-seller lists in The New York Times and Publishers Weekly. It has been on the Times list for 155 weeks, 54 of them at the No. 1 spot.

But Sony Pictures' screen adaptation of "The Da Vinci Code" provides a "launch opportunity," as publicists say. The film cost $125 million to make, and Newsweek has already declared that it's arriving with more fanfare this year than the sequels to the "X-Men" and "Pirates of the Caribbean."

As a result, Sevsalee Hensley, the fiction buyer for the Barnes & Noble bookstore chain, put in the biggest buy order for a single book in her 20 years, she told the Los Angeles Times. It was "staggering."

So how do you sell that many lowly paperbacks in a seemingly saturated market?

By having store displays sprout up "absolutely everywhere," Perrault said. There will be 28,000 cardboard standees put up in book-stores, warehouse stores such as Costco, airport gift shops, even on military bases. According to the American Book Trade Directory, there are 23,374 bookstores in the United States, and Perrault says that the typical number of standee displays for a big best-seller is 15,000.

Clearly, the campaign is aiming for a much wider audience than average readers. It's targeting those people who buy only one or two books a year, who may buy them on impulse while at a convenience store. The cheaper price of a paper-back makes that impulse easier to act on, especially when there will be two paperback versions of "The Da Vinci Code," one selling for $14.95 and a smaller one going for $7.99.

The paperback campaign is also being timed to piggyback on the movie's much larger ad campaign. Typically, Perrault says, six to eight weeks before the opening of a big-budget film is when the studios start running their television advertising and, in the case of "The Da Vinci Code," a new movie trailer.

With thousands of standees in grocery stores and truck stops, plus the millions of dollars' worth of TV commercials along with billboards and busboards, this kind of coordinated tie-in means that as ever-present as "The Da Vinci Code" has seemed, it will soon be close to inescapable.

It's hardly surprising, then, that a third new paperback edition, "The Da Vinci Code Illustrated Screenplay," is scheduled for release the day the movie opens.

Amplifying the book's media presence even more are two ongoing controversies, one concerning copyright infringement and the other heresies and church history.

Two of the three authors of the 1982 best-seller "Holy Blood, Holy Grail" have sued Brown's publisher, Random House, in London's High Court, saying he plagiarized the architecture of their book. This is the idea that Jesus fathered an heir with Mary Magdalene and their bloodline represented the real "Holy Grail."

If nothing else, the trial has led to some of the few public appearances Brown has made since his fourth novel put him on the best-seller lists and he started avoiding the media. Closing arguments in the case were made Monday, and the judge, Peter Smith, has indicated he will issue his decision in a few weeks.

Whatever the decision, Michael Baigent, one of the "Holy Blood, Holy Grail" authors in the lawsuit, will be making more money from the attention. His sequel, "The Jesus Papers," comes out Tuesday, the same day as the paperback of "The Da Vinci Code."

Perrault of Anchor Books says the lawsuit's outcome will not stop the paperback release or its promotional campaign.

"That's in the U.K., and this is the United States," he says.

The other controversy concerns the book's claim that the Catholic Church and organized Christianity in general have worked to suppress the "sacred feminine" by covering up the importance of Mary Magdalene in Jesus' life.

In particular, the novel portrays the influential, conservative Catholic lay group Opus Dei in a sinister light, even involved in multiple murders in a last-ditch attempt to keep secret the supposed line of Mary and Jesus' descendants.

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops has launched a Web site, www.jesusdecoded.com, aimed at the novel's claims and has also produced a TV documentary, "Jesus Decoded," which is being offered to NBC affiliates for broadcast the week the film opens.

Eileen Wisore, program administrator for Dallas' KXAS-TV, said the program is a "possible option" but would be aired only if the station had enough free time on its schedule.

Although "The Da Vinci Code" is labeled as fiction, its critics have pointed to an introductory author's note as misleading. "All descriptions," it says, "of artwork, architecture, documents and secret rituals in this novel are accurate."

William Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, has asked Sony to put a disclaimer in the film, telling viewers that it's fiction. Sony responded by sponsoring its own Web site, www.thedavincidialogue.com, and has encouraged Christians to discuss the issues there.

Expect a lot more discussion. Easter is coming in three weeks. The last time a Hollywood movie stirred this kind of debate about heresy and history, it was "The Passion of the Christ." But Mel Gibson's film wasn't released with a copyright lawsuit getting headlines, three new paperback editions with a widespread marketing campaign behind them, a hardcover book still on the best-seller list and evangelical and Catholic scholars already responding with their own books, DVDs, Web sites and TV programming.

Student fills 'Ink' spot

By Dave Master
Collegian Correspondent

TLC's hit TV show, Miami Ink, named after a tattoo parlor, narrowed down ten national finalists to fill the spot of general manager, one of whom is Joel Giacobozzi, a recent graduate from UMass.

People in the top ten come from all lifestyles. Careers range from pizza delivery boys, restaurant managers, psychics, and tattoo shop loiterers.

Joel is a young Italian man and a manager of a TV shop. Managing is obviously in his blood.

The art of tattooing is a misconceived practice that transpires self-expression in an unconventional way, causing outsiders to shun it. Tattooing is a subculture full of stereotypes, like any underground culture. Miami Ink surfaces tattoo art into mainstream culture, feeding the recent growth of ink in a real and positive way.

The employees of Miami Ink use skin as their canvas, only meeting "ink-point" if the design meets certain standards. The artists treat their customers as equals, even blank canvases, causing people to feel more comfortable in a would be nerve-racking situation.

Miami Ink is located in South Beach, notorious for its fast-paced, fun-loving lifestyle. The shop is located smack dab in the middle of South Beach, where all the action takes place. Most of the work done by the artists can be seen on sun bathers and swimmers alike along the shoreline.

The tattoo shop is owned by artists Ami James and Chris Nunez. If voted, Joel would be replacing Yoji Harada, the apprentice. The apprentice does the grunt work: set-up and breakdown tattoo stations, clean the shop, and most importantly, sanitize the needles. The apprentice works 12 hour days, and no hands-on artistry.

Joel is an avid fan of the tattoo art. A year and a half ago, Joel received his first tattoo — he's no longer a virgin to ink — while his fascination with tattooing was beginning to take shape. Tattoos are known to heal emotional wounds by providing closure, memorializing a hitch in the past.

Tattoos also may cover physical scars. Joel, with these ideas in mind, plans on helping the shop run smooth to allow the artists to serve their customers in such an atmosphere.

Voting can be done on www.miami-ink.com, by clicking on the "work at Miami Ink" button on the bottom of the page. Joel is from Needham, Massachusetts.

Don't forget to vote this weekend — the deadline is Sunday. Make UMass a part of Miami Ink!

Latifah joins 'Ice Age'

By Hash Nguyen
Daily Bruin

LOS ANGELES — When it comes to entertainment, rapper Queen Latifah has just about done it all. She's released several albums, starred in a popular sitcom, earned an Oscar nomination for "Chicago" and recently launched her own line of Cover Girl cosmetics. For her latest trick, she's providing the voice for a very confused wooly mammoth in Fox's "Ice Age: The Meltdown."

In the animated family film, Queen Latifah joins fellow prehistoric players Ray Romano, John Leguizamo, Denis Leary, Seann William Scott and Josh Peck. Despite her experience acting and singing, the rapper — born Dana Owens — discovered that voice acting was a whole new challenge, since the dialogue is recorded alone in a studio before animation gets under way.

"Honestly, I never felt so insecure on a job in my entire life," she confesses. "I'm telling you, these things are so hard because you do it so many times that you're not sure if you're giving them what you want. I thought it was just me until I talked to Ray and I found out ... a lot of people feel this way because it's such a strange way to make movies. It's like working in reverse."

She also gained a new-found respect for the work involved to bring these characters to life.

"Having to scream or go, 'Ugh Oomph,' weird sounds like that over and over and over, it can be tedious at times ..." she explains. "(And) there are little small things that need to be brought across in the voice. And if you don't get it, you feel frustrated sometimes."

Owens plays Ellie, a wooly mammoth who doesn't see herself as a ninety-ton pachyderm but as a nimble, nocturnal possum like her adoptive furry "brothers," Crash and Eddie. While this little identity crisis made for humorous situations, Queen Latifah felt that the viewer needed a good, solid reason why Ellie has intentionally denied her true heritage.

"It was part of the problem for me when I was trying to work through creating this character and making it all make sense. I was like, 'You know what, guys? We really need a scene where she realizes who she is and she figures it out because she remembers,'" says the actress. "They totally got it and they created this wonderful scene where she rediscovers and remembers who she was and how it all happened. She's only allowed herself to be the child of these possums all her life."

Accepting her true identity is also essential to Manny (Romano), who once thought he was the last of his kind in existence until he met Ellie. Now he has the option of repopulating the earth with mammoths. For Queen Latifah, the pair's struggles reflect one of the film's central messages.

'Bad' has been very good to John Waters

By Roger Moore
The Orlando Sentinel

There's good news and bad news for John Waters fans.

He's about to turn 60, and it's not too late to send a card or a piece of kitsch to the cinema's most infamous trash culture vulture.

But if you were looking forward to the party on April 22, well, you've already missed it. He had it early.

"I couldn't wait," he says with a chuckle from _ where else? _ Baltimore. But early? A whole industry living in dread of that next birthday, and Waters is embracing the big 6-0. Sort of.

"I have a big art show opening April 21, and I didn't want to confuse the issue, so we did the birthday early in New York," he says. He took over a New York restaurant last week and filled it with friends. The man celebrated the world over for his parties tossed himself a lulu. Not to be confused with luau. Not that he hasn't thought of that.

Waters, the director of "Polyester" ("In Odorama! It's Scentsational!"), "Pink Flamingos" and "Hairspray," will appear and lecture on "bad taste," bad movies, and being John Waters at the Florida Film Festival on the afternoon of April 1.

"I talk about everything from show business to fashion to crime to celebrity to television, advice to kids who want to become old-fashioned juvenile delinquents, to tips on style," he says. "It's a self-help seminar for people who want a bad influence. I hope to be a filth elder for people."

He waits a beat.

"Well, the elder part is true, that's for sure."

He will do so as a man who stares down his 60th from a vaunted vantage point that is absurdly mainstream. Absurdly for a guy who made his name with a movie starring an obese drag queen who ate the inedible _ "canine residue" Roger Ebert tactfully called it _ on screen.

"Hairspray," the movie musical based on the stage musical that was built on his hit movie, is about to go before the cameras.

"I don't own 'Hairspray,'" he says. "New Line Cinema owns 'Hairspray.' I own a tiny bit of it. But I wish them well. Really well."

He is the host of "Movies That Will Corrupt You" on Here!, a gay cable channel.

"Go to Heretv.com and see the trailer. It's $20.99 a month. I tell everybody that it's cheaper than a bottle of 'poppers' (amyl nitrate)."

The guy who brought "Female Trouble" and "A Dirty Shame" to theaters knows about corrupting movies.

"I've showed everything from 'Irreversible,' which I couldn't imagine they'd let me show on TV ... 'Freeway,' 'L.I.E.' Movies most people have not seen, and that will startle you. They did me."

He likes the idea of being a "corrupting" influence, he jokes. It's not that he wants to shock. Waters never has. Even when obese drag queen Divine was chasing around that doggie. Even when he was putting the nearly nauseating Mink Stole on the screen.

"Shocking is not what I'm so interested in. Surprised _ I want to be startled by wit. That's what I look for when I go to the movies. Stupid movies shock me. Bad movies shock me. Being gross is easy, and people are trying too hard, these days. All the taboos have been broken. The Golden Age of Trash has been over for 20 years! It has! Ever since porno became legal, what's left to shock? Porno has a star system, just like Hollywood, now.

"I never understand people who say, 'I just want a movie that entertained me and made me feel good.' I hate those kinds of movies. I feel good before I go to movies. I don't have to go to a movie to feel good."

The Waters image is fun, naughty, nasty, verboten fun. When "The Simpsons" needed a character who could puncture homophobia and explain gay camp, they brought in Waters. And what's more apple pie than a hit movie that becomes a hit musical that becomes a movie musical starring John Travolta?

"Fat girls, all over America, can get the lead in the school musical, thanks to a little movie I made in the '80s. Isn't that great?"

It's all part of that "mainstream" label that Waters both embraces and eschews. When critic David Thomson wrote, in an appreciation in "The Biographical Dictionary of Film," that Waters had "mellowed" and, in effect, sold-out in his middle age, Waters promptly produced "A Dirty Shame," an NC-17-rated romp through depravity that was as "out there" as anything he'd ever done. Not that Waters was reacting to Thomson, or anybody else, he says.

"I haven't changed my taste in anything at all over the years. I'm still listening to the same 45s I stole as a teenager."

Still, he professes surprise that people find his success so unlikely, "a kid who started reading Variety at 12, who had a successful magic act in his teens, who has worked at being a showbiz success since childhood.

"Yeah, I'm crazy. Always have been. But it's paid off for me."

He's so funny in conversation that he cracks himself up. No wonder he has turned his little lectures on the lewd, the lascivious and the lecherous into a night-club act.

Here's a riff _ "'Brokeback Mountain' did surprise people. I mean, what the religious right said is true. It is a great recruitment movie. I've seen a lot of gay bars with people dressed as cowboys. And they don't look that cute to me!

"Loved the movie. But I don't understand the ending. If I could only have great sex with somebody I love once or twice a year, with great scenery like that behind us and I wouldn't have to support them? Sounds perfect to me. Why were they so traumatized? That's the ideal relationship."

But not ideal enough to get him to leave his home, his muse, the place where he makes his movies _ Baltimore, city of slums and tourist attractions, of little neighborhoods that time and urban improvement haven't improved. He's about to start work on another film.

"For my movies, I do location scouts first. I go through Baltimore and figure out where the characters are going to live. Just me, sitting in front of people's houses, looking like a cop, or worse, an insurance inspector.

"But don't worry, folks. I'm just dreaming up the horrible, horrible things I'm going to do in your living room!"

Horror flicks mirror a troubled generation

By Christopher Kelly
Knight Ridder

The most gruesomely vivid, elegantly made horror movie in recent memory opened with little fanfare on Dec. 25, 2005, in approximately 1,500 theaters nationwide. Titled "Wolf Creek," it's a low-budget shocker from "The Texas Chain Saw Massacre" old school, about three carefree twentysomethings whose hiking trip goes terribly awry after they are kidnapped by a maniacal serial killer in the Aussie outback.

As is often the case with horror pictures, it was greeted by many critics like a Christmas present wrapped in soiled tissue paper. (Sample review, from Roger Ebert: "There is a role for violence in film, but what the hell is the purpose of this sadistic celebration of pain and cruelty?") The fact that the movie announced the arrival of an immensely gifted new director named Greg McLean — whose patience, control and ability to play the audience like a very cheap fiddle would have done Alfred Hitchcock proud — seemed lost on most adult moviegoers.

An isolated case of a terrific B movie falling under the radar? Not exactly. Because the very same thing happened a few weeks later with Eli Roth's "Hostel" — a viciously entertaining exploitation thriller, about American college students who find themselves trapped in an Eastern European slaughterhouse where rich businessmen pay to torture hapless victims. The movie creepily captured the experience of being a clueless American in a foreign country that pays you very little heed. (It also showed us what it might look like to have your eyeball slowly pulled out of its socket with pliers.) Once again, the reviewers turned up their noses. ("'Hostel') willfully takes us someplace cruel — and deeply unfunny," wrote The Denver Post.)

And again and again — with "Final Destination 3," the technically dazzling third installment in the teenagers-who-can't-outrun-Death franchise, and with Alexandre Aja's "The Hills Have Eyes," the unrelentingly menacing and bloody remake of the Wes Craven cult classic. Needless to say, neither of these films (both of which are currently still in theaters) will be in the running for next year's Best Picture Oscar.

Except there's another story here: namely, that these movies aren't slipping under the radar and disappearing straight to video. Instead, the largely teenage and college-age audiences who flood the multiplexes on Friday nights have turned them all into modest hits. In the case of "Hostel," which opened to $19.6 million and went on to gross $47.3 million, it might just end up being the most profitable movie of 2006. (That film arrives on DVD April 18, a week after "Wolf Creek.")

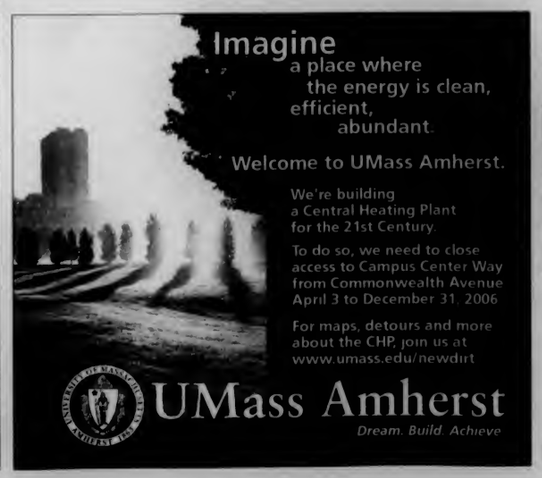
"In the box-office slump of the last year, these movies are the only movies that audiences are responding to," says "Hostel" director Roth. "Both 'Saw II' and 'Hostel' were made for $4 million, and they're beating movies that cost $200 million dollars."

Are the critics simply out of touch? Well, yes. Because if you can't recognize the often-astonishing level of craft on display in these films, then you're watching them with your eyes closed.

But the teenagers are getting it — and embracing perhaps the only movies around that dare to speak to larger social concerns and anxieties, especially about the often-faceless, unfathomably evil villains we must contend with in the aftermath of Sept. 11. "Hostel," "Final Destination 3," "Wolf Creek" and "The Hills Have Eyes" are hardly uplifting, redemptive horror stories, where the hero wages battle with a bad guy and emerges a better, stronger man. Nor do these movies offer any of the self-reflexive irony-soaked fun of films like "Scream" from the 1990s or the spook-house pleasures of the Asian-influenced horror movies like "The Ring" from earlier in this decade.

What has emerged, instead, is a modern strain of horror that takes us straight back to the politically conscious, deeply despairing 1970s classics like "The Last House on the Left," "The Texas Chain Saw Massacre," and the original "Hills Have Eyes." The often hopeless message of these movies is, "Your life may seem perfect right now, but the other shoe is about to drop, at which point there will be no one around to save you." And it's a message that seems scarily appropriate for a generation of teens and twenty-somethings who were mostly raised in privilege but whose lives have had a pall cast over them — first by the omnipresent threat of terrorist attacks and now by an ongoing war in Iraq.

"In retrospect, it's usually pretty easy to look at horror movies and see the influences of the time," says Wes Craven, the director of "Scream" and "A Nightmare on Elm Street," who also produced "The Hills Have Eyes" remake. "And I think right now, with the post-9-11 world and Iraq, creative people are almost being goaded to look at things in the strongest way possible. If you look at the Academy Awards (movies), those are films about real issues. I think everybody is saying, 'We have to talk about the nitty-gritty stuff here.' It's not the time for confections."



But it's precisely that helplessness that feels very much of the moment, especially for a generation growing increasingly disillusioned with its political leadership and facing the prospect of having to fight a war against an ever-changing enemy in a hostile and alien country. These are the same themes that horror movies explored in the 1970s. The original "Texas Chain Saw Massacre," directed by Tobe Hooper, offered up a Vietnam-era metaphor of college-age kids traveling through a rural "jungle" where they encounter one deadly enemy after another, while Craven's 1977 "The Hills Have Eyes" gave us a paranoid, post-Watergate vision of an American government that has covered up its most deadly secrets. (The villains in "Hills," both the original and the remake, were victims of American nuclear testing in the 1950s.)

It's little wonder that both of these movies should be remade for a similarly anxious and uncertain era — or that films like "Wolf Creek" and "The Devil's Rejects" should owe them a very considerable debt.

Indeed, there's an exacting solemnity to the bloodshed in something like "The Hills Have Eyes" that's a far cry from the cheerful splatterific fantasies of Brian De Palma ("Carrie," "Body Double"), or even the lusciously aestheticized violence proffered by Quentin Tarantino's "Kill Bill" or Robert Rodriguez's "Sin City." When a woman's spine is cracked in half during the most horrifying moment of "Wolf Creek," the camera stays so close to the victim's face, and the sound effect sounds so chillingly real, that the only possible reaction is stunned silence.

And that very gruesomeness — says Craven — is another of the ways these movies are speaking to young audiences and reflecting their real-world worries.

"The war in Iraq is a very violent, scary war, and it's a war not being fought by an army on one side," he says. "I'm sure the average kid who watches these kinds of movies has seen on the Internet someone getting his head sawed off with a kitchen knife by the enemy."

Former coaches rejoice

over six years since Russell last saw her in person at the Huron High pool, when Carroll had visited during Russell's last year as the water polo coach.

"I was watching the news and I saw her picture and they didn't say what her name was, but they had her picture on the screen. I looked at her and I thought, 'You know, she looks familiar.'" Russell says.

Jill Carroll's former coaches were relieved upon hearing of her release.

Then the name showed up on the television screen and the pieces fell together for the former water polo coach. Russell was upset, but never gave up hope for the girl who always put a positive spin on things.

"Deep down I always felt that she was going to come out of it. I had a feeling of confidence," Russell says.

As the 82 days of captivity finally ceased yesterday morning, Russell shared the reaction and sensation with people all over the world.

"When I heard the news this morning I was absolutely thrilled," Russell says. "She's a tough kid."

It was early in the morning yesterday and Bob Newcomb returned to his office after another early swim practice that Carroll once took part in. Newcomb checked his e-mail, and then the day's news.

"I have joy for her family. I'm really happy for them that they are going to have a chance to be with her again," Newcomb says. "My heart goes out to her family for everything they had to go through. I can't even imagine as a parent going through what they went through for the last 82 days."

It was a long time coming for Carroll and her family, and it will certainly be a long time before the world settles down. Of course there was a time before the high spirits and the exhilaration — before Carroll was dropped off by her abductors at the branch office of the Iraqi Islamic party, before she wrote for the Monitor and the Jordan Times, a time when steals and knockouts, swimming pools and tournaments were the hot topics in Carroll's life.

we're playing or who we're playing. It's really how we're playing."

Right now the season isn't panning out quite how UMass had hoped. The Minutemen are winless in their last six contests and have dropped 10 of their last 11. Stone attributes his team's struggles to trying too hard at the plate and inexperience on the mound.

"Its guys pressing because they want to do well," Stone said. "We're young on the mound and we know that. We're going to make mistakes. We can't give in to hitters. We have to be in attack mode."

Today the Minutemen will be sending one of their few upperclassmen pitchers to the mound to take on the Spiders. Junior Chris Lloyd will be going against Richmond in the series opener. In three starts this season he has posted a 0-1 record with a 5.14 ERA. In his last start, Lloyd suffered a loss against Fordham, pitching four innings while allowing four hits on three runs. But Stone believes Lloyd has shows promise.

"He's pitched well and he's been a real competitor," Stone said of his veteran hurler. "Hopefully we'll get some good innings out of him [today]."

Although the two schools are both in the A-10, in the past 36 years they have only met on the baseball diamond 13 times. The Spiders hold the 9-4 advantage over the Minutemen, but UMass was able to pull out a win the last time the pair played. That victory came in the nightcap of a double-header by the score of 3-2.

Stone says for the time being his team needs to focus inward and not worry about the Spiders.

"Richmond has always been a good team we expect them to be good this weekend," he said. "We can't hope good things are going to happen we need to make them happen."

A-10s on tap for UM

The Massachusetts women's crew team starts its season and mission for its 11th consecutive Atlantic 10 Championship this weekend.

On Saturday, the Minutewomen will be defending their Yankee Cup title in Kingston, R.I. against 11 Conn, UNH and A-10 foe, URI. The Mansion and White then travel to New York Sunday to race Colgate, Holy Cross and Columbia, which beat UMass' varsity boat last year.

"Lost four to graduation, half the varsity boat and two out of second boat," UMass coach Jim Dietz said. "Overall, I think the first boat is going to be as fast as last year and our second boat should be a lot faster than last year's boat."

Leading the first varsity-eight boat are senior captains Catherine Gariepy and Katie Berger. With former V-8 coxswain Kristina Ferraro studying abroad, sophomore Dana Pulda is stepping up to the helm.

"It's like putting a 9-year-old on the back of a Kentucky Derby winner ... she's got a big learning curve," Dietz said. "That's what the market is producing right now ... this is our only coxswain ... this coxswain had to step up early."

Rounding out the first varsity eight will be Gabrielle Papineau, Hannah Brewster, Sarah Marsan, Ellen Maskrey, Rachael Nealer and Stephanie Hopf.

Gariepy, Brewster, Maskrey and Hopf will also be racing the varsity quad.

After scrimmaging last week in the Connecticut River with UNH and Coast Guard, where Dietz got to experiment a lot with his rowers, Dietz is eager to see how his novices do this year.

"This year's novice seems to be more athletic [than first year's] and I'm excited to see them race. They're picking it up quite well," Dietz said.

Leading the first novice eight-boat will be sophomore coxswain Jeanine Lefbom.

"I think it's the type of people we get to row here at UMass," said Dietz, explaining the UMass crew team's success in his 12 years. "The majority of those women are Mass women, who starting rowing at UMass."

Dietz also says his ring a "great river" is a benefactor to the Minutewomen's success — especially this year as the Amherst area experienced a light winter and the Connecticut River has yet to flood, which keeps the crew team inactive for weeks at a time.

Even with all the excitement and the niceties of the river this year, Dietz remains nervous going into the first weekend of the season.

"It's hard to go from the training inside to the racing inside," Dietz said. "The last time they've raced 2,000 meters was last May."

Injuries, illness plague Mass track teams

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The little time that the Massachusetts track and field teams have had to rest officially comes to an end on Saturday at the Southern Connecticut Invitational.

UMass men's coach Ken O'Brien said that towards the end of, and immediately after, the indoor season, the workload during practices was somewhat reduced.

"[I was] trying to give the kids a chance to heal some of their aches and pains, after a long, competitive indoor schedule," O'Brien said. "We're really starting more serious [workouts] right now."

The start of a new season is never easy, but O'Brien is confident that after a little while, his athletes will get back into season mode.

"It's like any preseason or early-season kind of a game," O'Brien said. "[We] expect that people will be back into swing, but we expect some mistakes to be made and probably some rust to be on most of the athletes. That's what the early-season meets are about. We can work our way through that as time goes on."

When asked about the health of his Minutemen, O'Brien said they aren't at "our highest level," but that there is no injury of great significance.

He did mention, however, that junior Erik Haugland is nursing a nagging ankle injury, but that, with careful attention, it will not become anything too serious.

The meet, which is scheduled to begin at 11 a.m., will host 15 teams including West Point, Yale, Boston College and the meet's host, Southern Connecticut State University.

Practices for the Minutewomen began the day after the indoor season ended.

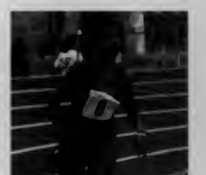
"We kept them going because the big problem is where our spring break falls," UMass women's coach Julie Lal reniere said. "I wish our spring break came at either the first or second week of March, but it doesn't.

"So, the athletes [were] gone [for spring break]. We saw them for the first time since spring break on Monday."

Despite this, however, Lal reniere said that she has several athletes that are making progress and she looks forward to seeing them compete this weekend.

She specifically mentioned sophomore distance runner Christina DeRosa, senior sprinter-hurdler Elisabeth Budd and freshmen shot putter Jordan Verney, all of whom had tremendous indoor seasons.

Veney broke the shot put record three times during the indoor season and is also an excellent discus thrower. She will finally have the opportunity to throw the discus for her first time at the college level. (Discus is only an outdoor event).



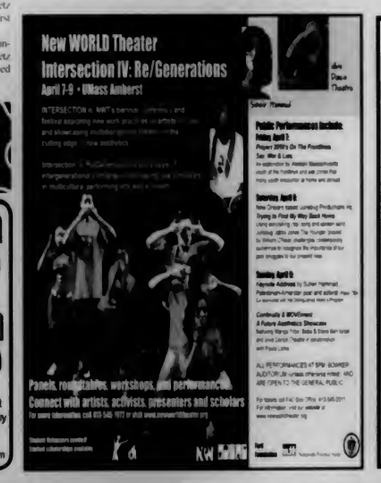
The only dark cloud hovering over the ladies right now is perhaps its list of injuries.

Sophomore pole-vaulter Kristen Bakanowski hurt her take-off foot, and it will make her event more difficult to do.

The injury first surfaced in the last few weeks of the indoor season, but even after the break, Lal reniere said that it is now back to where it was before.

She is scheduled for an X-ray later this week.

Freshmen sprinter-jumper Dionise Miranda seriously pulled her hamstring at the A-10 Championships on Feb. 18 and has been out ever since.



Senior Elisabeth Budd finished third in the 500-meter event at A-10s.

"She is back practicing, but she will not be competing this weekend," Lal reniere said. "I don't want to bring her back too quickly."

Other ailing athletes for the Minutewomen include senior Erin O'Donnell (sinus infection and bronchitis) and freshman Stacy Ossinger (Mononucleosis).

Bonds under investigation

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Baseball launched its probe Thursday into steroids use by Barry Bonds and others, and right away the head of the investigation came under attack.

Commissioner Bud Selig said former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell – and a director of the Boston Red Sox – will lead the inquiry. Mitchell said he will not resign his position.

The probe will be limited to events since September 2002, when the sport banned performance-enhancing drugs. No timetable for the investigation was announced.

"Nothing is more important to me than the integrity of the game of baseball," Selig said.

Mitchell also is chairman of The Walt Disney Co., the parent of ESPN, which is a national broadcast partner of baseball. ESPN is airing a weekly behind-the-scenes look at Bonds – with the San Francisco Star's cooperation – starting next week.

John Dowd, the Washington lawyer who headed baseball's investigation of Pete Rose's gambling in 1989, did not like the choice.

"Mitchell doesn't have a great track record with me. It doesn't look like he's independent," Dowd said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press.

Mitchell said his role with the Red Sox will not create a conflict.

"If, in any way, anyone associated with the Red Sox is implicated, they will be treated just like everyone else," he said.

As he left the news conference at baseball's headquarters, Mitchell did not respond to a question about his role with Disney and the possible perception of a conflict of interest.

"While George Mitchell is certainly a man of great integrity, I believe that baseball would have been wiser to pick someone who is not as close to the game and may be able to take a more objective look into the facts," said Sen. Jim Bunning, a Kentucky Republican and baseball Hall-of-Famer.

Rep. Cliff Stearns, a Florida Republican, praised the probe.

"This investigation should have started years ago; I am deeply concerned with the appearance that Major League Baseball resists taking action to cleanup the sport until it is overwhelmed with demands for action," he said.

Selig's decision to launch the probe came in the wake of "Game of Shadows," a book by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters detailing alleged extensive steroid use by Bonds and other baseball stars.

"I believe the timing on this proper given the charges, given the specificity of the charges for the first time," Selig said.

No matter what the findings of an investigation, it would be difficult for baseball to penalize anyone for steroids used before Sept. 30, 2002, when a joint drug agreement between management and the players' association took effect.

Baseball began drug testing in 2003 and started testing with penalties the following year.

"Should Sen. Mitchell uncover material suggesting that the scope of the investigation needs to be broader, he has my permission to expand the investigation and to follow the evidence wherever it may lead," Selig said.

Bob DuPuy, baseball's chief operating officer, said baseball considered Mitchell's potential conflicts of interest.

"Given Sen. Mitchell's integrity, given his background, he was absolutely considered to be the perfect choice for this job," he said.

DuPuy said baseball had the power to force players to cooperate.

"We're assuming that when Sen. Mitchell asks to speak to players, the players will respond," he said.

A bulked-up Bonds refused to comment on the recently-released book, "A Game of Shadows," which chronicles his steroid use.

San Francisco Giants slugger Barry Bonds is under investigation for his alleged use of multiple anabolic steroids.

Selig would not address possible discipline that could result from the investigation.

"When this investigation is over . . . that will be the time for me to make those kinds of judgments," he said.

Bonds entered the season with 708 homers, trailing only Babe Ruth (714) and Hank Aaron (755) on the career list.

"I assume physical constraints notwithstanding, Bonds will play the whole year," DuPuy said.

Earlier Thursday, Victor Conte – founder of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative – was released from a California prison. He spent four months there after pleading guilty to orchestrating an illegal steroids distribution scheme that allegedly involved many high-profile athletes.

Asked whether he gave Bonds steroids, Conte said: "No, I did not. I plan to provide evidence in the near future to prove that much of what is written in the book is untrue," Conte told the AP. He declined to list specific inaccuracies or what evidence he would provide, but said, "It's about the character assassination of Barry Bonds and myself."

Gene Orza, the chief operating officer of the Major League Baseball Players Association, declined comment Wednesday.

Red Sox return with new faces, new look

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FORT MYERS, Fla. — Popular characters left, new players arrived and Boston's clubhouse changed from colorful to calm.

What stayed the same, though, is probably more important for the Red Sox.

Sluggers Manny Ramirez and David Ortiz are still around to erase deficits with one powerful swing, manager Terry Francona got a two-year contract extension through 2008 and general manager Theo Epstein continues to make moves to try to make a good team better – even if he did part with fun-loving extroverts Johnny Damon, Kevin Millar and Bronson Arroyo.

"I don't really care if this year's decibel level matches last year's," Francona said. "That was that team. This will be this team. What we want to do is win games and have a huge amount of loyalty and care about each other. I don't doubt for one minute that's going to happen."

Boston's defense is better, its rotation deeper with Curt Schilling, Tim Wakefield, Josh Beckett, Matt Clement and David Wells, and its bullpen more seasoned. The Red Sox should contend in the AL East with the New York Yankees and Toronto Blue Jays, who added key players.

Still, key questions remain on a team that led the majors in runs each of the past three years.

Can the four new starting infielders hit more than the 17 homers they combined for last year?

Will knuckleballer Wakefield, whose personal catcher Doug Mirabelli was traded to San Diego, feel as comfortable with Josh Bard even though both say they're working well together?

Opening-day starter Schilling and closer Keith Foulke made it through spring training healthy but can they come back from poor, injury-plagued seasons?

"It's been two years since I've been the guy. I was" health-wise, Schilling said. "Until I do what I did before, there are a lot of questions."

Only 10 players remain from the 2004 team that gave the Red Sox their first World Series championship since 1918. Last season, they were swept by the Chicago White Sox in the AL division series after finishing with the same record as the New York Yankees, who won the AL East in a tiebreaker over Boston.

Then turmoil engulfed Boston's front office and a shakeup hit the roster.

Epstein stepped down Oct. 31 when his contract expired in a power struggle with team president Larry Lucchino, then returned 2 1/2 months later in the same position but with greater autonomy over baseball decisions.

The Red Sox added 2003 World Series MVP Beckett to their rotation and veterans Rudy Seanez, Julian Tavarez and David Riske to their bullpen. Coco Crisp came over in a trade with Cleveland to fill Damon's spots at the top of the order and in center field.

Boston has an entirely new starting infield. Trades brought second baseman Mark Loretta from San Diego and third baseman Mike Lowell from Florida. Slick-fielding shortstop Alex Gonzalez signed as a free agent from the Marlins and Kevin Youkilis, a part-time player with Boston last season, is the new first baseman.

"It wasn't strange. I think it's our responsibility to make sure it's not," Francona said. "You come in that [locker] room and you're us.' It doesn't take very long. It's like I've known Mike Lowell for years. We're good at that. Barriers come down and make people feel comfortable."

Millar did that by joking and smiling but left for Baltimore as a free agent. Damon did that with his long hair and friendly manner but went to the New York Yankees as a free agent. Arroyo nearly made it through spring training with Boston but took his curveball, flowing blonde locks and guitar playing to Cincinnati in a trade for outfielder Wily Mo Pena on March 20.

"I've seen a lot of changes over my 12 years here," said Wakefield, who has been with Boston longer than anyone on the current roster. "Some have been great. Some have been bad. I think the change this year is great."

There could have been more.

Left fielder Ramirez and left-hander Wells wanted to be traded, but the Red Sox said they couldn't find satisfactory deals.

Wells, coming off knee surgery, wasn't happy to have his first start scheduled for Boston's eighth game on April 12. But Boston has two days off in the first eight.

Multi-talented Carroll makes waves

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

The year was 1994. Jill Carroll was just a junior at Huron High School in Ann Arbor, Mich. It was before UMass, before the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, before the Wall Street Journal, before the Jordan Times and before the Boston-based Christian Science Monitor. It was before Iraq. Jill Carroll's mind was consumed with a simple thought — her high school water polo team's tournament in Chicago.

"We just got absolutely pummeled," then-coach Candice Russell says of the tournament. "We probably lost every game 20-0 while we were in Chicago."

The team was distraught, but a shot of optimism came from Carroll. A few comments here and there, and suddenly the first-year team forgot about its losses. It was the type of confidence that Carroll possessed, and perhaps the kind of positive outlook that kept her going during 82 days as a detainee.

"Jill was one of those kids that came away from that experience in good spirits, and thinking, 'You know, we just got pummeled, but that was a lot of fun,'" Russell says. "She just had a way of looking at more of the bright side of things."

It was in 1993, when the Huron High School athletic department decided to start a water polo team — the first ever in the state of Michigan — that Carroll first shared that optimism with teammates.

Carroll was a swimmer on the high school team during her freshman year, and when Russell, the assistant coach of that swim team, spearheaded the new polo team, Carroll wanted in. As one of the fastest swimmers on the team, she would eventually take her water polo career all the way to UMass.

The team at Huron High was novice to say the least, and most of the players had never even played water polo before. But they were enthusiastic, and having competed as individuals on the swimming team, wanted to work together as a team. It was a risk for Carroll and her teammates, something that may not have gone right, but as the world would later learn, Carroll was prone to taking risks.

"She was the kind of kid that was willing to take chances," Russell says. "She was always willing to go after what she wanted to do."

Carroll and her teammates wanted to mesh as a group, and, most of all, they wanted to have fun. In a sense, the girls were guinea pigs — volunteers on a new team, eager to compete with nothing to lose. Carroll was a member of this team from 1993 to 1995, and it was during those years that the Huron High School women's water polo team nabbed three straight state championships.

When Jill Carroll graduated from Huron High and ended her career on the team, she left with 17 career goals, six knockouts and seven assists — numbers that drew attention from current UMass women's swimming coach and then-women's water polo coach Bob Newcomb.

"She worked really hard. She was a kid who really tried to maximize what she had and take advantage of those opportunities that she had," Newcomb says. "I really brought her in as a water polo player and she swam also."

The trip from Ann Arbor, Mich., to Amherst, Mass., to attend UMass was a move that Carroll wanted to make. She would swim and stay on as a member of the polo team until her never-dying passion, which today has her in the spotlight, eventually took over.

Two years on the swim and polo teams were complete, and then it was time for Carroll to put her athletic career in the past and focus on journalism. Life over the next decade would consist of interviews, investigating and a never-ending search for the truth.

Candice Russell was watching the news on Jan. 7, 2006 when Carroll's picture popped up on the screen. It had been

Minutemen take on Spiders

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Baseball is a mental game just as much as it is a physical one. A team's quality of play can be directly affected by its frame of mind. After a disappointing start, the Massachusetts baseball team (2-11, 0-3 Atlantic 10) is learning just how important the right mentality is to having success between the foul lines.

This weekend the Minutemen will travel down south to take on the Richmond Spiders (7-15, 1-2 A-10) in Virginia for a three-game set that begins today at 3 p.m.

Coming off a week in which they were only able to muster nine hits and left 14 men on base, the Minutemen need to get themselves right mentally in order to turn around their recent misfortunes.

UMass coach Mike Stone says the problems his team is facing can be addressed more through intangibles than swinging the bat.

"Baseball is tough. You can get yourself into a funk mentally and you can struggle," Stone said. "It's a proper balance mentally that we're not at right now. It's just a situation where we need to get into a better frame of mind."

One factor that could be adding to the Minutemen's mental struggle is the 17-game road trip they are currently in the midst of. In the past three weeks UMass has traveled to Florida, New York, back to the Sunshine State and now down to Virginia this weekend. They have yet to play a game in Amherst and will have to wait until next Wednesday to do so.

Stone says the early season travels are just the nature of the sport and the team needs to rise to the occasion no matter where they are on the map.

Sophomore catcher Bryan Garrity went 2-4 with a run and an RBI in his first start of the 2006 season.

"It's just the way it is with us being the northernmost team in the league. We really don't have any choice," he said. "It's difficult, there's no question about that. But it's something we've always done. The difficulty is not with where

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team will look to gather back-to-back wins for the first time in its 2006 campaign when it hosts Boston College (5-4) at 1 p.m. tomorrow afternoon at Garber Field.

UMass (3-6) is coming off of an impressive 16-9 victory over a young, but talented, Vermont team on Wednesday afternoon, while Boston College is coming off of a 16-12 loss to Boston University on the same day.

The Minutewomen are the second-worst offensive team in the Atlantic 10 with only 8.62 goals per game, but they did not play like that against the Catamounts. UMass' 16 goals were the most it has scored in a game since last season's 17-10 win over Longwood on April 22.

UMass also had 10 different goal scorers in the game, and with tomorrow's last non-conference battle, UMass coach Carrie Bolduc knows that her team needs to continue putting the ball in the net if they want to get back to .500.

"We talked about the amounts of shots we need to take per game to win, and the amount of goals that we scored to win games," Bolduc said after Wednesday's win over Vermont. "The most we've scored to win a game is 12 this year, and the least is 11, so we told them that we at least need to get to 11 to win games."

UMass will begin A-10 play next Friday against St. Bonaventure at home, but will look to gain some momentum with a win over Boston College tomorrow. In order to do so, the Minutewomen must stop senior Elizabeth Kadison and freshman Emily Hannigan.

Hannigan scored a team-high four goals in Wednesday's loss to the Terriers, pulling away as the Eagles' scoring leader with 20 goals on the season. She is also second on the team in points with 22, and first on the team in ground balls with 21.

Kadison leads Boston College in points with 23 on the year, including 16 goals and seven assists. She also leads her team in game-winning goals with two on the year.

Boston College has won four of its last five games, and is no stranger to road games this season. The Eagles have only played one of their nine games at home in 2006, and have a 4-4 road record to show for it.

With conference play on the horizon, some of UMass' finest have turned it up a notch at the right time. Sophomore Kathleen Typadis and senior Kerri Connerty have been the team's biggest offensive components this season. Typadis leads the Minutewomen in points with 21, while her 20 goals is also a team-high.

Connerty is second on the team in points with 20, and first on the team in assists with 11. She moved into ninth-place all-time in career points with 117, thanks to her pair of helpers in Wednesday's win. Junior Samantha Sepulveda has also been stepping up as of late, tallying 10 points in the last four games.

UMass to face Fordham and La Salle

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

With April just around the corner and warmer weather on the way, Atlantic 10 conference play is in full swing.

The Massachusetts softball team (13-11, 2-0 A-10) will look to create some distance between Amherst and the rest of the A-10 this weekend with four conference games in three days.

Today the Maroon and White will travel to Philadelphia to square off against La Salle (8-13, 1-3 A-10) in an afternoon doubleheader before heading back north to the Bronx for two more against Fordham (15-13, 2-0 A-10) on Sunday.

The Minutewomen kicked off their conference schedule last week in the nation's capital with a sweep of George Washington (9-0 and 6-0) in the doubleheader. Already, there are just three teams remaining with perfect conference marks – UMass, Fordham and Charlotte, which, at 23-6, easily hold the best overall record in the A-10.

Though the season is still young, UMass coach Elaine Sortino sees tough competitors across the board in the A-10 this year.

"Every team is the team to beat this year. I don't think there is going to be a weak sister," Sortino said.

As defending A-10 tournament champions, this means more pressure for the Minutewomen to stay on top.

"We're a front-runner, so for our opponent, every game is the game of the year," Sortino said. "We get no rest as far as having a bull's eye on our back, butt, head, toe. Anywhere they can shoot us they'll look to. We like being in front. We like being the target."

Since the completion of the team's early-season tournament play, the Maroon and White have turned it up on its opponents. In four regular season games against GWU and Dartmouth, the Minutewomen have yet to allow a single run, while racking up an unreal 43 runs of their own.

Those numbers are a huge improvement over the team's earlier play. The Minutewomen left their final winter tournament in Tampa, Fla., with a record below .500, but four big wins later, the team is on fire.

One of the biggest reasons for the improvement is the play of senior starting pitcher Jenna Busa. In tournament play, the senior struggled in every game, recording just a single win while acquiring six losses and an earned run average over 9.00.

In the very first game of the regular season, however, Busa returned to last year's form, when she was A-10 tournament MVP. In the second game against George Washington, Busa pitched seven complete innings, allowing two hits, one walk and no runs while striking out three.

"That was an incredible performance to go into the league having dealt with what she dealt with," Sortino said. "To be that mentally strong and tough and how she worked physically to give us a shut-out against a very good George Washington team. You have to look at that and say 'Wow, what a great turnaround.'"

Busa followed up that performance with a similar one against Dartmouth on Wednesday. In a game that saw the biggest offensive explosion in school history, Busa was just as solid in the circle as the rest of the team was at the plate.

The senior threw five shutout innings (when the Mercy Rule ended the game early) allowing two hits, two walks and striking out two. Busa showed her experience in the fifth when she got out of a bases-loaded, no-outs jam to end the game in the team's fourth straight shutout.

The Minutewomen will host their first A-10 opponent next Sunday when Charlotte visits the Pioneer Valley for a two-game set.

Moore new SGA President

Elections thrown out, Mishy and Elvis get pissed

By Champ Kid
Whammy!!!

In a stunning turn of events, the Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts overturned their March election results and named Presidential candidate Eoin Moore as the winner.

The elections were overturned after elections commissioner Priyanka Pant disqualified four campaign teams upon discovering that they had used the wrong type of paper in creating their campaign fliers.

"It's a very serious offense," said Pant. "It clearly says in Chapter 342, page 4567, section BB, paragraph 3, line 2 that candidates are only allowed to use 'cotton paper,' but these candidates used 'rice paper' instead, which is clearly an unfair advantage."

In what turned out to be brilliant campaign strategy, Moore refrained from creating any fliers or even announcing his candidacy, and therefore was not disqualified.

After the remaining candidates were disqualified, Pant named Moore, the lone candidate left, the new SGA president.

In an exclusive interview with the Morning Wood, Moore illustrated his plans for the next year and answered any lingering questions of his qualifications as SGA president.

Morning Wood: "Thanks for giving us the exclusive opportunity to interview you."

Eoin Moore: "Sorry I'm late. I just got done taming a wild honeymoon stallion for you guys."

Yes, I won the SGA Presidential race. God!

MW: "OK, thanks. So can you describe some of the things you plan to do as SGA President?"

EM: "I'm gonna do whatever I feel like I wanna do. Gosh!"

MW: "Well, can you describe some of your priorities?"

EM: "Well, first I'm going to have the University install lockers in every dorm room so he could fit my nunchucks in there."

New North apartment construction halted

By Nada Fitchgirl
Morning Wood Staff

University of Massachusetts Housing Services officials announced Friday that the new North apartments will no longer be ready in time for the upcoming fall semester.

"We regret that we will be unable to finish the apartments as promised, but hey — who really expected us to get them done? At UMass we never finish construction projects on time," said Housing Services spokeswoman Amy Smith at a press conference.

Instead, students who have signed up to live in the apartments will be housed in the Howard Johnson hotel on Route 9, Smith said. This past fall, 59 UMass students lived in the Howard Johnson, or "HoJo," because there was not enough available housing on campus.

"We know it's going to be kind of a disappointment for the students who were planning to live in North, but even though they won't have single rooms, kitchens, living rooms, lounges, laundry facilities or convenient access to campus, they'll still have air conditioning, so why are they complaining?" Smith said. "We'll provide bus service every couple of hours to and from the University."

Because the construction of the apartments was slated to cost the University $92 million, only $25 million of which was covered by central funds, students who have already signed a contract to live in North will not be allowed to make alternate housing arrangements and will be committed to foot the $6,750 per academic year they agreed to pay for the apartments.

"See, our thinking is, if we can charge more money for living in a hotel, then maybe we can overenroll the University again. Students will think paying extra for hotels is standard practice, and then we can make even more money — especially if they're from out of state!" said Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano. "After all, since those out-of-state kids can afford Abercrombie and Fitch and not just Old Navy, why shouldn't they pay more to live inconveniently far from campus?"

Because the hotel will not have kitchens, students living in the Howard Johnson will also be mandated to purchase residential meal plans, forcing them to remain on campus all day if they want to eat and take buses to the already overcrowded dining commons on weekends.

Asked when the apartments would be finished, Smith declined to answer at the press conference, but in an exclusive Morning Wood interview she revealed that construction has been halted indefinitely.

"We just don't have enough money to keep building. We're already in Student turf wars end with theatrics

By Stumble Inn
Collegian Staff

Amherst police broke up what some are calling a "turf war" between Birkenstock-wearing, tree-hugging, clove-smoking Hampshire College students and partying, almost-never-studying, sports fanatic UMass students early this morning.

Witnesses told the Morning Wood that a crowd of approximately 400 college-age students gathered on the Amherst Town Common around 4 a.m. Many neighbors were awoken by loud noises and occasional singing of songs, which included lyrics such as "I feel pretty."

Amherst Police Lt. Ronald Young said his department would not officially call this morning's disturbance a turf war, but "we have seen an increase in the amount of conflicts between those crazy UMass partiers and those granola-crunchy Hampshire students."

Police say many Hampshire students are trying to "take back" the downtown Amherst bar scene, which, some Hampshire students say, has been overrun by UMass "meatheads" and "promiscuous women."

"It's about time downtown Amherst returns to being a place for the people," said Ichabod Struzik, a "second-year" student at Hampshire. "This type of fascist repression has kept us in our dorm rooms for too long. We want to be free! And everyone wonders why Hampshire kids have become such pot-heads?"

"What the f* is this bulls?!" exclaimed Joe Simpson, a junior at UMass and a frequenter of Charlie's Tavern on North Pleasant St. "Dude, all I know is we come here to have a fin' good time, and I ain't makin' room for some hemp t-shirt wearing douchebag!"

According to police, it appears that the rivalry reached its breaking point early this morning.

A witness, who spoke only on the condition of anonymity, tape recorded the following exchange of words between the leaders of the UMass and Hampshire student gangs.

Bicycles ticketed for illegal parking at UMass

UMass Parking Services employee Rangsey Kao gets extra excited when he discovers illegally parked bicycles on campus.

UMass student Dick Hertz of Holden, Mass. hangs his head in shame after receiving a ticket for illegally parking his bicycle outside the Student Union yesterday.

By The Brew Crew
Morning Wood Staff

The University of Massachusetts Parking Services is set to begin enforcing new rules on bicycle parking on campus. This new set of rules will require students with bicycles to purchase parking passes in order to use bike racks on campus.

The number of bikes on campus this semester is expected to rise 30 percent as of April 1, and Parking Services officials are concerned that the number of bikes may exceed the number of available racks. The sale of permits will be limited to the number of empty bike racks and will be organized by color.

Red permits, which cost $150 per year, will allow bikers to park next to the dorms, while green permits, which cost $75 dollars, will allow students to park behind the Mullins Center. Bike racks near and around academic buildings are currently being equipped with meters with comparable prices to those in the parking lots.

Critics of the new bike permit system claim that having to park that far away defeats the purpose of having a bike on campus in the first place. Michael A. Busack, an undergraduate journalism major, weighed in on the issue.

"I just purchased a green sticker, so now I have to walk half an hour to my bike, just so I can ride it five minutes to class," said Busack. "And just the other day I got it towed while it was in the rack outside of Bartlett. To get it out of impound it cost me $110. My Huffy didn't even cost that much!"

North Amherst Motors has been contracted by Parking Services to remove illegally parked bikes. They refused to comment, stating only that they were too busy counting sacks and sacks of money to talk to the press.

Parking service officials, however, were eager to comment on the new bike policy. Parking Services director Michael Brennan released the following statement at a press conference Friday:

Our goal is to provide safe, orderly, and fair bike parking for employees, students, and visitors to our campus. We strive to make biking on campus as convenient as possible, while promoting safe movement of bikes providing for pedestrian safety, and assuring free and continuous access to buildings and walkways for pedestrians and emergency vehicles."

Brennan spoke to the Morning Wood privately following the press conference, but apparently had no idea he was talking to a reporter.

"Our staff is probably the most miserable group of individuals on the face of the planet; we physically get off on making people miserable, and this new bike thing is just another way we can torture the student body," Brennan said. "I'm actually getting sexually aroused right now thinking about ticketing bikes."

The interview ended abruptly, but further investigation by Morning Wood reporters clearly showed that a number of parking service employees were indeed aroused when writing tickets.

Questions still remain on exactly why Parking Services felt the need to start this bike permit campaign. An apparently drunk spokesperson for the University commented:

"So it turns out we really couldn't afford those new dorms, totally our bad. But, this new bike thing is going to bring in shitloads of money, which is really all we care about, and the more tickets that get paid, the more money we can spend on coke."

Wal-Mart purchases UMass Amherst campus

By Worker #3

Wal-Mart recently won a major victory in the Pioneer Valley when they purchased the University of Massachusetts campus. Now, UMass is set to become Wal-Mart's first showcase school.

For months, the Wal-Mart corporation has fought to expand its existing store into a new SuperCenter. After being thwarted repeatedly by Hadley residents, the Wal-Mart developers gave up and decided to look for a new place to expand their empire.

"We heard the University was having some financial problems," said Wal-Mart owner Sam Walton. "We made administrators an offer they couldn't refuse."

The area residents who fought Wal-Mart's expansion plans have mixed feelings about the company's major purchase.

"While we hate to see Wal-Mart win any victories, at least now the endangered wetland creatures are safe," said

Man suffers concussion after flying paper airplane

MondayMarch27

11:34 p.m.
Steven Anthony Baxter, 18, of 666 Unpleasant St. in Amherst, was arrested on charges of jaywalking and resisting arrest. Officers initially noticed a man walking from Lot 22 (Southwest) across the street to the basketball courts, probably for a late-night pickup game, was not using the crosswalk. The officers then requested backup in the form of six police cruisers and a paddy wagon to restrain Baxter, who looked bewildered. One police officer believed the man's astonished look was a result of "being high on crack, or whatever you damn kids smoke these days," and asked him to comply to taking a field sobriety test. When he refused, saying "Dude, I was just walking," police beat his ass up for "self-defense reasons" and slammed him into the back of the paddy wagon.

TuesdayMarch28

12:07 p.m.
There was a follow-up investigation to a report that several brothers at Delta Upsilon Mu Beta (DUMB) fraternity house may have been involved in a recent fight. In interviewing the accused brothers, who were all short and fat, police have enough reason to believe that the brothers roofie chicks' drinks on a regular basis, suffer from wicked Napoleon complexes, are complete losers, think owning an absolute shithole of a house translates into being above the law, and "do a bunch of other fed-up shit, too." One of the brothers additionally asked an officer if he could borrow a screwdriver, which the officer declined.

ThursdayMarch30

1:01 a.m.
Jennifer Airhead, 19, of 34 Arrogant Ave. in Long Island, was arrested on charges of operating under the influence of alcohol. Officers initially noticed Airhead was driving the wrong way on a one-way street, and when she was pulled over she reeked of Parrot Bay. Airhead was asked to step out of the vehicle to take a field sobriety test, upon which she responded "I'm from New York, I can do whatever I want. F this." Airhead failed to recite the alphabet in correct order, and refused to take off her Ugg boots to walk in a straight line.

5 p.m.
Police responded to an emergency call at the fields adjacent to the Mullins Center, where a man reportedly suffered a concussion after flying a paper airplane. The man, who was wearing a helmet, was transported to Uncool Dickhead Hospital, and is in stable condition. How he could have injured himself so greatly from flying a paper airplane, or why he was wearing a helmet, is still being figured out.

FridayMarch31

11:31 p.m.
Officers had to break up a fight outside of a bar between two "college-aged looking" students, who were both wearing pink polos with the collars popped and had a tough-guy look on their faces. One of the men apparently bumped into the other, slightly scuffing his pearly-white pair of shoes, and forgot to say "excuse me" — which, in case you forgot, is all the reason in the world to suddenly flip out and act like a five-year-old. No arrests were made, but the two were told to get a life.

SaturdayApril1

10:52 p.m
Peter Griffindale, 22, of 21 Jump St. in Amherst, was arrested for throwing a party where the people were having too much fun. Undercover officers responded to a complaint from a resident in Puffton Village that a nearby neighbor was throwing an absolutely sick party. The officers found out where the party was at, and when they entered the house observed that loud trance techno music was playing, attractive females were dancing on tables, a device in the corner of the room was putting on a laser light show, guys were doing kegstands, and an ice luge was set up at the stairs. One of the officers confessed the party was "kick-ass," and said it was "really fun" when they revealed their badges and watched everybody in the house "scatter off into the woods like a bunch of chipmunks."

11:24 p.m.
Willy Whiner, 19, of 82 Shady Boulevard In Springfield, was arrested for possession of a Class D drug. Officers initially noticed the man put a small sandwich bag into his jacket pocket, and when the officers stopped the man and asked what he had in his pocket he responded "nothing." Marijuana was found to be in the bag, and he was placed under arrest. The Collegian is anticipating a poorly-written letter of complaint from Whiner, who will no doubt piss and moan to us about why he was put in this police log for doing something as frivolous as making an ass out of himself by trying to punk an officer and get away with it. After all, nobody wants to read about that, right?

Wal-Mart rolls back educational prices at UMass Amherst

Amherst resident Bob Bobbitt, "Students are a dime a dozen; so long as the warted marsh toad is safe, who really cares what Wal-Mart does?"

However, some people worry that the new Wal-Mart-based campus will adversely affect student social patterns. Studies have shown that the UMass-bred student thrives best when kept in a constant web of red tape.

"If Wal-Mart is considering cutting the red tape that students have grown so used to, it could really change the environmental conditions of their habitat," said student activist Joseph Brown.

Many students, however, are still excited about the school's new owners.

"Even if they do have, like, shady business practices and all, they're still like really cheap," said senior communications major Trisha Nite.

"It's funny, you know? I've always bought all my shit at Wal-Mart and now, like, they've bought me. It's deep."

Wal-Mart plans to begin mass-producing textbooks in Nicaraguan sweatshops and say students can expect to see a drastic drop in both textbook and tuition rates.

"We plan to roll back those educational prices," said Wal-Mart spokesman Alan Swetshup. "We will, of course, have to cut down on several programs too. We plan to consolidate almost all majors into one communal group of students. We shall call this group 'Borg.' Individuality will only lead to malcontent and too much learning about issues like social justice could affect students' happiness. And at Wal-Mart we are happy. Always and forever."

Swetshup says, however, that there are plans to keep the business major intact. "We'd like to teach this thriving group of young students to run an empire based on the blood and sweat of millions of people."

Business students expect this new curriculum to be no different than usual.

Professors formerly employed by the old administration of UMass have been invited to return to their positions, but Swetshup said they could expect a pay cut. Professors will now be paid five cents a day for their labor, making their pay comparable to that of the average middle school teacher.

Wal-Mart is also planning major renovations for the UMass campus. Already, a large yellow smiley face has been painted across the side of the University library.

"I think it really brightens the place up," said Swetshup. "It lets the campus community know that we own their souls and that we're always watching them."

Wal-Mart is expected to invade UMass sometime on Wednesday.

MW: "Anything else?"

EM: "I also want to change the UMass mascot from the Minuteman to the Liger."

MW: "A liger? You realize that not even a real animal?

EM: "It's pretty much my favorite animal. It's like a lion and a tiger mixed, bred for its skills in magic."

MW: "Not to be so blunt, but how did you get students to actually vote for you?"

EM: "I just told them that their wildest dreams will come true if they vote for me."

MW: "Yeah, but are you really qualified to be president? What kind of skills do you have?

EM: "You know, like nunchuck skills, bow hunting skills, computer hacking skills... Girls only want boyfriends who have great skills."

MW: "Any other skills?"

EM: "Yes. I'm probably the best drawer that I know of. And I'm the only one here who knows the illegal ninja moves from the government."

MW: "OK, well, I heard you had a crazy winter."

EM: "Yeah, I spent it with my uncle in Alaska hunting wolverines!"

MW: "Did you kill any?"

EM: "Yes, like 50 of 'em! They kept trying to attack my cousins, what the heck would you do in a situation like that?"

MW: "I don't know. What kind of gun did you use?"

EM: "A freakin' 12-gauge, what do you think?"

MW: I heard you were extremely upset with the Massachusetts Daily Collegian because you felt that your campaign hadn't really received fair coverage. Can you elaborate on that?"

EM: "I was like wicked P-ed off. They didn't even write a preview article on me. It was like they didn't even know I was running. Frickin' idiots!"

MW: "Well, did you even tell them you were running? Because that's probably important to do."

EM: "No. Gosh!"

MW: "Whatever. How do you plan to celebrate your victory?"

EM: "Well, my old girlfriend from Oklahoma was gonna fly out for the dance, but she couldn't because she's doing some modeling right now."

MW: "Is there anything you want to say to your students in conclusion?"

EM: "Just follow your heart. That's what I do."

North apartments only to be half completed — oh well

debt," Smith said. "Sorry."

Smith said that Housing Services has not yet determined what the half-finished apartments will be used for, but the University is considering several options, including additional offices for the new Center for Student Development, housing for displaced fraternity brothers, or enough space to store Gargano's enormous ego.

The space will not be used as meeting space or practice space for RSOs like the Ballroom Club that are currently forced to practice in the Totman hallway, however.

Giving the space to RSOs would afford too much autonomy to student groups," Gargano said. "I've been working so hard all year to take away their independence — why mess it up now?"

Residence hall rates for normal single and double rooms on campus will still increase next fall as planned to subsidize the new apartments, even though North may never be completed.

"We know that these policies may cause some initial dissatisfaction among students, but when they realize that paying more for less will bring more money to the University, which we can use to start more construction projects, we're sure they'll come around," Smith said.

Gargano agreed. "After all, tuition at UMass has doubled in the past five years — at this point, what difference is a few thousand dollars more?" he said.

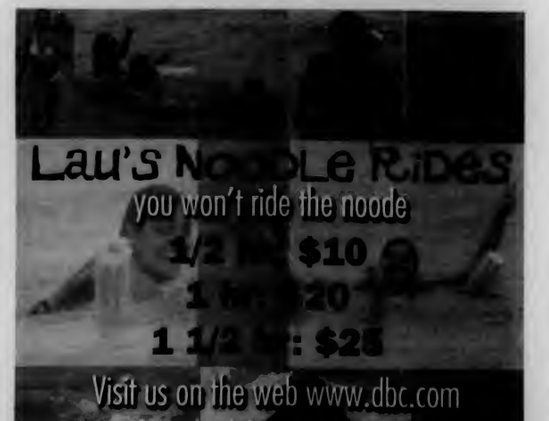
Member of the Sharks: "Afraid, pretty boy? Afraid, gutless? Afraid, chicken?.. You yellow-bellied chicken... Pollack."

According to witnesses, the two groups, holding knives, began to dance together flamboyantly around the common, circling the perimeter, bouncing around and singing.

Police arrived on the scene within minutes. Most of the crowd dispersed as officers arrived. However, one arrest was made.

The man arrested was identified by police as Joel Sherwood, 22, of White Castle, N.Y. Sherwood, a Hampshire College student, was charged with disturbing the peace and lusciously dancing in public.



It was unclear as of press time if officials from either college were going to pursue disciplinary action against the students.

"It appears that a group of students made some terrible choices, but it should be noted that this type of behavior is not representative of the majority of the UMass student population," said UMass spokesperson Ed Blaguszewski.

Hampshire College officials declined comment. They typically like to keep quiet when anything negative is portrayed about their school.

"This just shows how fin' pissed UMass kids are," said Vanessa Howell, a junior at UMass. "We're sick of all these weirdoes from other schools invading our turf."

"I know this fighting is pretty terrible, but in the end it's all about us trying to keep the peace, man," said Timothy Watkins, 28, a seventh-year Hampshire student.

Crazy bee'yatch strikes back

Susie Sweatpants

OK, like I'm totally pissed off because of some wicked rude stuff that the Collegian said about me a few weeks back. Nick Belanger got like all in my business when he made fun of me in his article about people getting run over and junk. He's obviously just hating on me because he can't handle this, but totally wants me. Who can blame him? I mean, I'm so hot like I can get any guy I want whenever. I hooked up with like four football players last semester, and like they only hook up with the hottest girls on campus.

OMG like, this one time, I was totally chillin' with my girlz, who I love by the way, and they are like, the best ever. We're so close, we even gave our group a name, and we all put it in our AIM profiles. Bee'yatches 4 life . . . bitches.

Anyway like we were making margaritas and having like a sorta tropical Mexican night dance party, and all of a sudden like all these wicked hott dudes came over and we got soooo wasted, it was awesome. I am such a makeout slut I kissed like three of them, except for the guy who had his hair short, that's totally lame, hockey hair is so the shit.

Daddy loves me and he'll take care of me if I don't get my stuff back... but I really need those birth control pills, so ya know, let me know... help a crazy bitch out.

I slept with one guy, he was so hott, I think his name was Brad, or Steve or something like that. It doesn't matter though because I'm living it up. Bee'yatches 4 life.

I can't believe anyone can get pissed about sweatpants? I mean like I just want to be comfortable, and WTF, who has the time for pants? Oh and BTW who needs to look good in lecture? I mean my booty looks amazing in my sweats anyway. I think my jeans shrunk, they're way too tight now, so really, I need my sweats. Nick Belanger probably just can't keep his eyes off my hot ass; why else would he mention me in his article?

I have a major problem with something else. It seems like me and my girlz are always getting hated on for being crazy, sexy bitches, but we can't help being perfect. I want to go ahead and hate on those gross hippies in Central. Eww, I mean seriously take a shower you freaks. Who the hell would want to live with those losers? Southwest 4 life.

I can't frickin' stand acoustic guitars, and like, people that do that hippie stuff, what losers. College is all about getting wasted and going crazy. Bee'yatches baby. Down in Southwest we know how to have a good time. Like the other night, my RA was MIA so we so got wasted. OMG, I drank so much, I did four shots, then I drank two beers, then my friend dared me to do another shot.

I was drunk by like 9 o'clock, and then we got on the bus and went to Sig Ep. They have the craziest parties and the guys are so wicked hot. Except they always seem to try and put stuff in my drink...oh well.

Anyway I barely remember the ride there because I was so wasted, oh and BTW, I made out with the guy at the door of the house so I could get in free, bee'yatches for life. I danced so much, and guys kept giving me drinks. I got up on the bar and everyone loved me. We had to leave because my friend puked like all over the place, but we kept partying back in Southwest because that's how we get down baby.

Oh, and if anyone at that party found a cell phone, purse, birth control pills, a jacket, keys, my UCard, a wallet, a shoe, a camera and/or my iPod could you like let me know? I think I dropped my stuff somewhere. No worries though. Daddy loves me and he'll take care of me if I don't get my stuff back...but I really need those birth control pills, so ya know, let me know...help a crazy bitch out.

That was like the best thirsty Thursday ever. But we don't stop the party all week, because us Southwest girls can keep it going all week. Messed up Monday, tanked Tuesday, wasted Wednesday, thirsty Thursday, fucked up Friday, sloppy Saturday.

But I'm a serious student. Like I try real hard because I'm a psychology major and like that's real hard to get into here, so I have a sober Sunday. I love it at college, this is so awesome. I mean, like, my best friends are right on my floor, and all the guys are just so nice to me...I really have it made.

Oh and not to mention how hot I am...I even go tanning twice a week, I need to stay dark to show off my sexy stomach, even though I think, like, all the studying and DC food has given me a little belly. But whatever, I'm still the sexiest bitch I know. Holler.

So in conclusion I just want to say that me and my girlies will keep rocking our sweatpants proudly, and Southwest for life. Peace out bitches.

This column is dedicated to the "Southwest Barbies" out there who are indeed crazy sexy bitches. Holler back ladies.

Silly Rabbit attacks children

Debbie Friedman

You know all those expressions people spout out to infer that something will never happen — such as "when pigs fly" or "when hell freezes over?" Well I always thought, "when the Trix Rabbit gets to eat his own cereal" was a fitting equivalent. Currently pigs are still on the ground and Hell is still quite hot, but the Trix Rabbit recently had a taste of his own cereal, and I am finding myself completely shaken and befuddled in the aftermath of this astonishing event.

It was a couple days ago, and all was normal in Trixville. The two obnoxious little kids, who we all know from the commercials, were performing their usual routine of tantalizing the Trix Rabbit with his own delicious cereal. However, for some reason, on this day they decided to take it to the next level, really getting in his face, coaxing him to the brink of insanity.

That's when it happened. They pushed him well over that brink and the Trix Rabbit just snapped. Lost control. He claims he saw nothing but cereal as he grabbed both kids with one-handed chokeholds and pinned them up against a nearby building.

Luckily for everyone involved, Count Chocula just happened to be in the vicinity and was able to intervene, tearing the Rabbit away from the kids just in time. Even though the Rabbit was stunned and horrified by his own actions, he still took advantage of the opportunity by grabbing the cereal and running away, chomping on every savory morsel the whole way into hiding.

The Trix police found him huddling in his rabbit hole, disheveled, unshaven and shaking with a self-loathing yet satisfied delight. He now remains in custody, with bail set at one million dollars. Toucan Sam is said to be waiting on money that is being wired from the Caribbean but bail out or not, Trixy is in a whole lot of trouble.

Luckily for everyone involved, Count Chocula just happened to be in the vicinity and was able to intervene, tearing the Rabbit away from the kids just in time.

People in the country are glued to their television sets, more fascinated with this story than the Michael Jackson and Scott Peterson cases combined. This is clearly not just about the cereal.

Perhaps we all see a little bit of ourselves in the Trix Rabbit. After all, he is just someone wanting the unattainable. Aren't we all guilty of this — especially in this country, where desires so irrational are constantly being injected into our psyches? Sometimes it really feels like we are all programmed to believe the grass is always greener on the other side, and we only want what we can't have. It is sad that a life can be wasted chasing something out of reach, instead of enjoying what is within our grasp.

The Trix Rabbit, in an exclusive one-on-one interview with Tony the Tiger, said that after all the fuss, "the cereal wasn't even all that good." He also said that he realized his problem long ago, but could not reason with the monster raging inside of him and clouded his problems with denial.

Many friends have tried to help him through out the years — The Rice Krispie brothers planned a formal intervention at his house and Captain Crunch tried to take him to a mental vacation facility, but all attempts were quickly shot down by the refusal of the Trix Rabbit to change his life for the better.

The public has always been sympathetic towards this Rabbit who always got ever so close to enjoying his cereal yet never succeeded. Most could not understand why a rabbit of his intellect could not outsmart two bratty little kids in the first place. Yet the sympathy can only go so far, because both his fans and critics are clearly disappointed.

The Trix Rabbit is in many ways the modern-day, animal version of the Great Gatsby. For years, Gatsby put his hopes and dreams into that little green light across the bay, and the Trix Rabbit put his into those multi-colored, sweetened, ground corn pieces. But when his hopes and dreams were suddenly made possible, the reality fell far from the fantasy. It happens all the time, to everyone, yet something in our DNA never lets the moral of the story stick.

So even as the waves of chaos and shock from Trixville begin to fade away into tiny ripples across the media mainstream, we need to remember this story and think about whether the Trix in our life is worthy of desire. And despite the illogical you may have towards this criminally unjust Rabbit, I think we all need to remind ourselves as much as possible that this silly Rabbit is not so different from you and I.

Dead Zeppelin killing machine

Duncan Devlin

"Excessive noise violations have finally been linked to violent crimes," proclaimed DISS (the Democratic Institute for Something Something) spokeswoman Jawanna Shuddup yesterday afternoon. In a study of over negative 700 (zero, in fact) cases of UMass students, violent crimes, particularly of the serial killer type, were found to stem from an inclination towards loud music.

The bands listed as the top offenders were Led Zeppelin, Metallica, Jimi Hendrix and Eric Clapton's classic trio, Cream. Toss in some alcohol (because all people who drink are evil), and we can clearly see that sound violations are in fact a Gateway Crime. Sure, it may just be some music that is a little too loud now, but by 2010, this person could be knifing people left and right just for wearing the wrong band's T-shirt.

I would like to start off by complimenting the RAs at UMass for jumping to the cause and putting a stop to this awful course of events before it turns deadly. Some RAs have braved the battlefield and continued with the standard policy of knocking on an offender's door and putting an end to all forms of fun — I mean, ensuring that the comfort level of all residents has been respected. Other RAs have taken their civic duties a little bit farther.

One Northeast RA was seen wearing a modified hockey helmet containing blast-pad earmuffs and swinging a bat that had been coated with foamed rubber to reduce thud. She explained that she wanted to reduce thud because bass carries through the walls, and it would disturb residents to both see blood and hear thuds at the same time. She managed to find the culprit (a supersenior math major playing guitar), and beat him repeatedly in the left side of the head with her bat. The bat was not injured.

This resident was brought to Health Services, where employees quickly assessed his black eye, missing left ear, oddly shaped shoulder and bloody lip and informed him of his medical condition: he was pregnant with Jimmy Page's child. The student was last reported to have finally counted to 20 on his toes, and had eaten his guitar, "for the fiber." That's one less talented musician . . . I mean murderer, in the world.

Another potential killer (his band plays in town on Tuesdays) felt that his rights were being violated, and that this was discrimination. You see, in addition to wanting to play loud music, he was also known for walking around in a ball gown, dominatrix high-heel boots and a Darth Vader mask. Since he was one of the "weirdo-folk" as he called himself, this man (if you can call him that) decided to make a big stink about the violation of his rights, downed a six-pack of Heineken, and went on a drunken rampage with a plastic lightsaber.

She managaed to find the culprit (a supersenior math major playing guitar), and beat him repeatedly in the left side of the head with her bat. The bat was not injured.

The police immediately decided that this man would need to be put down. He was already playing loud music, had consumed alcohol (which was declared illegal in 1919), and because of his outfit, would soon be registered as a level three sex offender. We are in the land of the free, after all, and castration is outlawed. Since killing him was not an option (his parents, roommate, classmates and friends had already tried), the police instead tried the smoke a carton of cigarettes approach.

"Perhaps if we give him too much of a good thing, he will learn his lesson," expressed a cop who could neither confirm nor deny that the powder on his nose was cocaine. They tied him to a chair shaped oddly like Pee-Wee Herman, forced him to receive a rectal injection of vodka and made him listen to the Led Zeppelin classic Kashmir at 190 decibels for over 25 hours straight, right outside his own dormitory. He is now wandering the countryside, seeking the secret elders of a gentle race. The last thing he killed was a pelican shaped like Ozzy Osbourne.

To be fair, the rights of musicians should not be respected. They are evil, pure and simple. That guy in the weird outfit was just over the top. It is time to outlaw music in the interests of a safe and secure society. While we're at it, let's get rid of alcohol, because drunk people are murderers and rapists. Don't bother defending them: everyone has an excuse.

So, next time you see someone having a good time playing guitar or drinking alcohol, go right up to that person, tell him how fun evil is, smash him in the face and spit on him to boot. Sure, you would hate it if they did that to you when you were having fun, but we gave up on that kind of respect years ago. Down with murder, up with feathers.

Vice Chancellor finally gets real

Matt Brochu

The University of Massachusetts Amherst announced its intent to redouble its efforts to reduce the self-segregation of all University dormitories, according to sources close to Michael Gargano. The plan, originally unveiled in the March 12 edition of the Boston Globe, declared an unofficial war by University officials against various living areas on campus, citing "Chinatown" (Northeast) as well as "Mo' Projects, Mo' Problems" (Southwest) as the primary targets.

The seemingly one-sided attempt to make the University as homogeneous as the dining hall's mashed potatoes (you don't see the chopped up potato skins clustered on one side of the serving pan, do you?) was met with harsh criticism from a large portion of the student body, most notably those of Asian decent, who rightfully claimed that these "reverse discriminatory" measures, if taken, would do nothing more than "reinforce old racial stereotypes." Considering the fact that white people were mysteriously missing from Big Mike's plan, their concerns are not without merit. While stupid, pointless, and downright ridiculous, given the University's history, the proposed plan is far from surprising.

When it comes to the realm of race relations, UMass is no stranger to controversy. Several years ago, Sam the Minuteman's illustrious mascot career was placed in serious jeopardy when a group of activists lobbied for the "dehonkification" of his white, Redcoat-killing ass, claiming that his stay-puffed marshmallow face simply exuded white supremacy.

After a brief University-conducted investigation (and an appearance on Maury Povich's "Racist Mascot Paternity Tests"), Sam was forced to undergo a makeover that would make Michael Jackson's nose jealous. To appease the activists, his skin tone was darkened to an ethnicity-neutral, corpse-like grayish hue. To appease the feminists, his Minutepenis and Minutescrotum were removed and replaced with a Barbie and Ken-like bald spot. Although the permasmile remains, those who know him best are quick to point out that after the incident, Sam the MinuteEunuch was never the same.

Everyone called me GarGANJA in college, for God's sake. Except I had to walk five miles in the snow, uphill both ways, wearing nothing but a tie-dye t-shirt and a pair of Birkenstocks to get my weed back then.

Ever since, the Vice Chancellor has been out to disprove the common conception that "Mike Gargano doesn't care about black people," a fact that brings us to his recent efforts to integrate, assimilate and castrate the student body in one fell swoop.

This time, however, the outrage by students of color may not fall upon deaf ears. Gargano, a man who receives criticism with all the maturity and decency of a delusional "American Idol" contestant who storms out of the audition screaming, "Remember this face, America. My baby daddy Ray Ray says I can sing. I'm gonna be a star," apparently seems to have taken their words to heart. His answer? Two words, four syllables: fng hippies.

To put it simply, Señor Student Affairs plans to refocus his efforts upon a predominantly Caucasian group, one that self-segregates itself in the notoriously earthy crunchy Central living area, to demonstrate that the color white is an active member in the rainbow of diversity he envisions for his beloved Amherst campus. Superficially, the plan seems quite simple, as it aims for an even distribution of dirty hippies in all living areas with the ultimate goal of having a token hippie sleeping on a couch on each floor of every dormitory by 2008. But if you speak to the man himself, he'll explain that while implementation may prove difficult, its success is essential to the University's future.

"The decision seemed like a no-brainer 2 me," Gargano stated in an Instant Messenger chat using the screen name UmassGargs69. "And I'm sure the hippies will give me shit for this, but LOL, my hair wasn't always short, lustrous and Pantene fresh. This is off the record by the way, but u know that trick they use to toke up in dorm rooms, where they shove the towel under the door and blow smoke out the window through a cardboard paper towel holder? My buddy Grundle invented that our sophomore year. Everyone called me GarGANJA in college, for God's sake. Except I had to walk 5 miles in the snow, uphill both ways, wearing nothing but a tie-dye t-shirt and a pair of Birkenstocks to get my weed back then. Not to mention, I pretty much smoked my penis into eternal hibernation in grad school. But hey, I wouldn't have been able to fabricate my dissertation without it."

Luckily, the Vice Chancellor is a salesman in the truest sense of the word, an asset he hopes to use in order to convince Admissions of the economic implications of his plan. "Look, if they'd known from the outset that Central would eventually become a Woodstock Hippie Mecca of sorts," he pauses while preaching. "They wouldn't have wasted the money installing showers, soap-dispensers, washers, dryers, even beds (foot-in-the-mouth face) in those dorms. Shit, just stock the place with incense, recycling bins, a few tapestries and some bean bag chairs and they won't even know the difference."

Assimilation, according to Gargano, should be a quick and easy process. "Students First Frisbees and UMass hacky sacks will be distributed to all students to promote interaction with the hippies, and The String Cheese something or other' has been contacted to play a set during Southwest Week. If we play our cards right, Billy Bong Thornton and Wesley Pipes will be prominent members of each and every dorm community, and no living area can claim to be a dreadlock-free zone. Besides," he says playfully, "If they don't like it, they can go to Hampshire College."

Carroll releases statement about time in captivity

(AP) — The following is a statement released Saturday by The Christian Science Monitor from freed hostage Jill Carroll:

I'm so happy to be free and am looking forward to spending a lot of time with my family. I want to express my deep appreciation to all the people who worked so long and hard for my release. I am humbled by the sympathy and support expressed by so many people during my kidnapping.

In the past few days, the U.S. military and officials have been extremely generous, and I am grateful for their help. Throughout this ordeal, many U.S. agencies have committed themselves to bringing me safely home.

My colleagues at The Christian Science Monitor have worked ceaselessly to secure my release, and worked with security consultants to do so. Many other news organizations, both inside and outside of Iraq, as well as many officials from Iraq and other countries, worked hard to bring about my freedom.

So many people around the world spoke out on my behalf.

Thank you, all of you.

During my last night of captivity, my captors forced me to participate in a propaganda video. They told me I would be released if I cooperated. I was living in a threatening environment, under their control, and I wanted to go home alive. So I agreed.

Things that I was forced to say while captive are now being taken by some as an accurate reflection of my personal views. They are not. The people who kidnapped me and murdered Alan Enwiya are criminals, at best. They robbed Alan of his life and devastated his family. They put me, my family and

Education bill approved by Congress

By Tanveer Ali
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

NEW YORK — The U.S. House of Representatives approved the renewal of the Higher Education Act, a Republican-backed bill intended to make attending college more affordable.

The comprehensive bill encompassing financial aid measures such as Pell Grants and the TRIO program was passed largely along party lines by a vote of 221 to 199. The reauthorization, which was postponed in September 2005, comes two months after the House voted to cut student loan funding by $12.7 billion.

Republican backers of the bill said it would make college more accessible to lower-income students and touted an increase in the maximum Pell Grant to $6,000 which can now be applied throughout a year.

Congressman Buck McKeon (R-CA), Education and the Workforce Committee chairman, said in a statement that "unfortunately, even with historic levels of federal funding for higher education, the dream of getting a college education continues to elude many low-and middle-income Americans" and that "This bill takes a huge step toward making that dream a reality."

Most of the Democratic opposition came after failing to pass their own version of the bill which would cut interest rates on subsidized student

Ex-hostage returns home, reunites with family

BOSTON — Jill Carroll, the U.S. journalist held hostage for 82 days in Iraq, returned to the United States on Sunday aboard a commercial flight to Boston, saying "I finally feel like I am alive again."

The 28-year-old was accompanied on the Lufthansa flight by a colleague from her employer, the Boston-based Christian Science Monitor, which posted a news story about her return on its Web site two hours after her flight landed. Carroll has been kept out of view of other reporters.

"I finally feel like I am alive again. I feel so good," Carroll said Sunday, according to the newspaper. "To be able to step outside anytime, to feel the sun directly on your face — to see the whole sky. These are luxuries that we just don't appreciate every day."

Carroll left the airport in a black limousine escorted by state police and arrived a short time later at the newspaper's headquarters, where she was reunited with her parents and twin sister.

Carroll was released Thursday after nearly three months in captivity. She was seized Jan. 7 in western Baghdad by gunmen who killed her Iraqi translator while the two were on the way to meet a Sunni Arab official in one of the city's most dangerous neighborhoods.

On her flight, Carroll was touched to find a red rose on her dinner tray, the Monitor reported.

Later, a flight steward dropped off a copy of Friday's USA Today in which she saw her own face framed by a black head scarf. It was a photo of the giant poster that had been erected in Rome. She was tickled to see pictures of her family and kissed the photo of her dad, Jim Carroll. "He looks good," she said, and ran her fingers over the photo of her mom, Mary Beth, the Monitor reported.

Carroll left the Ramstein Air Base in southwestern Germany on Saturday, after arriving from Balad Air Base in Baghdad. She strongly disavowed statements she had made during captivity in Iraq and shortly after her release, saying she had been repeatedly threatened.

In a video recorded before she was freed and posted by her captors on an Islamist Web site, Carroll spoke out against the U.S. military presence. On Saturday, she said the recording was made under duress.

"During my last night in captivity, my captors forced me to participate in a propaganda video. They told me I would be released if I cooperated. I was living in a threatening environment, under their control, and wanted to go home alive. So I agreed," she said in a statement.

Lecturer speaks about 'crisis in communication'

By Holly Seabury
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The nation is in crisis, a recent speaker told University of Massachusetts students, faculty and community members gathered to learn about the communication crisis in America.

Mark Crispin Miller, a professor of media at New York University and author of "Fooled Again," explained his ideas on the fraud of the presidential election in 2004. President George W. Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney's re-election in 2004 was not only "miraculous," he said, but also "stolen."

"Bush and Cheney won again in 2004, and we were fooled again," said Miller. "Their win was statistically and demographically impossible." He said that Bush's re-election for president should have been John Kerry's win instead.

When Miller met the Massachusetts senator in late 2003, Kerry listened to his ideas about possible changes in the voting system, such as his belief that electronic voting machines should not be used.

"If we don't fix election systems to be trustworthy," said Miller, "we can make progress on no other front."

Miller also explained that election fraud is not new, but that it was helped with the scale of the population being entranchised, the use of electronic machines, and the motivation of people with "fierce hatred of American democracy."

And who are these people with such hatred? Miller asked. He emphasized that this issue is not a conservative movement, and this is not about being on the left.

Instead, he claimed, this is about the Bush Republicans, whose disinformation and extensive trickery helped Bush and Cheney win their re-election, according to Miller.

"No matter how bad Republicans are doing right now, they will drown us in election campaigns," said Miller. "The race will tighten, and the Republicans will win."

Miller's book, "Fooled Again," is the latest of the several Bush/Cheney books that he has written.

MARISSA KAVANAUGH/COLLEGIAN

New York University Professor Crispin Miller speaks to an audience of UMass students and faculty about what he calls an American "crisis in communication."

Released in late 2005, it has been ignored by the mainstream media. Not only was Miller refused by radio and TV shows, where he has appeared before to discuss his book, but newspapers nationwide have been discouraged from reviewing or speaking about the work.

"This is not just for conference, and this is not just for writing papers," said Miller. "This is about a communication crisis."

"Fooled Again" was reviewed by only one daily newspaper, the "Florida Sun-Sentinel," and Miller's discussion of his book was allowed only on C-SPAN.

In regards to the crisis in communication he spoke about, as well as the problems with the voting system in America, Miller acknowledged that it is time for serious political action and proposed several solutions, including a new, uniform system of voting.

Miller also said that young people today can help. He encouraged all to continue voting, and not to lose hope at an early age.

Most of all, Miller said he wanted to emphasize clear thinking and analysis in all of America. This, he feels, is the essence of communication, the communication in which is failing each day. American democracy is under attack, Miller said, and the people are the only ones who can help.

"I have faith in American people and their judgments," Miller said. "That is, if they know what they're talking about."

Americans divided over immigration law

By Nancy Benac
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Americans are divided about whether illegal immigrants help or hurt the country, a poll finds. More than one-half of those questioned are open to allowing undocumented workers to obtain some temporary legal status so they can stay in the United States.

At the same time, people doubt that erecting a fence along the U.S.-Mexico border could help to fix such a complex and enduring problem, an AP-Ipsos poll found. Two-thirds do not think it would work.

"You can't go and round up 11 million people and ship them out of the country," said Robert Kelly. The Chicago lawyer is among the 56 percent of Americans who favor offering some kind of legal status. "It just isn't practical," he said.

A smaller but still significant share — 41 percent — opposes offering any kind of legal status, giving voice to a law-and-order mind-set that bristles at the notion of officially recognizing those who did not play by the rules to get here.

"Illegal is criminal," said Louella Kelly, a 65-year-old grandmother from Round Rock, Texas.

She said her 16-year-old granddaughter has had a hard time finding part-time work because of all the jobs taken by those who are illegally in the country. "If we're going to give them amnesty, then why don't we give amnesty to all the people who break out of jail?"

Iran tests new missile system

By Ali Akbar Dareini
Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran conducted its second major test of a new missile within days on Sunday, firing a high-speed torpedo it said no submarine or warship can escape at a time of increased tensions with the U.S. over its nuclear program.

The tests came during war games that Iran's elite Revolutionary Guards have been holding in the Persian Gulf and the Arabian Sea since Friday.

On the maneuvers' first day, Iran said it successfully tested the Fajr-3 missile, which can avoid radar and hit several targets simultaneously using multiple warheads.

The new torpedo, called the "Hoot," or "whale," could raise concerns over Iran's power in the Gulf, a vital corridor for the world's oil supplies and where the U.S. Navy's 5th Fleet is based. During Iran's war with Iraq in the 1980s, Iranian ships attacked oil tankers in the Gulf, and Iran and the U.S. military engaged in limited clashes.

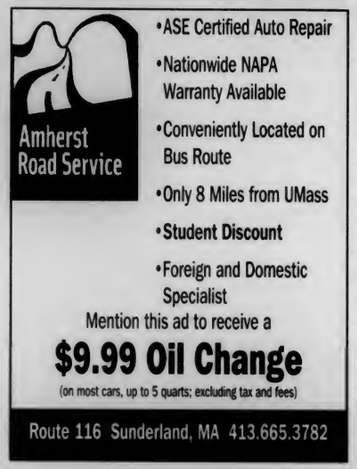
Iran's state television stopped its normal programs to break news of the torpedo test, showing it being launched from a ship into the Gulf waters, then hitting its target, a derelict ship.

Gen. Ali Fadavi, deputy head of the Revolutionary Guards' navy, said the ships that fire the Iranian-made Hoot had radar-evading technology and that the torpedo — moving at 223 miles per hour — was too fast to elude.

"It has a very powerful warhead designed to hit big submarines. Even if enemy warship sensors identify the missile, no warship can escape from this missile because of its high speed," Fadavi told state television.

The Hoot's speed would make it about three or four times faster than a normal torpedo and as fast as the world's fastest known underwater missile, the Russian-made VA-111 Shkval, developed in 1995. It was not immediately known if the Hoot was based on the Shkval.

The new weapon gives Iran "superiority" against any warship in the region, Fadavi said, in a veiled reference to U.S. vessels in the Gulf. It was not immediately clear whether the torpedo can carry a nuclear warhead.



Cmdr. Jeff Breslau, spokesman for the U.S. 5th Fleet based on the tiny Arab island nation of Bahrain in the Gulf, said no special measures were taken in reaction to the Iranian war games, even after the latest missile test.

He would not comment on whether the new torpedo represents a threat to American forces in the region.

In 1988, the frigate USS Samuel B. Roberts was badly damaged by an Iranian mine. In response, the U.S. Navy launched its largest engagement of surface warships since World War II. Two Iranian ships were destroyed, and an American helicopter was shot down, killing the two pilots.

Iran is now trying to show its strength amid worries of U.S. military action over its nuclear program, which Washington says aims to produce nuclear weapons.

Romney aide says chair was forced out

BOSTON (AP) — An aide to Gov. Mitt Romney has vowed to clean up the Massachusetts Appellate Tax Board following the resignation of its chairwoman, whom the aide said was forced out because she was trying to reform the board.

Secretary of Administration and Finance Thomas Trimarco said that because Anne Foley did a great job "the other members turned on her and undermined her efforts."

Foley agreed to resign Friday, effective in five months.

Trimarco also said he would examine what he said were questionable practices by the board, including the "undue" wielding of influence by the lawyers who practice before it.

"The more I have learned about the operations there, the more I have serious concerns about how that board operates," he said. Trimarco's office oversees the board's operation.

A veteran of the board, commissioner Nancy Egan, said she had "no idea" what Trimarco was referring to about lawyers having influence at the board.

"I have been here 25 years, and I have never heard those allegations before," she said.

Foley could not be reached for comment.

The agency is obscure, but has great influence due to its decisions on the state's tax policies. Ninety percent of petitions filed at the board are appeals of local property taxes, according to the board's Web site. It also hears cases on income taxes and sales and use taxes.

The board chairwoman runs the administration of the agency, setting its schedules and assigning cases to commissioners.

Before Foley resigned, four colleagues who have been at odds with her threatened to take away her administrative duties. The other commissioners said her recent decision to withdraw her name for re-nomination raised legal questions whether she could operate as chairwoman.

loans from 6.8 to 3.4 percent.

"It just doesn't do enough to help students to pay for college, which we know is such an integral part of what makes a life in this country successful," said Reid Cherlin, spokesman for Congressman Jerrold Nadler (D-N.Y.) "It's not only important that we try to increase funding for grants, not just loans, but that we try not to undermine the system, which is what the bill does."

The bill also includes an academic bill of rights, which is intended to guarantee students the right to a variety of viewpoints in the classroom and to receive grades on academic merit.

In addition to addressing Pell Grants, the bill abolishes the "single-holder" rule allowing student loan holders to refinance their loans with the service of their choice.

Susan Brown, a Columbia University spokeswoman, said that Columbia lobbied against the act due to provisions which would increase federal oversight over its financial aid operations, restrictions on credit transfers between universities, and a maximum Pell Grant increase which would not significantly aid Columbia students.

"As it's drafted the act offers little for students over the current legislations," Brown said

According to Brown, University Provost Alan Brinkley spoke with Congressman Charlie Rangel (D-Harlem) "to urge his opposition to the bill." Rangel voted against the bill. He did not return calls for comment.

McCain empathizes with Carroll's plight being taken by some as an accurate reflection of my personal views. They are not."

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who was held prisoner for more than five years during the Vietnam War, on Sunday said Carroll found herself in "a terrible, terrible position" and said Americans should view her taped statements critical of the U.S. military presence in Iraq in that context.

"We are glad she's home. We understand when you're held a captive in that situation that you do things under duress. God bless her, and we're glad she's home," McCain said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

McCain said he would not take seriously anything Carroll said while she was being held captive.

"I would not take them seriously, I would not any more than we took seriously other tapes and things that were done in other prison situations, including the Vietnam War," McCain said.

Carroll, who has studied Arabic, attracted a huge amount of sympathy during her ordeal, and a wide variety of groups in the Middle East, including the Islamic militant group Hamas, appealed for her release.

Aside from the short interview aired on Iraqi television upon her release, Carroll had otherwise not shown herself in public prior to a brief appearance Saturday.

The kidnappers, calling themselves the Revenge Brigades, had demanded the release of all female detainees in Iraq by Feb. 26 or Carroll would be killed. U.S. officials did release some female detainees at the time, but said it had nothing to do with the demands.

Workers in Rome roll up the portrait of Jill Carroll that hung as a symbol of prayer for much of her captivity. Carroll read about the picture in USA Today and was "touched."

In the statement, Carroll also disavowed an interview she gave to the Iraqi Islamic Party, a Sunni Arab organization in whose offices she was dropped off upon her release. She said the party had promised her the interview would not be aired "and broke their word."

"At any rate, fearing retribution from my captors, I did not speak freely. Out of fear, I said I wasn't threatened. In fact, I was threatened many times," she said. "Also, at least two false statements about me have been widely aired: One — that I refused to travel and cooperate with the U.S. military, and two — that I refused to discuss my captivity with U.S. officials. Again, neither statement is true."

The remarks have drawn criticism from conservative bloggers and commentators, but the Monitor said "Carroll did what many hostage experts and past captives would have urged her to do: Give the men who held the power of life and death over her what they wanted."

Carroll has said her kidnappers confined her to a small, soundproof room with frosted, opaque windows.

In her statement Saturday, she condemned her captors, although she did not address the war in Iraq.

"I will not engage in polemics. But let me be clear. I abhor all who kidnap and murder civilians, and my captors are clearly guilty of both crimes," she said.

Carroll thanked those who had helped secure her release and said she wanted time to recover.

Carroll happy to be back with her family

my friends — all those around the world — who have prayed so fervently for my release — through a horrific experience. I was, and remain, deeply angry with the people who did this.

I also gave a TV interview to the Iraqi Islamic Party shortly after my release. The party had promised me the interview would never be broadcast or aired on television, and they broke their word. At any rate, fearing retribution from my captors, I did not speak freely. Out of fear I said I wasn't threatened. In fact, I was threatened many times.

Also, at least two false statements about me have been widely aired: One, that I refused to travel and cooperate with the U.S. military and two, that I refused to discuss my captivity with U.S. officials. Again, neither statement is true.

I want to be judged as a journalist, not as a hostage. I remain as committed as ever to fairness and accuracy — to discerning the truth — and so I will not engage in polemics. But let me be clear. I abhor all who kidnap and murder civilians, and my captors are clearly guilty of both crimes.

Now, I ask for the time to heal. This has been a taxing 12 weeks for me and for my family. Please allow us some quiet time alone, together.

— Jill Carroll

The following is a statement from Richard Bergenheim, editor of The Christian Science Monitor:

The Monitor wants to add its gratitude to everyone who is helping Jill return home. You know she's on her way. In addition we want to thank again all those in the Iraqi press who have been tireless in their campaign for Jill's release; we wish to thank the politicians, sheiks, and clerics in Iraq, Jordan, Egypt and other countries who have spoken out as well. And we need to thank all the citizens of Iraq, regular people like you and me, who continue to speak out strongly as well. We are in debt to far too many people to thank them all. Jill will be home soon. As she writes, it is a time for healing. Let the healing begin. Thank you all.

Bestiality case leads to reform

By J. Ferguson
Arizona Daily Wildcat

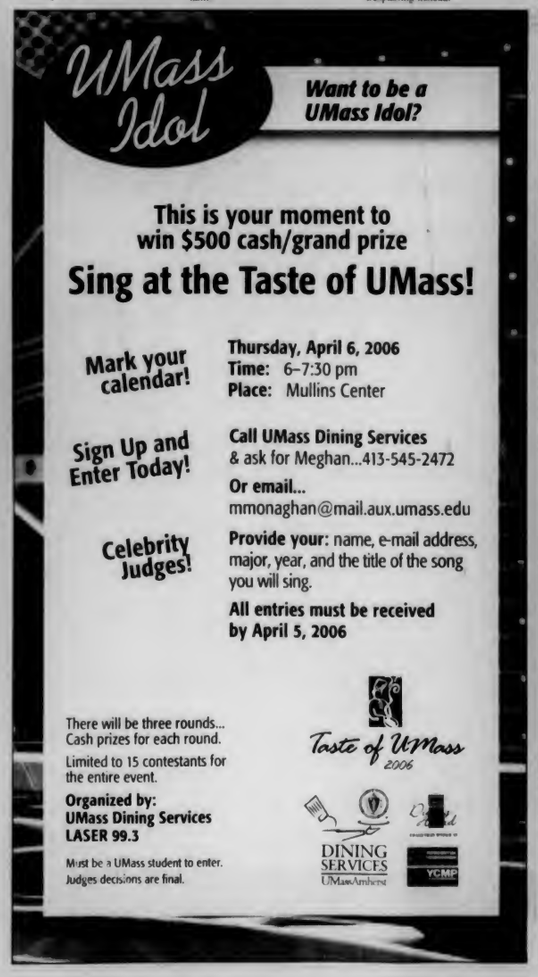
PHOENIX, Ariz. — Public calls for outlawing bestiality will became reality this week in Arizona after a committee approved the bill. The House Counties, Municipalities and Military Affairs Committee unanimously approved a bill earlier this week making bestiality a crime in the state of Arizona.

The bill was introduced in the last week of meetings for the committee and was introduced through a desperate measure that required the death of another bill.

Using the "strike all" amendment, Rep. John Nelson, R-Litchfield Park, gutted the original language from HB 1160, which was designed to remove a law barring the community facilities district from issuing bonds, and substituted the language outlawing bestiality.

Bestiality became a hot-button issue at the legislature three weeks ago, when legislators heard the high-profile story of a Mesa Fire Department deputy fire chief who was caught trying to have sex with a sheep.

The Maricopa County Sheriff's Office reported Leroy Donald Johnson was caught in his neighbor's barn trying to have sex with a lamb.



According to Sheriff's Office reports, Johnson reportedly told his neighbor, "You caught me ... I tried to fuck your sheep."

The report also states that before the 51-year-old grabbed the lamb, he knocked on the front and back doors of his neighbor's house while his neighbor's 13-year-old daughter was home alone.

The report states Johnson had bloodshot eyes and smelled of alcohol when caught by his neighbor with the sheep.

Because there is no current law covering bestiality, Johnson was facing disorderly conduct and criminal trespassing instead.

Top world leaders urge Iraq to pick a governing coalition

By Anne Gearan
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — Frustrated by Iraq's failure to form a government, the chief U.S. and British diplomats told squabbling leaders on Sunday that it is time to pick a governing coalition.

"You can't continue to leave a political vacuum," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said after talks with the prime minister, president and others.

Diverting from a trip to England, Rice joined British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw on an unannounced visit intended to send the signal that international patience has worn thin with the stalemate among Shiites, Sunnis and Kurds since December's elections.

"People have a sense of drift in the process, both in Iraq and outside of Iraq," Rice told reporters.

Since the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, Washington and London have committed nearly all the billions of dollars spent in Iraq and suffered nearly all the casualties. The U.S. and its allies hope a unified government will be able to curb the violence and pave the way for foreign troops to begin heading home.

Pressure is building for the prime minister, Ibrahim al-Jaafari, to step aside as the Shiite nominee for a second term and clear the way for the selection of new leaders. President Jalal Talabani, a Kurd, is working with Sunni and secular parties to try to block al-Jaafari, deepening a stalemate strained by the recent surge in sectarian violence.

Rice and Straw said they set no deadlines in their talks, which included religious and ethnic power brokers.

U.S. officials have made little effort to conceal their desire that al-Jaafari leave office. A week ago, Shiite officials said U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad came to a meeting with the leader of the largest Shiite political organization and carried a letter from President Bush in which he objected to a second term for al-Jaafari.

Rice and Straw posed stiffly for pictures with al-Jaafari; Rice looked pained as she made small talk with the prime minister for a few minutes before the media left the room.

Rice said afterward that the United States is not trying to interfere as the Shiites, who won the largest bloc of votes, chose their leadership. At the same time, she said, "there are two parts to this process. One is you nominate. The other is that someone has to be able to form a government of national unity, and thus far Jaafari has not been able to do that."

The meetings were private affairs by U.S. and Arab standards, absent of the many aides who usually line the walls at such sessions. This time, for the most part it was just Rice, Straw and an Iraqi official.

Rice and Straw made clear "there is a sense of impatience back in Washington and London about the delay," said Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, a Kurd.

A Sunni Arab politician, Adnan al-Dulaimi, said topics covered included "the Iraqi problem in general," security and "hurrying up in forming the government because the Iraqi people have grown bored of waiting. Our points of view matched."

Asked if they discussed the nomination of al-Jaafari for prime minister, al-Dulaimi said only, "We discussed everything."

A statement released by Talabani's office said he discussed "the efforts exerted by the representatives of the political blocs."

Talks among Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish leaders have stalled, in part because of opposition to al-Jaafari's nomination by the Shiite bloc.

"The only way to break that stalemate, in my view, is to go to the parliament, to convene the House of Representatives of 275 persons, and then to resolve this issue, whether it would be him or somebody else," Zebari told CNN's "Late Edition."

On Saturday, Shiite politician Qassim Dawoud joined Sunnis and Kurds in urging a new Shiite nominee. It was the first time a Shiite figure had taken such a step.

"The prime minister can be a national hero by announcing his withdrawal so as to speed things up," Dawoud told The Associated Press on Sunday. He raised the possibility that al-Jaafari's opponents within the Shiite alliance could name an alternative candidate if the prime minister did not withdraw soon.

A second Shiite legislator, Jalal Eddin al-Sagheer, said Sunday that al-Jaafari no longer had the acceptance of Iraqi parties and foreign countries.

"There is no other way out of the government formation problem," he said.

A leading U.S. lawmaker, GOP Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, said from Washington that the Bush administration, after promoting democracy in Iraq, "cannot be seen as again trying to insert a puppet government or however way that's perceived. Just the fact that we had to have the secretary of state and British foreign minister make essentially an emergency visit to Baghdad tells us an awful lot."

Rice stayed overnight in the fortified Green Zone, a first for her. The move was intended to signal confidence in Iraqi security measures and counter the impression among Iraqis that high U.S. officials swoop in to give orders and then quickly depart. Mortar fire could be heard as she dined with Sunni leaders and others.

Rice and Straw made the trip after spending two days touring Straw's parliamentary district in northern England where they ran into vocal demonstrations against the war and Rice's presence.

The diplomats landed in a chilly rain that forced their party to drive from the airport to central Baghdad. The airport road was once notorious for bombings, and Rice has flown by helicopter from the airport on her two previous visits to Iraq as secretary of state.

The drive introduced Rice to a fact of daily life for Baghdad residents: seemingly senseless traffic jams and roadblocks. Her convoy, which usually zips through red lights under police escort, idled motionless in the rain.

Once in the city, mix-ups left some of Rice's aides and reporters stranded in sheets of rain far from the old Saddam Hussein palace that is the U.S. Embassy headquarters.

Newly appointed Cardinal conducts first Mass in Boston

By Mark Pratt
Associated Press

BOSTON — Cardinal Sean O'Malley, in celebrating his first Mass since being elevated into the upper echelons of the Roman Catholic Church's hierarchy, showed that he remains a humble man.

"It's a great joy to be here," O'Malley said Saturday evening at the start of his homily at St. Theresa of Avila Church in the city's West Roxbury neighborhood.

He made just passing reference to his elevation to cardinal.

"The fact that the Holy Father has made the Archbishop of Boston a cardinal joins us more closely to that ministry of service to the universal church," he said.

Instead, he used his homily to urge Catholics to remember that Lent is not about losing weight or quitting smoking, but is about "coming to see Jesus."

O'Malley, who is usually seen in public in the plain brown robe and sandals of his Franciscan order, wore the scarlet cardinal's cassock under violet and white vestments at the Mass, indicating that he saw the event as "an extraordinary occasion," archdiocese spokesman Kevin Shea said.

The vestments were a gift from Pope Benedict XVI and were once worn by Pope John Paul II, O'Malley said, appropriate, because Sunday is the first-year anniversary of John Paul II's death.

O'Malley and 15 others became cardinals March 24 in a Vatican City ceremony.

Saturday's Mass is the first of three O'Malley has scheduled around the archdiocese, the nation's fourth-largest with 2.1 million members, in the coming weeks. The Masses were termed as an opportunity for O'Malley to acknowledge the prayers and support he has received, but they are also a way for him to show he still considers the ordinary parishioners the most important aspect of his job.

Next Sunday, O'Malley is scheduled to celebrate Mass at St. Catherine of Siena in Norwood, and on April 16, he is scheduled to perform a Spanish language Mass at St. Mary of the Assumption in Lawrence.

"After he was elevated to cardinal he decided he wanted to be out with the people rather than only at the Cathedral (of the Holy Cross)," Kevin Shea.

More than 500 people attended the Mass on Saturday, many of them visitors who made their way through a steady rain to the parish just for a glimpse of the new cardinal. Some started showing up at 4 p.m. for the 5:30 p.m. service.

Monsignor William Helmick, the pastor at St. Theresa's, said he was not quite sure why O'Malley selected St. Theresa's, but guessed it was because the 110-year old parish is healthy and vibrant.

"We're just thrilled that he gave us the privilege of receiving him," Helmick said.

O'Malley's elevation to cardinal shows that the Vatican considers Boston an important diocese, he said.

When O'Malley took the Boston job in 2003 at the height of the clergy sex abuse scandal, he inherited a wounded church. He quickly settled lawsuits with more than 500 abuse victims, and began a painful financial reorganization that included unpopular church closings.

He succeeded Cardinal Bernard F. Law, who resigned after his failure to remove abusive priests from ministry.

Outside St. Theresa's, parishioner Kaye O'Connell, 76, said she was disappointed by Law, but energized by O'Malley.

"I came today because I'm delighted to have our wonderful cardinal here," she said. "We're here to support him."

She said she is impressed by O'Malley's humility and the work he has done to heal the wounds left by the clergy sex abuse scandal.

"Hopefully, he will bring some Catholics back that left the church," she said.

Mary Jo Dunleavy, 51, called O'Malley's visit "exciting," adding that his elevation to cardinal "will strengthen the archdiocese and give it some new life."

Immigration issue splits Americans, new poll suggests

Political analysts see an opening in such poll results for President Bush, who supports a temporary guest-worker program.

The Republican Party is divided. Business interests want to preserve their access to foreign workers as a cheap labor force, while many conservatives would rather get tough on illegal immigrants.

The survey found 62 percent of Democrats and 52 percent of Republicans favored temporary worker status.

"If I were in the White House, I would be pretty pleased about this," said Charles Franklin, a University of Wisconsin political science professor who studies public opinion. "It does suggest pretty strongly that the president has the opportunity to drive public opinion on this."

Arizona State University professor Bruce Merrill said immigration was the first issue he had seen in 20 years that did not clearly break along partisan lines. "Conservative Democrats don't feel any different from conservative Republicans," he said, with both camps strongly opposing the idea of rewarding people who broke the law to enter the country.

The AP-Ipsos survey of 1,003 adults was conducted Tuesday through Thursday. Debate is swirling in Congress over a proposal that would legalize many illegal immigrants in the United States and expand guest worker programs for an estimated 400,000 immigrants each year.

Two-thirds of those surveyed think illegal immigrants fill jobs that most Americans do not want, the poll found.

But the survey found greater ambiguity on whether illegal immigrants are good or bad for American society. Fifty-one percent said illegal immigrants mostly make a contribution to society and 42 percent said they were mostly a drain.

Likewise, there was deep division on how serious a crime it should be to enter the country illegally. Fifty-one percent thought it should be considered a "minor offense" and 47 percent considered it a "serious criminal offense."

"Americans are quite divided, but it seems as if they are looking for a solution that involves some sort of legal documentation," said Brian Sanderoff, president of Research and Polling Inc., based in Albuquerque, N.M. He predicted that as the issue gets more attention in coming months, more Americans will start forming strong opinions.

Both pro- and anti-immigration interests predicted opinion would move in their direction as people become better informed.

Michelle Waslin, director of immigration policy research for the National Council of La Raza, a Hispanic advocacy group, said that as people consider the specific requirements that immigrants would have to meet to obtain legal status, they are more supportive of the idea.

PARKING SERVICES REGULATION REMINDER

Effective Monday, April 3, 2006, Parking Services is returning to regular hours of parking enforcement. These hours are from 7:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m., Monday through Friday. Valid UMASS parking permits are required in all parking lots, with the exception of metered lots. Metered lots are enforced for payment from 9:00 a.m. to 5:00 p.m., Monday through Friday.

From 5:00 p.m. to 7:00 a.m., Monday through Friday, on weekends and on holidays, vehicles may park in any legal, non-reserved, non-restricted parking space or lot without displaying a permit. Give him jail time, not an easy out

"An eye for and eye" seems to be a universal principle of justice, and yet, what our eyes see as equal is completely subject to the society and context of the event. Sometimes an eye for an eye becomes more like an eye for a head. In Afghanistan, the government thinks converting to Christianity is a crime that deserves a beheading. In this country, it would never be considered a crime because it is socially acceptable and in many ways desirable.

If someone steals your wallet, you may wish to steal theirs back, but since we rationally cannot give someone a taste of their own medicine, we instead expect the justice system to dish out a punishment that equates to the crime. As the crime severity increases, the views of what is a justified punishment become more diverse and conflicting, as evident with the endless controversy surrounding capital punishment.

While the death penalty debate is old, polarizing and beaten to death, the recent trial of Zacarias Moussaoui is creating new questions to add to this discourse.

Mr. Moussaoui was arrested on Aug. 16, 2001 due to allegations that he was conspiring with Al Qaeda to help plan the September 11 attacks. Until recently, his involvement was thought to have been minimal, but last week, Moussaoui actually offered to testify against himself, admitting that he was intending to hijack and fly a fifth plane into the White House on September 11th, 2001.

He gave this testimony without asking the prosecution to stop seeking the death penalty because he reportedly "told agents that he did not want to die in prison." In fact, it has been suggested in the media that Moussaoui is seeking "martyrdom through execution."

Despite the fact that his request is so grim and masochistic, we still have to see it for what it is — an attempt to escape a life of punishment and misery.

While every aspect of 9/11 was extremely tragic, one of the hardest things to grasp was that the terrorists who hijacked those planes could not be brought to justice. It is frustrating to know that they achieved their goal by not only successfully killing over 3,000 American citizens, but by taking their own lives, avoiding punishment and becoming martyrs to the followers of Al Qaeda and radical, militant Islam as well.

However, now we do have Moussaoui, someone who admittedly intended to be part of this horrific attack, and we can bring him to justice. The problem is that his recent admission of guilt is tainted by allegations that his testimony is riddled with lies. Many believe he is overstating his intended involvement in 9/11 so he can be convicted and killed. In this situation, justice is being turned on its head.

I'm sure many people do not want Moussaoui to die under any circumstance because they feel it is inhumane. Others do want him to die no matter what, because they feel under the law it is the highest punishment we could give him. But is granting this psychotic extremist's wish justice?

Real justice should be denying him anything he desires. Despite the fact that his request is so grim and masochistic, we still have to see it for what it is — an attempt to escape a life of punishment and misery. Moussaoui has said he does not want to die "in jail on a toilet," and who can blame him when he could have us lethally inject him and arrive at his afterlife paradise where 30 virgins supposedly await him?

It is more than likely that nothing awaits Mr. Moussaoui after he dies, but to let him pass away thinking he has won is not justice. It will not bring any sort of solace to the people who were significantly affected by the events of September 11th either. Moussaoui should be confined to prison for the rest of his life, partly because of his suspicious testimony in which we cannot decipher the truth about his intentions, and partly because a man like him should not get a single thing he asks for.

Call me vengeful, inhumane or whatever you'd like, but remember that if he actually got to fly that fifth plane, there is no way of knowing how that could have changed your life or mine. It very well could have killed someone you or I loved, and if I were in the shoes of someone whose life did change by losing a loved one on that day, I would want Mr. Moussaoui to spend a long, miserable life in jail, pathetically dying on a toilet.

Border crossers beware

Dan Nicastro

Over the last few months, Congress has debated back and forth over the prospect of a new immigration bill which seeks to curtail illegal immigration. The bill proposes to do this by kicking illegal immigrants out of the country and tightening border security to deal with any new immigrants trying to cross the border illegally. The bill also punishes employers who knowingly hire or employ illegal immigrants, upping the punishment of this offense from a misdemeanor to a felony.

The issue is so contentious that it has not only elicited massive demonstrations against the bill, but it has even split the Republican Party down the middle. Tom Tancredo, a Republican congressman from Colorado, is the major supporter of this original bill, saying that illegal immigration is too protected a practice in this country and needs to be stopped.

It may shock you to read this, but Mr. Tancredo is correct in his assessment. Illegal immigrants take away disgusting, grueling, low paying crap jobs from decent, hard working Americans who need them badly. Reported unemployment hovers around five percent right now. Just think how much lower that number would dip if we were to pass the bill in its original form. Additionally, the Americans who receive jobs as a result of this bill will be so happy to actually have jobs that they will be willing to receive pay as low as the illegal immigrants working now.

President Bush and other members of Congress have talked about toning the bill down and have proposed less rigid versions, most notably the McCain-Kennedy Bill. This new version agrees to tighten border restrictions, but also proposes the creation of a guest worker program which would still allow illegal immigrants to work in the country, in order to make sure that the work force stays afloat.

This is exactly the problem. The McCain-Kennedy Bill sees America as some sort of a nation of immigrants or some sort of melting pot. All I know is that people from other countries cannot and should not populate a nation, as it takes away from the rich and full history of the native Americans (that is, the Americans that live here now, not the actual Native American people who were kicked out to make way for the rest of us).

Obviously, the McCain-Kennedy bill can't hold a candle to Tancredo's original version. In order to create better border security, the Tancredo bill wants to build a 700 mile wall along the Mexico-Texas border. Although this is a good start, more needs to be done in order to combat the waves of immigrants arriving in this country daily.

George Lucas may be able to edit the original "Star Wars" movies to include scenes where Chewie keeps getting his green card revoked before he has a chance to fix the Millennium Falcon.

First off, 700 miles is not enough. The southern border of the United States stretches about 1,900 miles. That's 1,200 miles of unprotected land that we need to stop from being breached. But to show that we're serious about keeping illegal immigrants out, we should resurrect a plan abandoned in the '80s and update it: "Star Wars."

In this new, updated version of "Star Wars," we will finally create the missile system Ronald Reagan proposed in the '80s, but it will rest on top of the giant fence always pointed at Mexico, just in case they try something underhanded like sneaking across the border.

However, we'll actually hire members of the Empire from "Star Wars," as no one will want to cross the border if they see Darth Vader staring them in the face. We could even shape the missile system in the form of the Death Star, in order to further intimidate possible illegal immigrants. And just think — we could put on plays every day to garner money (all the droids on Tatooine get deported so that good old human slobs like Luke can work even harder).

This idea provides endless possibilities. In fact, George Lucas may be able to edit the original "Star Wars" movies to include scenes where Chewie keeps getting his green card revoked before he has a chance to fix the Millennium Falcon. Maybe he could make the Imperial Empire parallel the INS, and have them chasing the wimpy-ass Rebel Alliance, who want every C3PO, R2D2 and Yoda to have a job with decent wages (he can compare the Alliance to the whining liberals). He could even repackage the DVDs for another $50 a pop, because you know that people will still buy them.

Dealing with day-to-day maintenance will also be an easily solved problem, as we won't have to hire any other paid help, because we can offer "Star Wars" geeks the chance to actually work with their favorite characters. In fact, we may be able to market this as an amusement park. Kids and adults alike can protect the American way of life from the job stealing immigrants and get their picture taken with the Death Star at the same time.

This is one of the best ideas I've heard regarding the immigration issue. I mean, come on. People may be angry at the government for kicking out illegal immigrants, but if Darth Vader proposes the change, who's going to fight it?

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

FIGHT THE WAR A NEW WAY: HOW TO HELP IRAQI STUDENTS

Textbooks are a common topic of conversation among American students: they are too heavy, too expensive, too boring or our readings from them are too long. Textbooks are a part of our everyday life at college, because not only do we use them for our studies, but most students have access to them. Whether we get our textbooks from the campus bookstore, online or from the library, textbooks are something that most American college students take for granted.

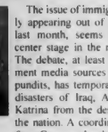
The students of Baghdad University, the largest university in Iraq, are not as fortunate as students in America. According to the National Priorities Project, UNICEF estimates that more than 200 schools in Iraq were destroyed and thousands more were looted in the chaos following the fall of Saddam Hussein.

According to Jeff Spur, a Harvard professor, the entire collection of 175,000 books and manuscripts at the library of the University of Baghdad's College of Arts was reduced to ashes. Not only has Baghdad University lost almost everything, the limited resources that they do have are extremely outdated. This horrible challenge these students now face concerning their education is just one more unacceptable repercussion of the war.

People do not normally understand the smaller impacts of war, but our common ground as students allows us to understand how devastating war is on education. Without books or libraries I cannot fathom my education making significant progress. I understand how important it is for all students everywhere, including in Iraq, to have access to textbooks.

They are such an essential part of our education that I cannot imagine how the students of Baghdad University are able to obtain a decent education. As a student with extensive access to many resources, including textbooks, I am not willing to let my fellow students of Baghdad University struggle to maintain their basic right of education.

There is a project called Books Building Bridges which has recently been launched in Western Massachusetts, and is dedicated to examining the impact of war on libraries, literacy and education in the U.S. and in Iraq. In partnership with Books to Baghdad, Books Building Bridges is looking for donations of academic textbooks published within the last five years in the following subjects: engineering, math, science, computer science, medicine, and technology.



The donated books will be shipped to faculty and students at Baghdad University in July 2006. Books Building Bridges is also working with colleges and universities in the Valley to support book donation drives on various campuses.

I often am overwhelmed and frustrated by the expansiveness of the war, and feel that I cannot be proactive. However, this is something tangible that we can do as students in America to help improve the life and education of students in Iraq. Let's stand up against the war by taking a different angle in our protests — it is past due to start mending the lives of those that were unjustly destroyed.

Help is needed on campus to organize book collection efforts. For more information about Books Building Bridges and what you can do to help with the textbook drive, contact Jo at the American Friends Service Committee, afsc@crocker.com or 413-584-8975.

Race card is pulled to avoid bigger issue

Jeff Napolitano

The issue of immigration, strangely appearing out of nowhere in the last month, seems to have taken center stage in the national debate. The debate, at least from establishment media sources and right-wing pundits, has temporarily moved the disasters of Iraq, Afghanistan and Katrina from the deserved focus of the nation. A coordinated campaign from Congress has been undertaken, particularly by the right-wing Rep. Sensenbrenner and Sen. Frist, to drive the fear of God into people about the "immigrant problem" in the country.

These very people are the same ones greatly responsible for incurring and perpetuating great damage both to men, women and children overseas through violence and men, women and children in this country through economic devastation. That we actually allow them to scare us over this "imminent threat" yet again (remember Saddam Hussein?) would be a testament to the country's collective stupidity and loss of memory.

But this specter is being thrown up all over the country, eerily reminiscent of threatmongering. I remember from the 1980s: "The immigrants are coming! The immigrants are coming!" That we address the issue of immigration before we resolve the issue of the criminal slaughter of our brothers and sisters in Iraq and elsewhere is a radical error in prioritization and obvious political smokescreen we cannot afford to make or tolerate.

Furthermore, those who have become hysterical in fostering furor over the issue — particularly rich, white males — indicate their motivation. This furor has all the usual traits of fascism, a term I do not use often: racism towards a marginalized group, hysteria over a looming menace and an appeal to a vengeful patriotism.

If we're going to talk about who deserves to come to this country, shouldn't we first ask a few Native Americans? If those who truly (if not first) had claim to this land were decrying the flow of Latin Americans, I'd listen — I really would.

The racism of the situation is almost laughingly ironic. Watching men from families who came to this country from Ireland, Italy, England and other parts of Europe rant and rave about foreigners invading our borders is priceless comedic material. I'm just waiting for Dave Chappelle to come up with an appropriately biting satirical skit about the hypocrisy of the situation.

If we're going to talk about who deserves to come to this country, shouldn't we first ask a few Native Americans? If those who truly (if not first) had claim to this land were decrying the flow of Latin Americans, I'd listen — I really would. But should we listen to Bill O'Reilly, demanding that we revoke the law mandating that those born here are American citizens? No — we should hunt him down and toss his over-privileged a over the Mexican border, so that he can see how luxurious it is to live a life of poverty.

We should certainly understand the people (particularly the white people) who are being riled up and whose fears are being pandered to by those who would like to distract us from the vastly greater ways working- and middle-class people are being stolen from and deceived. With the cost of the war in Iraq approaching one trillion dollars, with a Department of Defense budget approaching half of that, with the flight of capital of billions and billions of dollars by transnational corporations, it is almost understandable that those in power would appeal to the tried-and-true approach of dividing people based on the color of their skin and their country of origin.

It is almost understandable that those in power pull the race card (us vs. them) to prevent the greater issue from being addressed, that is, the stark issue of class, that giant elephant in the room. For it those who have been riled up, those who are being told that the immigrants are the cause of their problems, those who patrol the borders under the deception that they are doing something patriotic became aware that their livelihood and their dignity were being sold away by those who are playing on their fears, then surely our existing systems of power would be torn asunder.

We should certainly have an immigration policy. It should consist of this: anyone who desires a decent way of life, is willing to work for it, and has a modicum of respect for others should be allowed to come here and be a citizen, period. If that were the standard, then we would be a country in which millions of currently undocumented workers would be allowed to live with dignity and respect. And if having a "modicum of respect for others" were the standard for living here, then there'd be quite a few members of Congress (as well as pundits in talk radio and newspapers) who we'd have to ship back to where they came from.

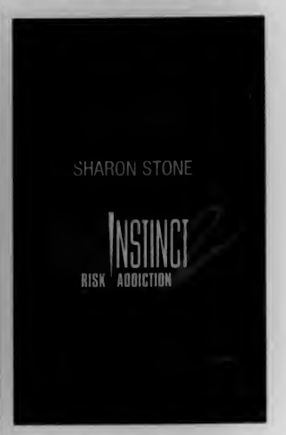
Instinct's return can't save career

By Jake Monte
Collegian Staff

In "Basic Instinct," Sharon Stone made a name for herself playing the sexy, icy Catherine Tramell. She was believable as a stone-cold killer, although the film left her guilt in question. She got more attention for uncrossing her legs than her acting, but she could cry and exude confidence with the best of them. Similarly, in 1995's "Casino" she proved to everyone she was more than just an aging pretty face. Now, she's back at the age of fifty, delivering lines of dialogue like "Do you ever think that maybe you want me to be the killer? Like some guys are into blonds and some guys are into killers."

Before questioning why Stone would take this role, be aware that this film has been in the works for quite some time. In 2004, Stone sued Andy Vajna and Mario Kassar, stating that they had a verbal agreement that she would be paid 14 million for the sequel and the film wasn't getting made. Before settling out of court, the two claimed she was slowing down production by rejecting a slew of potentials including Benjamin Bratt, who she said wasn't a good enough actor. After "Basic Instinct 2," however, Stone is going to have difficulty claiming anyone isn't a good enough actor. She's terrible in this film.

In the first scene, Tramell is speeding down the road in a C8 Laviolette with a drugged out passenger beside her. "Guess what," the passenger says. "I can't move." "Yeah well, you don't have to," Tramell responds. "You're in a car." The latter is bad dialogue no matter who says it, but Stone manages to deliver it as a melodramatic punch line you'd expect to hear from a soap opera actress. Stone takes the passenger's hand and puts it between her legs. She puts the pedal to the metal and drives off a dock at 110 miles an hour in orgasmic frenzy. The car sinks while she swims to the surface, leaving her friend to die. At the police station she says, "I'm traumatized. Who knows if I'll ever come again."



It's by no means a good film, as you can clearly tell. It's trash. But after the first twenty minutes it begins to straighten itself out. Tramell is introduced to Dr. Andrew Glass (David Morrissey), who — like Nick Curran in the first film — has a past. Glass did nothing about his suspicion that one of his patients would harm his girlfriend, but he doesn't blame himself for the fact that the patient beat his girlfriend to death with a brick. A friend of his, reporter Adam Tower, is threatening to reveal Glass's secret.

As the story progresses, Tower and others begin to die. Like the first film, screenwriters Henry Bean and Leora Barish pose the question of two possible killers. One is Tramell; the other is police detective Roy Washburn (David Thewlis). Glass investigates it as he begins to fall prey to, as Tramell would say, "The lurid, the sexual, the violent — the basic instincts." Of course, there's a romance between Glass and Tramell — sort of a "love-hate" relationship.

Stone has become a caricature of her former self, and a badly drawn one at that. The confidence she had in her looks, her self-possession, and her acting skill is all gone. Had Stone taken a fresh route and asked herself what she was realistically capable of she might have been able to find a genuine performance instead of mimicking her performance in 1992, the first Basic Instinct. Her name may signal "bombshell," but for this over-the-hill actress her performance is more of a dud. She's the worst thing about this film, and considering this sexually-charged imitation of the first film doesn't have Michael Douglas to carry it, that's saying a lot.

Stone's 1992 performance in "Basic Instinct" propelled her reputation for playing promiscuous roles in films. That image is still going strong at age 49, thanks to risque scenes in "Instinct 2."

The new film, directed by Michael Caton-Jones, is getting poor ratings across the country.

Sharon Stone stars along with Charlotte Rampling in this sexual killer thriller.

"It's by no means a good film, as you can clearly tell. It's trash. But after the first twenty minutes it begins to straighten itself out."

David Morrissey plays Dr. Michael Glass opposite Stone, who plays novelist Catherine Tramell.

Folk-rock's Barefoot Truth aims for fame with new album

By Alex Roth
Collegian Staff

With the beginning of summer in sight, one may be looking for a new band to provide the soundtrack to summertime adventures — outings to the local beach, long drives down the coast, night-time bonfires with friends. When it seems the typical Jack Johnson/Dave Matthews/Guster triad has been played out, consider this option: Barefoot Truth, a New England band with natural chemistry and an affinity towards laid-back lyrics and calming sounds.

Jay Driscoll and Will Benoit met in 2003. They bonded due to their similar musical interests and influences and started to jam soon after. At the time, the two musicians lacked a name for their beach-y ensemble, but no matter — they pressed on, and began to practice cover songs and write original songs influenced by bands like Dispatch, Guster, and Dave Matthews Band. "We hoped to just cover songs at local bars for fun, maybe throwing in some original material if we came up with it. Maybe gain a bit of local notoriety," said Driscoll.

Eventually, they played gigs at several New England clubs. Their first gig was at the most unusual of places: a marina restaurant called The Blue Door, located in Mystic, Conn.

"When we were setting up, people were all dressed up, having a quiet dinner. We began playing and some customers actually asked us if we would unplug from the speakers ... but we kept playing," said Driscoll.

Although discouraging at first, the gig ended successfully when the patrons of the restaurant offered them $50 to continue playing for another half hour.

At subsequent shows, fans inquired if the duo had released an album. In response to this, Driscoll and Benoit decided to give the fans what they wanted. They took a stab at recording at a studio in North Stonington, Conn. called In Phaze Audio. Here, they recorded a self-titled demo that featured seven of their "acoustic-folk-rock with an island folk vibe" songs.

The album was received better than the duo ever expected, so Driscoll and Benoit decided to take their music to the next level. In the winter of 2005, they traveled to Lake West Recording Studio in Rhode Island to work on some more music and to re-record old songs. They enlisted the help of Jack Gauthier, who they had worked with before and who had also produced many albums of the late band Dispatch.

The pair also had the opportunity to work with Dispatch's Pete Francis. "[Pete Francis] is one of our musical heroes ...so being in the studio with him was a really cool feeling for Will and me," Driscoll explained.

Barefoot Truth will be releasing the album, called "Club House Sessions," on April 4.

Since Benoit and Driscoll are both college students, the album will serve as a perfect interlude for fans to enjoy new music while the band does not have gigs scheduled.

"Knowing that [Benoit] was going to be overseas all spring semester, we wanted to record a handful of our new tunes so people would have something new of ours to listen," Driscoll said.

The band also sees the album as an opportunity to extend their fan base beyond the typical high school-college student base. "We have had children attend our shows with grandparents, which really is pretty cool to see," said Driscoll.

"Club House Sessions" can be purchased at Dynamite Records and Turn It Up Records, both located in Northampton, or through the duo's Web site, barefoottruth.com. Check out myspace.com/barefoottruth about the band, as well as songs available for download.

New England folk-rockers Jay Driscoll and Will Benoit were influenced by bands like Guster, Dave Matthews band and Guster. The two hope their new album will expand their fan base.

SHA promotes new way to reach loved ones in emergency

By Mindy Jitmanowan
Collegian Correspondent

The invention of the cell phone has had a tremendous impact on everyone, especially its owners. Almost 90 percent of college students have cell phones, allowing the owner, at the touch of a button, to contact his or her loved ones. Cell phones have proven to be extremely important especially at a time of emergency. But when coming upon a casualty who is unconscious or incapable of communicating with the paramedic, what does the paramedic do? What happens when members of emergency services must come upon the decision of what to do in a life-threatening emergency and who to contact in a cell phone address book? Whom should the paramedic call?

It might seem obvious to just have the paramedics scroll down to "Mom" or "Dad" to call when they come upon a college student. But this might not be the correct case for everyone. Perhaps dialing the number of a listed parent might not be appropriate, as there are cases where the casualty might be estranged from their parents, or their parents might be too elderly or suffering from illness, and wasn't able to make a decision. Some people might not even have their mother or father easily listed as "Mom" or "Dad." Maybe they want a best friend or partner to know and make a decision for them, instead of their parents. So what could be done to give paramedics a way of getting hold of the appropriate person?

Fortunately, a clinical team leader for the East Anglian Ambulance NHS Trust, Bob Brotchie, thought up the idea of ICE. Brotchie created this idea two years ago after years and years of trying to reach casualties' next of kin. Putting ICE on a cell phone never caught on, though, until it gained widespread coverage after the London bombings in July of 2005. An acronym for "In Case of Emergency," ICE is put before the name of the people who we wish to designate as our next of kin. This is programmed into the cell phone address book as a few designated ICE numbers, such as "ICE — Mom" or "ICE — Sam." In an emergency situation, ambulance workers and hospital staff are able to contact your designated next of kin in just a touch of a button.

ICE is hoped to be a popular idea worldwide, but it is slowly making its way into cell phones.

"It is so important to use and spread the idea of ICE, not only to help lighten the difficult jobs of ambulance service members, but also to create a worldwide knowledge of ICE so everyone can use one simple and easy method to contact family members," said Sharon King, co-chairman of the Student Health Association board at UMass, which is promoting and spreading awareness of the ICE campaign.

"By helping spread this knowledge of ICE, we are helping alleviate some of the extraneous stress of emergency service workers by providing identification and information about a casualty," King adds. "It's an amazingly simple idea that can save a life, and the best part is that it only takes a few presses of your cell phone buttons."

UM downed by Eagles

through the middle, which BC worked around with some goals from outside to bump out to a 6-3 lead.

The storm then rushed through Garber Field as time was winding down in the first half, the first time in the school's history that a women's lacrosse game has been delayed due to a microburst. BC concluded the first half with an Elizabeth Kadison (four goals) score to make it 7-3.

"It wasn't necessarily midfield in the first half, but it was just that with their defense, we had difficulty finding the open player," UMass coach Carrie Bolduc said of the first half, in which the Minutewomen committed a season-high 15 turnovers. "We just didn't see the open kid. We struggled with that."

After Emily Hannigan (four points) scored on a free position shot to make it 9-3 five minutes into the second half, Bolduc replaced goalkeeper Lauren McCarthy with backup Krissy Anderson. Less than 40 seconds later another goal on a free position shot, this one from Margot Spatola (game-high five points), made it 10-3.

Just when it looked like the game was out of reach, however, it became a contest again. Two goals each from Jeanette Villapiano (three points) and Kathleen Typadis (three points) cut BC's lead to 11-8, and with 12 minutes still on the clock, a comeback win was looking possible.

But too many fouls—UMass committed an unnerving 29, to BC's 18—gave the Eagles too many opportunities to put this one out of reach, and they did just that.

Following Typadis' goal at the 12-minute mark that cut the Eagles' lead to three, BC called a timeout and replaced goalie Katie Monaghan with Courtney Zwirko. Thirty seconds later, Spatola was fouled, and flung the ensuing free position shot past Anderson for a 12-8 score.

BC's defense then held tough for the next six minutes, before Spatola put the final nail in the coffin with another free position goal at the six-minute mark to make it 13-8. The teams then exchanged goals over the remaining time to make the 16-10 final.

In all, seven of the Eagles' 16 goals came on as a result of a free position shot, something the Bolduc stressed cannot continue to happen.

Cloud hangs over MLB

By Erin McClam
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Baseball relies on numbers the way the Earth relies on gravity.

So the conundrum facing the game at the start of its new season is awkward at best, devastating at worst: Arguably its most hallowed statistical record is under assault by a man who is — unarguably, at the moment — its most vilified player.

The man is Barry Bonds, left fielder for the San Francisco Giants, owner of 708 career home runs and public focal point of a furor over steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs in baseball.

The scandal, now under investigation by former Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, comes at what should be a time of celebration: Monday is opening day for most teams, and Bonds is closing in on Hank Aaron's record of 755 lifetime homers.

"The goal here is to determine facts," baseball commissioner Bud Selig said in announcing the investigation.

But for a game whose beauty rests in its certainty — clean lines, clear rules, ball or strike, out or safe — the steroids controversy has raised an awful lot of questions with murky answers, or no answers at all.

Example: How can Bonds, who was booed roundly in spring training appearances, alone be the object of such intense rage by fans when so many other players blew up like Macy's parade floats beginning in the 1990s, era of the baseball power surge?

And how can baseball gain credibility by announcing an investigation only now, when it had anonymous test results showing players were doping in 2003? And when it only banned performance-enhancers a year before that?

"Why didn't they do amphetamines in the 1970s?" wonders Daniel Okrent, a former public editor of The New York Times who has written extensively about the game. "I think that baseball generally does things like this when they have no choice."

In the case of steroids, he was referring to pressure from Congress, which hauled several sluggers before a committee last year. At that hearing, the mammoth Mark McGwire would offer only a meek, "I'm not going to talk about the past."

The Mitchell probe was triggered by the publication of "Game of Shadows," by two San Francisco Chronicle reporters, which claims Bonds began taking steroids after he watched McGwire, then beloved, break the single-season home run mark in 1998.

The book portrays Bonds, whose offensive production subsequently ballooned, as taking an array of performance enhancers that would make a pharmacist dizzy — hormones, steroids, fertility drugs for women.

Bonds, who has denied using steroids, opens the season 47 home runs shy of the record. He has hit 45 or more in five separate seasons since "Game of Shadows" alleges he began his drug regimen.

The question raises the issue of whether, presuming Bonds breaks the record and is found to have used steroids, his numbers should be scrubbed from the books, or marked with the infamous asterisk.

Shot clock would help game

National Basketball Association instituted the 24-second clock in 1954. Say what you will about the quality of NBA basketball today, but it's a whole lot more exciting watching Kobe Bryant jack up 30 shots a game in the triangle offense instead of running the four corners 40 feet from the bucket.

The idea, obviously, is to pick up the pace in what is supposed to be "the fastest game on two feet." Not only would a shot clock provoke more aggressive play on the offensive side, it would also make sure that the team with the lead couldn't stay content with doing laps around the box for the final five minutes of the fourth quarter.

Naysayers — like fans of the Princeton championship teams of the 1990s — would argue that this may, in turn, take offensive sets out of the equation, and plays that take six passes to set up will be thrown out of the playbook in favor of more one-on-one attacks from high in the box. This may be true at first while the athletes are adjusting to the new rules, and it was definitely an obvious flaw in the MLL game before the 60-second clock relieved the shorter version.

But like anything else, the players and coaches will eventually adapt. The grassroots fans will still watch. And as the sport of lacrosse has been marketing itself to the verge of mainstream popularity over the past few years, higher offensive numbers and fewer instances of stalling will attract the casual sports fan.

If nothing else, it's worth a shot.

Down in Durham

A quick word on something downright disturbing and much more serious than a shot clock for the college game...

What is going on down at Duke University with the men's lacrosse team could potentially turn out to be the greatest of sports tragedies over the last couple decades. With 46 of the team's 47 players currently under investigation for the alleged rape and strangulation of a hired stripper amid a whirl of racism, the integrity of one of the country's most prestigious institutions is taking a hit unlike any that can be seen on an athletic field.

And with the notoriety of the civil war between Duke and the city of Durham starting to make waves in every media outlet across the nation, it seems that — no matter what comes about with these harsh allegations — the relationship between Duke and Durham is tarnished for good.

It appears that the mixture of Duke students — mostly wealthy, white males — and Durham residents — a working class, diverse group with a 43.8 percent black population according to the 2000 Census — was a powder keg a la the Balkans leading into World War I.

With the instances from the night in question looking more and more like the result of a hate crime, things are spiraling out of control in that athletic department faster than a Jay Williams free throw in the NCAA Tournament.

With Duke's self-imposed indefinite suspension for the remainder of the 2006 season, the game has lost this year's championship favorites and last year's national championship runners-up. It's no wonder why no one in the lacrosse world is talking about this. Who wants to put themselves out in the open as the player or coach who opened their mouth and said the wrong thing?

No matter how this comes to a resolution, it will be ugly right until the bitter end. If charges aren't filed — or if they are and the players in question are found innocent — the struggle between Duke's trust fund babies and Durham's diversity may get even uglier. There will be questions of an institutionalized cover-up to save face within the team and university.

And if charges are filed and the athletes are found guilty, they will make the transition from playing a game with their name stitched on their back to wearing a uniform with a number sewn on front. Duke will suffer a dreadful fallout, and every athlete in America will sport an unsightly scar.

Either way, this won't end with the slam of a gavel. In fact, the hammer hasn't even begun to drop.

inning to secure the team's first conference win of the year, snapping a seven-game losing streak.

Sophomores Ryan Franczek and Bryan Adamski led the Minutemen in the win. Franczek went 2-for-4 with a grand slam, four RBIs, two walks and two runs scored. Adamski showed his versatility by not only producing at the plate, but also providing the team with a solid performance on the mound. The first baseman was 2-for-6 on the day with a run scored and two RBIs. He also came in to pitch the eighth, ninth and 10th innings to get the win, improving his record on the hill to 1-1.

UMass could not have bounced back any better from a loss the day before, tagging Richmond starting pitcher Ian Marshall for eight runs on five hits in the top of the first inning. The Spiders held the Minutemen to only one run in the next eight innings, and battled back to tie the game at nine in the bottom of the ninth, forcing extra innings.

UMass had five consecutive players reach base safely in the top of the tenth when junior Lou Prisetti scored the go-ahead run on a throwing error, making it 10-9. Adamski would come home as an insurance run on a sacrifice burnt, but with his dominating pitching performance in the bottom of the tenth, Prisetti's run proved to be the game-winner.

The winning did not continue for UMass, as it suffered a 10-5 loss yesterday in the rubber match of the series against Richmond. The Spiders scored seven runs on nine hits in the first three innings to put the game out of reach early on with a 7-2 lead.

The Minutemen had a chance to get back in the game in the top of the sixth when they loaded the bases with no outs, but Spiders reliever Jason Bolinsik was able to get out of the jam and only allowed one run on an RBI groundout.

UMass was able to score two more runs in the later innings, but Richmond scored one run in the seventh and two in the eighth to maintain the win.

Scoreboard shutdown

Minutemen unable to get offense going at Penn State

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

STATE COLLEGE, Pa. — The scoreboard at Penn State's Jeffrey Field was not working during Saturday's ECAC clash between the Nittany Lions and the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team. Initially the blank scoreboard seemed like nothing more than an inconvenience, as players could not simply look up and see the time and score, but it actually proved to be symbolic of how the game would play out.

Penn State (4-3, 2-1 ECAC) upset the Minutemen 7-5 in a game that wouldn't have lit up the scoreboard, even if it had been functioning. Knowing they were shorthanded due to injuries and were less-skilled than No. 7 UMass (6-2, 1-1 ECAC), the Nittany Lions slowed the pace of the game and limited the Minutemen's scoring opportunities.

The game plan proved effective, as the slow pace and the stellar play of Nittany Lion goalie Drew Adams were enough to stifle the Minutemen and their potent offensive attack, which was the third best in the nation entering the game.

"I'm sure coming in that was their game plan, to [slow the tempo]," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "They executed it perfectly. When you have a good goalie and can get extra possessions and are able to take two and three minutes off the clock in each of them, you're going to be successful."

Adams was at his best late in the game, as he held UMass scoreless for the last 22 minutes of the contest. Adams stoned the Minutemen on three shots from the doorstep during that stretch.

"We had our opportunities on offense and their goalie came up big, especially in the third and the fourth quarter," Cannella said. "He made three pointblank saves that took a little steam out of our sails."

Two of the saves came on shots by freshman Jim Connolly, who led UMass with two goals. Seniors Jake Deane, Clay Stabert and Sean Morris each registered a goal, but the one point by Morris was by far his lowest output of the season.

Morris came into the game averaging an NCAA-best 5.4 points per game, but he only attempted three shots and was rendered ineffective by Penn State's suffocating defense.

UMass	5
Penn State	7

"I think their defense was fresh," Cannella said. "We didn't play a whole lot of offense. It wasn't our day, but I give Penn State a lot of credit. They came out and did a very good job today."

Cannella was aware that the Nittany Lions would try to slow the game down, but he didn't feel the Minutemen responded well.

"We told our guys this is what the pace of the game is going to be so you have to get used to it and be a little bit more patient on offense," Cannella said. "Early in the game we weren't very patient on offense. The way the controlled the tempo of the game was very important today for their victory."

A bright spot for UMass once again was the play of freshman goalie Doc Schneider, as he kept the team in the game with 13 saves. Schneider essentially held Penn State to just six goals, as the last score came on an empty-netter with 58 seconds left with Schneider vacating the cage as UMass frantically tried to regain possession.

"I thought we played great defensively," Cannella said. "I'm proud of our guys, it was a good effort. Obviously Penn State is a really good team. Give them a lot of credit for the way they played."

UMass freshman attacker Jim Connolly had two goals in a 7-5 loss to Penn State on Saturday. Connolly has 11 points this season on nine goals and two assists.

College lacrosse in need of a shot clock

Jeff Howe

STATE COLLEGE, Pa. — Lacrosse is a great game. It truly is.

From the excitement you get from watching it as a fan, to the adrenaline rush you feel while flying after a ground ball as a player, to the tradition you see away from the field, to the emphasis on respecting the sport's culture in the rule book, there are just so many things that keep everyone involved coming back for more.

It's the reason why the number "22" is bigger than "23," why prestigious medical school Johns Hopkins is every bit as good as ACC state schools like North Carolina, Maryland and Virginia, and why I quit basketball. To put it simply, lacrosse is fun.

But what I witnessed on Saturday at Jeffrey Field was everything that is the exact opposite of what I just mentioned. Penn State beat UMass 7-5 in a close game with a nerve-wracking finish, but how we got to that final score was as painful as getting ice-picked in the throat.

Credit PSU coach Glenn Thiel for drawing up the perfect game plan to neutralize and take down the powerful UMass offense, but the only reason Thiel's Nittany Lions were able to hold the ball, swing it around the box far away from the cage and ultimately have multiple two- and three-minute possessions that served to be as productive as something out of the Bush administration was because the college game is missing a shot clock.

"Oh, here he goes," you're thinking. "He's opening up one of the most divisive arguments in the sport." With that said, I may have just lost half of you, and I myself was never a big proponent for a shot clock. In fact, when Major League Lacrosse implemented a shot clock during its inaugural season in 2001, I hated the idea.

But it's at least worth a look. The MLL did it right when it extended the shot clock from 45 seconds up to a minute before the start of last season, allowing for a little more time to set something up on the offensive end with the extra 15 seconds.

Like any situation similar to this one, there are both pros and cons. Traditionalists would hate the idea of tinkering with what is already a fine product, but I'm sure there was somewhat of an uproar when the

UM keeps streak alive

By Jeremy Rice

One amazing streak by the Massachusetts (17-11, 6-0 Atlantic 10) softball team ended this weekend, but another was extended as the Maroon and White pull ahead in the Atlantic 10 conference standings. The Minutewomen swept La Salle and Fordham in doubleheaders over the weekend, tallying four crucial conference victories.

UMass will host the only other undefeated team in the A-10, Charlotte (26-7, 4-0 A-10), Sunday at the UMass Softball complex starting at noon. The meeting will be a matchup of the top two teams in the A-10.

UMass traveled to Phila-dephia Friday riding a four-game winning streak, all by shutouts, and swept La Salle (8-17, 1-7 A10), 8-0 and 6-0. Brandice Balschmiter was in the circle for the first game, which was called after five innings, as UMass already had an eight-run lead. The story however, was the record-breaking performance of Balschmiter.

The freshman recorded 13 strikeouts against the Explorers, a UMass record for a five-inning game. She allowed just one hit and walked one batter in the game. The mark was one better than the nine-year-old record held by former Olympic gold medalist Danielle Henderson, who fanned 12 Virginia Tech batters in 1997.

Freshman Whitney Mollica led the offensive charge with a grand slam in the fourth inning. It was UMass's third grand slam in five games.

Senior Jenna Busa recorded her fourth career no-hitter in the second game, walking two batters on her way to the 6-0 victory. Senior catcher K.J. Kelley went 2-for-2 in the game with three RBI, while junior Amanda Acampora had one hit and a walk, batting in two runs. Freshman Samantha Salato also chipped in with an RBI on a walk.

Balschmiter's record may be ringing volumes throughout most of the softball world, but UMass coach Elaine Sortino says the team is not concerned with records.

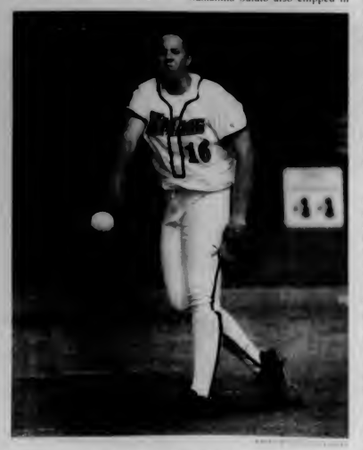
"They don't even know about [the strikeout record]. All they care about is that we're one run ahead at the end of the game," Sortino said.

The team left with a six-game winning streak, having outscored opponents 57-0 in those games. Four of the six games were called by the sixth inning due to the mercy rule.

After an off-day Saturday the Minutewomen traveled north to the Bronx to battle Fordham (17-15, 4-2 A-10) in a matchup of undefeated A-10 squads.

The Maroon and White started off strong, scoring four runs in the top of the first inning, knocking last year's A-10 Pitcher of the Year, Sara Kinney, out of the game. Junior Amanda Morin led off with a single, and was followed by back-to-back home runs by Mollica and Kelley.

The Rams exacted a small measure of revenge in the bottom of the first when they ended the Minutewomen's shutout streak, which finished at 33.5 innings.



It was the only run Fordham could muster, however, as the Minutewomen racked up four more runs, winning the game 8-1.

The second game started as most have for the Minutewomen, as they jumped out to a 5-1 lead after three innings behind stellar pitching by Busa. But in the fourth things started to unravel, as the Rams tied the game with four runs, three of them unearned.

"We were playing really tentative defense. We were making the plays, but we were a step behind, so were weren't making the outs," Sortino said.

Busa left the game without recording an out in the fourth, but the Minutewomen hung on to win 9-5 with Balschmiter pitching in relief.

"We needed to change it up," Sortino said. "[Fordham] was making a lot of contact and we didn't want to lose control of the game. [Busa] was just leaving her pitches up in the zone."

Freshman pitcher Brandice Blaschmiter broke the UMass record for strikeouts in a five-inning game with 13 against La Salle on Friday.

BC 'storms' through Garber

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Winds blew, debris flew, and everything that wasn't nailed down was turned over in a wild fury.

And that was before the storm kicked in.

With about three minutes to go in the first half in last Saturday afternoon's women's lacrosse contest between the Boston College Eagles (6-4) and Massachusetts Minutewomen (3-7), a microburst occurred at Garber Field, causing everyone on the playing surface, in the stands and in the press box to flee inside to the nearby Boyden building. The delay lasted roughly 20 minutes.

At the time of the storm, the Eagles were ahead 6-3. When play resumed, BC jumped out to a 10-3 lead, its largest of the day, and fought off a UMass comeback attempt to win, 16-10.

The Minutewomen have concluded the non-conference portion of the schedule, and will play the final contest of their four-game homestand on Friday against rival St. Bonaventure, to open Atlantic 10 play.

For the fourth game in a row, the scoring opened up with UMass' opponent of the day tallying the initial goal. But unlike their previous game against Vermont, when the Minutewomen bounced back and took complete control of the game to win it, the Eagles continued to cruise all the way through the first half.

UMass	10
Boston College	16

After BC midfielder Katherine Wagoner scored less than two minutes into the contest, the Minutewomen received an early setback when Erica Shapiro went down hard near the BC bench in a scramble for a loose ball. Shapiro, the team's top defender, is said to have torn an ACL on the play, and it is currently unknown how long she will be out.

The Minutewomen tied it up twice in the early going, with a goal by Kristina Twichell that made it 1-1 and a Kathleen Typadis goal that made it 2-2, but eventually the weakness on defense—they were also without Sam Sepulveda, one of the team's top midfielders, who dressed but was not fit to play—showed through. UMass did a fairly good job preventing any cuts

UMass gets first league victory

By Danny Picard

The Massachusetts baseball team dropped the rubber match of a three-game series against Richmond (9-16, 3-3 Atlantic 10) by a score of 10-5 yesterday in Virginia. The Minutemen (3-13, 1-5 A-10) came into the weekend series on a six-game losing streak, all while in the midst of a 17-game road trip to start the season.

UMass lost the series opener 15-10 on Friday afternoon, extending its winning drought to seven games, but was able to grab its first Atlantic 10 victory of the year by defeating Richmond 11-9 in extra innings on Saturday. It was the Spiders, however, who would have the last laugh, as they closed out the three-game stint with a 10-5 win on Sunday.

The Minutemen will be back in action when they take on Holy Cross at 3 p.m. on Tuesday afternoon in Worcester. The matchup against the Crusaders will mark the last game of the Maroon and White's marathon 17-game road trip.

UMass's offense had a great showing on Friday afternoon, but its 10 runs were not enough to hold off a Richmond team that was also hungry for an A-10 win. The Spiders' bats came alive in the bottom of the seventh inning, as they scored 10 runs on seven hits, two walks and two batters hit by pitches, leading to a 15-10 Richmond victory.

The Minutemen scored six runs in the top of the fifth to take a 7-1 lead after four and a half innings of play, thanks to a solo home run by freshman second baseman Adam Tempesta and RBI singles by senior Derrick Durepo, junior Travis Munsey and sophomore Ryan Franczek.

Richmond came right back in the bottom of the fifth with four runs of its own to cut UMass's lead down to just two runs at 7-5. UMass coach Mike Stone was forced to pull his starting pitcher, junior Chris Lloyd, after he walked in two runs with the bases loaded.

The Spiders' attack would not be complete until a 10-run bottom of the seventh inning, giving Richmond a commanding 15-8 lead in which it never looked back, defeating UMass 15-10.

The bats were certainly alive this weekend for the Minutemen, as they tallied their highest run total of the season in their 11-9 extra-innings victory over the Spiders on Saturday. UMass scored two runs in the top of the tenth

Slayer and Partridge Family to lead Spring Concert lineup

By Handsome McStudly
Collegian Staff

The lineup for Spring Concert this year may surprise you. Popular belief holds that the Roots and Dashboard Confessional are the big names set to play, but in fact, the Collegian recently received word that rumors from several months ago are true. Curtis "50 Cent" Jackson is actually the headliner at this year's concert.

When asked how he picked his unlikely co-headliners, Mr. Cent responded, "I wanted someone who would compliment my style, but would attract a different audience. And Kerry King is such a badass, I knew there was only one act I would want to play with me." That's right, UMass, 50 Cent and Slayer.

"It's really just an honor," Slayer guitarist Jeff Hanneman said. "When someone like 50 asks you to play, even at a college concert, you don't turn him down."

When asked about his relationship with 50 Cent, Hanneman responded, "It's definitely mutual respect. When someone's been shot that many times, you really have to hand it to them, that's impressive shit right there."

Impressive shit, indeed. But not as impressive as the opening act that the concert has managed to attract. I'd be lying if I said this writer wasn't going just to see them. Yes, you've probably guessed it by now — the Partridge Family is opening for 50 Cent.

If you're asking yourself, "What the shit?" right now, you're not alone, but it makes sense. Danny Bonaduce (that cute, little Danny Partridge) had this to say: "I know this seems like a strange decision, but we had to do it. The Family was going nowhere. We desperately need to change our image. So I said, 'Hey, why not nu metal?' I mean, I love Linkin Park, Shirley [Jones] loves Static X. It just worked."

These happy gentlemen, otherwise known as Slayer, are co-headlining Spring Concert. Feel the noise.

That suave guy up there in the corner is David Cassidy, and you can bet that the ladies will be all over him when the Partridge Family opens for good friend 50 Cent. Sadly, Simone (the dog) will not be appearing.

And the students at UMass aren't the only ones listening. David Cassidy (extreme hottie Keith Partridge) said, "Oh, 50 loved it. You wouldn't think it, but he'd been a fan for a long time, and he's pretty dedicated. I think he would have liked whatever sound we'd come up with, but I'm still happy that he liked it enough to invite us to play. We're hoping that he'll come up and do a duet with me, but, well, that's been a dream of mine for a long time."

The response within the student body is very positive. A UMass student who requested to remain anonymous said, "Damn. The Partridge Family? I probably would have gone even if it were just 50, but shit, I can't turn down the Partridge Family. Laurie, man. I'd do her."

That's right, the excitement is unbelievable here for Spring Concert 2006. If you don't have your ticket yet, ask yourself why the hell not, and then get down there and get one, or you may miss your one chance to get a peek up Keith Partridge's pants.

Album 'awesome,' intern says

By Haywood Jablome
Collegian Stud

It's not every day an opportunity as exciting as this arrives, but the Collegian has received a copy of Angus Brown's new all-xylophone album, "Angus Brown Rides Again." Like all CDs that we get down here, it's amazing, but this one is definitely set apart from the crowd.

"It's definitely something that no one has ever done before. To call it an 'all-xylophone album' is just unfair," said record company intern/bitch Andy Simmons. "He's a true artist. Xylophone, marimbas ... other xylophones, he does it all. And in style, too. It's kind of like Blue Man Group, but those guys are total hacks. He just gets out there and plays, and it's awesome. You've got the album, listen to it. Have you listened to it yet? All right."

Although I have yet to listen to it, I assume this statement is correct. I can safely say that beyond its excellent uses as Frisbee and beer coaster, this CD is also pretty decent for listening — I would imagine.

"Pretty decent? You're crazy," said Simmons. "Look, I've been here for three semesters, and this is the best album we have EVER put out. And I do mean ever. I know. Just give me your home phone number, and the numbers of all of your readers I just want to make sure they read this review and listen to the album. That's my job, man. I just want to make sure."

After some nagging, I actually gave this album a listen, and much to my surprise, every word of what Simmons said is absolutely true. Mr. Brown's album, which will be out "when it gets out, asshole," is completely genre-defining. I couldn't have foreseen it, but this record completely flipped my shit and made me reconsider all of the supposed "truths" of music.

Simmons offered some support. "Hey man, I knew you'd come around. You wanna talk about Angus? I know this guy's shit like the back of my hand. Did I mention I've worked here for three semesters? Three! I couldn't make that shit up if I tried. Look, though, seriously, I have my concerns about this review. Could you be a little more uncritical? Come on, man, we gave you this CD for free, it's the least you could do."

Following Andy's advice, I decided to give it one more spin. It's something that takes a little while to get in to, but when you really understand just what it is Angus Brown is going for, you really understand. It isn't just music. "Angus Brown Rides Again" completely takes over your life. I don't think it would be possible for me to function without listening to this album several times a day, including right when I get up and just before I go to bed. Actually, I really don't sleep much anymore. I try to get as many listens in as I can before I pass out from exhaustion, but that's just what awesome will do to someone.

"Hey, I knew you'd come around," offered Simmons. "But really, can you give me your home phone number? There's just a few things I need to talk to you about in regards to Angus. I've worked here for three semesters, I just know things."

Angus Brown's new album "Angus Brown Rides Again" is taking the country by storm. We each bought three.

It's official: Nickelback sucks

By Hugh Jass
Collegian Communist

It would be funny — interesting, even — to see just how many cocks were smoked during Nickelback's production of "All the Right Reasons."

Now, it's obvious that we're dipping far back in time here, but for the love of God, let's just swim back to the shores of early October 2005 to witness one of the worst albums of the century.

Adam West himself listed the eleven worst songs he had ever heard, on a radio broadcast last night, and he named the following:

1."Follow You Home" — Come on, fellas. I can make better noise with my fingernails on the official Batman chalkboard. I ain't gonna follow you nowhere, bitch.

2."Fight for All the Wrong Reasons" — Exactly. This title refers to the fact that no one in the entire fing world knows what the hell you're talking about. This album stinks so far.

3."Photograph" — Fing blows nuts.

4."Animals" — Nice job, guys. With the one solidly named track you have, you still manage to f it up. Sounds like a bunch of gimps.

5."Savin' Me" — Ehhh, no thanks. You can either not get saved or shut off this obnoxious rattling and showboating. Go bang each other some more, and see what you can splooge out.

6. "Far Away" — This is exactly where you want the album when the notes first hit the three bones in your ears, as they start vibrating. I feel dirty and betrayed when I listen to this bullshit.

7."Next Contestant" — Maybe this song is the reason why, in Portugal, an audience member picked up a rock and decided to send it spinning and whirling to the head of the lead singer, Cries McMonkeybottom. The experience left him throwing a tantrum then marching promptly offstage. Classy.

8. "Side of the Bullet" — Too bad it wasn't the rock-hard center, you pussies. Catch one in the face, and I'll be happy. Instead of a mic, wrap your lips around something else, preferably something with a trigger.

9 "If Everyone Cared" — Wow. Is this a more perfect title? What in blue blazes are they doing? The title of this track says more than I imagine. Let's just say, thank God no one does.

10. "Someone That You're With" — What? I don't understand how mindless, tone-deaf morons can relate in this aspect. How do they know the comfort of warm hearts in the fake, dumb world they live in?

11. "Rockstar" — Sweet! Maybe if I name the song something cool, signifying that a neat 'rockstar' made it, people will listen! Here's a thought! Go f yourself!

Well, there we have it. The complete list, in its glory. All we need is a public lynching, and we can all go on our merry ways. Yes? This is the best vacation I've ever had!

Administration brings the pain to the FAC

By Chris Lemmon
The Shoe in Paradise Newspapers

Students have many different names for the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center. The FAC. The huge piano (even if it looks nothing like a fing piano). Those are probably the only two, actually. But in a stunning turn yesterday, University officials announced that they would be giving the beloved UMass landmark to the Athletic Department.

In an interview with the Collegian, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano said, "This is part of a broader policy change for the University. Students may have noticed our previous moves to completely rid UMass of all arts programs. This is just the latest step in that effort." The vice chancellor candidly added, "Are any of you really surprised at anything we do after the new alcohol policy?"

The new plan for the FAC is to convert it to a state-of-the-art gymnasium. The stated uses are "storage, administrative offices and absolutely no practice space under any circumstances for those fing club teams."

Junior trombone player Marisa Tomei (no relation) is not surprised. "You had to have seen this one coming. This university isn't typically a place where the arts are encouraged. I'm surprised they didn't burn it to the ground."

In a later interview, this was posed to Gargano. "That thought actually didn't cross our minds at all. It's not a bad idea. I would consider changing the plan, but I really don't want to go through that. You really have to talk to six people just to blow your nose here," the vice chancellor said. The interview was cut short when he was forced to head to Whitmore after several glasses of water.

An anonymous UMass student saw this as a positive move for the University, though. "UMass has to continually ask itself, 'What kind of school do we want to be?' I think that if we look at ourselves, and we don't see an art school, why even try? Just get rid of the fer and be done with it, right? Hell, the arts programs mainly just attract the liberals who are bringing this University down, anyway."

Construction is set to begin as soon as possible. Current estimates place the project's completion at the end of the 2025 spring semester.

Can you write? Do you enjoy watching movies or listening to music? Do you have a pulse? No? Will you at least write for free? Write for Arts. Please? E-mail us right now. Or don't. See if I care.

I even got a tattoo that says 'King James 34' to prove it! Just because I go 5-for-50 and kill any momentum we ever have in a game doesn't mean I suck, OK? Here, I'll even prove it to you."

At this point, Life took to the south end of the court, where Freeman and Lasme were casually playing a game of horse, snatched the ball from Lasme's hands, gave Freeman a shove and uttered, "I let's go. Right now. You two versus me, Canadian doubles. Bring the pain."

Freeman and Lasme swatted away every single shot by Life, and gave up after five possessions, leaving Life by himself on the court. Life continued to shoot, however, and when he finally made a 3-pointer after 100-somevodd tries he threw his arms up emphatically.

"What I tell you? What did I tell all y'all haters?" Life screamed. "I was first team All-State, I'll make it rain out here! I can put the ball wherever I want!"

Don't be fooled, now. James Life isn't REALLY about to pass the ball to any of his teammates. We all know he's about to jack up another 3. THREEEEEEEEE POINT BALLLLLLLLLLLL!!! JAMES LIFE FOR THREE!!!!!!!

If the Minutemen won — which they didn't because the offensive line allowed defensive penetration deeper than that of Kobe Bryant on a certain blond hotel clerk from Colorado — McCutcheon had signed a recovered document stating he would switch job titles with Sign Man, with whom he shares a scary resemblance to, anyway.

Now, each member of the offensive line that appeared in the Hofstra game is riding around campus in brand-new Escalades with 36-inch gold-plated Sprewells that are as shiny as the O-line's uniforms after the game came to a conclusion.

UMass chancellor John Lombardi, doing his best impersonation of Will Ferrell's Harry Carey impression — oh, wait, he really talks like that? in real life? are you shitting me? — said that McCutcheon will keep his position as AD while the legal issues carry themselves out.

"We mulled it over," Lombardi or Ferrell or Carey or whoever the hell was talking said, "and we realized he can't possibly suck at his job while working from a prison cell any more than he already does. What's your favorite planet? Mine's the sun!"

McCutcheon concluded, "He's right. Now if you'll excuse me, I'm goin' to get myself some ass!"

"I have never ever used steroids. I don't know how to say it any clearer than that. Never."
–UMass baseball coach Mike Stone in his testimony to U.S. Congress

It all began in the summer of 1998, when other coaches around the Atlantic 10 took the spotlight away from Mike Stone.

Stone was a great all-around coach, and was surely headed to the Atlantic 10 Baseball Hall of Fame. But in the summer of 1998, the UMass head man took a turn down a destructive path from which he could never recover.

Stone knew all along that other coaches in the league were dirty. He saw them shooting up, sticking the needle in their buttocks, bulking up with every breath. Stone was better than that. He was a purist, a believer in the sanctity of the game. He would fight for its preservation at all costs.

But somewhere along the line, the jealousy became overwhelming. Two coaches in particular started to garner all of the praise from the national media, despite the cheap and one-dimensional nature of their coaching. Stone was the well-rounded, multi-dimensional coach. Why should he take a backseat to these entertainers, these posers?

Stone began using steroids after that. He was hurt by the lack of respect and vowed that it would never happen again. He was seen with Louis Anderson — his personal trainer and avid steroid user — more frequently. Anderson showed him how to inject himself, and introduced to several new drugs that were undetectable to the league's drug tests.

Soon enough, Stone's assistant coaches were urging him to stop. They saw needles scattered throughout his office. He needed to change his uniform several times because the buttons kept popping off, strained by his new muscular pectorals stretching his shirt.

On a recent trip to the McDonalds on Route 9 in South Hadley, Stone was given the wrong amount of change by the cashier. He was almost out of the restaurant when he realized the cashier's mistake. He then turned and lunged into a full sprint, diving over the counter and tackling the man who served him.

"Do you know how much you gave me back?!!!!!" Stone yelled. "I have never seen such incompetence in my entire life! If you had actually paid attention in math class, you might not be working at McDonalds!"

His assistants dragged him out of the restaurant and threw him into the car, one of the coaches injected Stone with a powerful sedative, and he slept for the rest of the night.

The coaches confronted him when the drugs began to affect his mood. They asked him about the steroids, but Stone snapped and began throwing chairs, knocking one of the coaches unconscious. They never asked about it again.

Stone's players began to notice his mood swings, as well as his increased strength. During batting practice, when one of his hitters couldn't take the ball the other way, Stone stepped in. He ripped five opposite-field home runs, yelling and grunting when he made contact.

"That's how you do it!!!!!!!," he would yell.

When the team lifted weights during the offseason, Stone would lift with them. He did so on most occasions, but in recent years his players noticed his strength change. Stone began to bench more than his players. He would wear a tank top and his biceps were noticeably larger. He could do repetitions at over 300 pounds, and he maxed out at over 350. He pounded his chest and punched the walls upon concluding his workout. His players thought he would grow violent, and that's when they came forward about their coach's knew predicament.

"I don't know what he was thinking," shortstop Buddha Theball said. "He just went crazy. He was paranoid too. He would call us in the middle of the night on our cell phones, screaming incoherently, yelling at us about errors that we made, like, a month ago. It wasn't right."

When asked for comment about the recent allegations, Stone replied succinctly amidst sniffles and tears: "I'm not here to talk about the past."

The accusations have snowballed into an all-out media frenzy. The damning book "Stone of Shadows" was published last month, documenting, in great detail, Stone's insane jealousy and his continued dependence on steroids to attain superstardom.

Some of the excepts from "Stone of Shadows" were published recently in a weekly magazine, indicating that Stone's contempt was so great for the other successful coaches that he even used personal attacks on himself against them.

"The public just likes those guys because they're white," Stone would say.

When a reporter informed him that he, in fact, was white, Stone punched the reporter and said, "That's me taking the bull by the horns. It's a metaphor. But that really happened."

Dick Nixon coaches the Minutewomen?

Not exactly, but it Dacke furthered her Nixon impression to the point of resignation, the UMass women's basketball team might actually start winning...

Vinatieri trades his balls for losses

By Mike Irvin
Missing Words Writer

In an interview with one of the Gumbel brothers, former New England Patriots kicker Adam Vinatieri explained why he left one of the best gigs a kicker has ever had in the NFL to play with the biggest bunch of underachievers since the 1993-2005 Washington Redskins.

As most New England residents with a pulse now know, Mr. Dome Kicker opted to leave his cushy job in the Northeast — where basically no one would question or doubt him again — to go to the Midwest for slightly more money than Bill Belichick and company were willing to pay the guy who is on the field about four times a game.

"I've got three Super Bowl rings, and I've been the highest paid kicker in league history," the "football player" said. "But now my goal is to become the even highest-paid kicker in history."

The ex-Patriot has really only been above-average — not great — in the regular season through his career with about an 80 percent field goal percentage, but is an unprecedented 100 percent in Super Bowl-winning kicks. That mark in the big game smashes the previous record of 0 percent, recorded by Scott Norwood of the Buffalo Bills.

The former hero is also claimed to have never missed a game-winning kick in the fourth quarter of overtime (except for that one in Kansas City in 1999 that no one talks about — look it up).

But now the man who was in constant competition as Boston's most famed athlete will now be competing with Peyton Manning to become Indianapolis' biggest douche.

"Playing for one of the best teams of all time was cool and all, but I'm a kicker. I don't feel comfortable being 'praised' or 'liked'. My wife is pretty pissed because we just bought a house near Boston, but I feel this is the best move for me," the Johnny Damon wannabe said.

Vinatieri will be replacing another jackass who kicks footballs for a living, former Colt Mike Vanderjagt, who did exactly the opposite that the former has done. Vanderjagt was great inside the cozy RCA dome in Indy — that is, until someone said the word "playoff," "meaningful" or even "boo," at which point the ex-Colt may or may not be a better bet to make a field goal than Doug Flutie drop-kicking.

"If Mike Vanderjagt can miss a kick that significant, inside no doubt, than I'm sure I, the greatest football-kicker-guy in history, can do it too," Vinatieri said. "It might be fun to lose for a change."

The latest remarks from the former endorser of Papa Gino's pizza and Ford trucks shed light on just what the hell he was thinking leaving New England for Indianapolis of all places. The Patriots have done everything short of make Peyton Manning cry like a pre-pubescent girl. However, last season, the Colts defeated our beloved Patriots — injury-ridden as they were — and some wonder if it had an influence on the kicker's decision.

"Last year the Colts beat us, I mean, we beat the Patriots. I feel I can help the Colts return to their losing ways next year, when we travel back to Foxboro," the confused little man said. "In 2004, Vanderjagt missed a 47-yarder that would've tied the Patriots. I know, because I'm so clutch, that I can miss one in the 30-yard range."

As far as those endorsements go, Vinatieri has already been contacted by John Deere tractors and several manure companies. Vinatrieri will continue to wear No. 4 for the Colts, as he did in New England — though it is said that Belichick is already trying to get someone else to wear the number, just like he did after cutting Lawyer Milloy and Ty Law.

Adam Vinatieri does like to get rubbed by multiple football players at once. He knows he can get more of that with Peyton Manning in Indy.

Club teams get axed

By The Duke Lacrosse Team
Party All Day Long

In an announcement yesterday, several UMass club teams were deemed "too annoying" to exist on the campus, and will no longer be given funding by the University. The statement, which was issued by University officials, claims that most members of the certain club teams are "high school superstars that couldn't make it in college," and are "out of the vicinity of reality."

Included in the statement released by the University was a list of the club teams that will be wiped off the face of the planet. As of today, the following club sports will no longer be active: baseball, wrestling, ice hockey and lacrosse. To say the least, the news pissed off juiced-out meatheads, and now they're speaking out.

"This is nuts, man, absolutely nuts," former club wrestler and dedicated meathead Hulk Jonovich said. "Dude, I just came from the gym, and we're all pissed about this, and I was like, 'So lets do some squats!' and my buddy Greg was like, 'Yeah, check out my biceps!' and so then we left a little better and I bought my buddies a round of protein shakes."

Jonovich, who clearly has no neck, went on to include that he was apparently recruited out of high school by Iowa and Ohio State for varsity wrestling, but he was determined to someday become what he calls a "club team all-star."

Other "club team all-stars" were up in arms upon hearing the news and did not understand why a university would ever want to get rid of such talented semi-varsity sports. One former club baseball player was confused because of all the positive press and in-depth coverage his team was receiving from The Massachusetts Daily Collegian sports section.

Athletic Director John McCutcheon declined to give a detailed comment on the situation, but reluctantly sported out several comments.

"What the hell do I care about club teams?" McCutcheon said. "Those guys play club for a reason — they suck! But you wanna know who doesn't suck? Me!"

As a result of the four teams being cut, participants are scrambling to find an alternative, but others have decided to put their athletic careers in the past.

Former club ice hockey "star" Curt Smith gathered last night with the rest of his "team" outside of the Mullins Center to mourn the "loss" of their "sport." At one point during the meeting, the entire team began to weep.

"We deserve better than this," Smith said. "I mean, not only are we kind, sorta athletes, but we are people too — sort of."

When asked what he thought about the real varsity hockey team, Smith became angry and clearly frustrated, as any club athlete would.

"They aren't that good," Smith said. "We could beat them any time, and any where — in high school I was named a second-team honorable mention all-star by my local newspaper."

The club teams will be holding a rally today at noon which nobody will attend, nobody will write about, and quite frankly, nobody will care about — just like their games.

Bonds caught cheating in more ways than one

By Sir Peeps-A-Lot
Missing Words Writer

With no confidence at all in Commissioner Bud Selig's flaky investigation, this reporter decided to go behind the scenes and find out the truth behind the steroid use of superstar Barry Bonds.

This creep was able to hide out in Ray Durham's locker, which faces Bonds', and I found something very interesting.

I, the Morning Wood Victim, can truthfully say that I caught Mr. Barry Bonds injecting substances into his body red-handed.

After recording the whole debacle, I jumped out of Durham's locker (finally, after 90 minutes — I don't know what Oxy-MED is used for, but it can't be good) and I accidentally stepped on the tube and some squirted and it stunk) and approached him.

Bonds argued and said that it wasn't steroids. I then asked him what it was. He froze, and when I threatened him that I was going to the commissioner about this, he put on a wig.

"Why are you calling me Barry ?" Bonds asked in a female voice. "My name is Paula Abdul. I'm sure you've heard of me, I sleep with Simon from 'American Idol.'"

"Are you kidding me?" I responded. "Barry, you're through, no home run record for you."

Paula — I mean Barry (wow, he really does a good make-up job) flipped out and punched me over and over again, screaming and yelling (and crying, actually). He didn't stop until I was unconscious.

When I came back to consciousness, I noticed on the floor in front of Bonds' locker that he had left behind supplements, so I grabbed them and took them over to the nearest lab I could find.

At the lab, Dr. Vag informed me of exactly what I thought the substance was: steroids. I then paid the doctor in dog biscuits and jumped on a plane to Los Angeles, where I knew the commissioner was staying at his mansion outside of the city because there were negotiations being held this past week in L.A. When I arrived at Selig's mansion, a servant answered the door and informed me that Bud was upstairs in the library. The creep walked upstairs and opened the door to the library and was appalled at what I saw.

There was Bud and Barry (still dressed as Paula Abdul) kissing near the desk. I guess opposites really do attract.

I took out my camera and took a picture, the flash finally got their attention.

"It's not what it looks like, Sir Peeps-A-Lot," Selig said to me. I then claimed, "This is why you've never investigated the steroid issue. You're in love with Barry, aren't you?"

"Steroids make baseball better," Selig responded. "Home runs put asses in the seats. And it was home runs that brought fans together back to the game in 1998 when Mark [McGuire] and Sammy [Sosa] were racing for the record."

Selig then kicked me out of his house and made threats that included going down the slide at Miller Park, but instead of beer waiting for me at the bottom, sharks with laser beams attached their heads would be in the giant mug.

America's pastime is once again clean. The Creep has single-handedly brought down the steroid scandal, Watergate scandal? This is now the best piece of investigative reporting in the history of American journalism.

UMass AD caught gambling

By SUE MCCUTCHEON
YEAH, THE FBALE'S WIFE

LAS VEGAS — UMass athletic director John "DSL" McCutcheon, as he is often referred to by former friend and forever needle dick Doug Flutie, has been taken into custody by the Las Vegas police after it was discovered he has been heading the operations of a large-scale sports gambling ring.

McCutcheon, who has been leading the athletic department to absolutely nowhere since he was hired in 2004, was allowed to hold a brief press conference outside the precinct where he was being detained before being locked up and wed locked by a few of his new found "close" friends.

"First of all," McCutcheon began, "there is no way any of these allegations are true. Think about it. I'm the biggest fing moron any of you have ever met. Honestly, what have I ever done to impress you?

"If I wasn't so afraid of getting my ass kicked, I suppose I could have made some smart moves within the department during my tenure, maybe by firing baseball coach Mike Stone and women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko for absolutely, 100 percent, completely sucking at their jobs, but I can't do it. Look at them, then look at me. I'm a pussy. Stone is crazy. I mean, the man could be the most tapped human being on campus, and that includes Travis Ford and all the 'roided out meat heads who work out at Boyden.

"And Marnie, I, uhhh, shit — damn, woman." McCutcheon did raise a good point. He is a frail, frail, little man, who looks more like the "Simpsons" character Mr. Burns than anyone who should be running an athletic department.

But that's beside the point. These allegations stretch as far back as July of 1980, when he began his 12-year stint in the Boston College athletic department. McCutcheon continued to deny such rumors of BC teams shaving points until one reporter from the Berkshire Eagle found his greatest weakness: tickling. It was then that the UMass AD (Anal-retentive Dickbag) started singing like a choirgirl.

"I would give Dana Barros money for every shot he took and missed," the four-eyed princess — er, John McCutcheon — said. "Then it carried over to football. I had to feed my habit. Flutie to Phelan in 1984? Bribery. Look at the tape. Flutie ran around the backfield like a little fairy. Did anyone even come close to him? Nope. Why? Because I paid everyone at Miami off. Then look at Gerard catch the ball through all of that traffic. Try telling me the Miami cornerbacks gave an honest effort to knock the ball away.

"It's all about money, gentle people. I can steal Don Brown from Northeastern, overpay the shit out of a basketball coach with one winning season in his Division I career, and I can even bribe my little friends down the street to — oh, I've said too much. Hey, what happens in Vegas stays in Vegas, baby! Ride 'em, cowboy!"

The police report details that McCutcheon's issues with gambling and fixing games have grown exponentially in recent years, correlating with his arrival in Amherst. The UVPD is looking primarily back at a two-week period in November of 2005.

On Nov. 14, certain members of the UMass football team's offensive line were known to have beat-up cars with 12-inch hubcaps. Also, before Nov. 14, UMass's offensive line was good.

Then, on Nov. 19, the line shit the bed in the season-finale against Hofstra with a postseason bid riding on the outcome of the game. Also riding on the game's final score was McCutcheon's entire

UMass Sports In Brief

Getting Phone Calls from Goalies' Moms Since 2005

After serving as UMass sports information director for the past two years, Jason Yellin has opted to forfeit his responsibilities as media relations director and contact for football, men's basketball and men's lacrosse to instead focus on what he calls "the most awesomest job in the world."

Yellin's official title will be now "Travis Ford's Personal Bitch" and his duties will include, but will not be limited to: Making sure everyone knows how great Travis is, Making sure Travis is happy, making sure Travis has three square meals a day, making sure no one talks to Travis unsupervised, making sure no one approaches Travis without his consent, making sure no one calls Travis when Travis doesn't want calls, making sure Travis doesn't have a bad day, making sure everyone knows how great Travis is, making sure no one writes anything bad about Travis, making sure Travis' dog is fed and his lawn is mowed, reminding people that Travis has four transfers coming in next year, reminding people that Travis wasn't working with guys he recruited last year, reminding people that Travis was stuck with much of last year's schedule and most importantly, making sure the "Following Ford: Tracking Travis in the Media" portion of the UMass athletics website is updated every hour, on the hour, despite the fact that nothing notable has been written about Travis in over a year.

Yellin has demanded he be permitted to finish the 2006 men's lacrosse season so that no one can possibly take away his beloved title as official UMass Sports Netork lacrosse color commentator, which he was quick to point out is "written in the media guide, you know?"

When asked to comment on why he couldn't just focus on his job and let someone else do color commentary, Yellin responded with the following:

"THREEEEEEEE POINT BALL! THREE POINTS FOR JAAAAMES LIIIFE!"

In a disturbing revelation, the Morning Wood has learned that former UMass athletic director Ian McCaw made an destructive decision in September of 2002, prior to his departure for Hell, err, Baylor.

Due to a lack of university funding for the program in September 2002, McCaw decided against using the limited resources available to run UMass' men's lacrosse program and instead chose to simulate every lacrosse season in Amherst from 2003-2010.

This means that the Minutemen will continue to be locked into the following pattern for the next five years: Start season in top ten, lose early game to Albany, lose early game to crappy league foe, win bunch of games, beat Syracuse, alternate wins and losses with Georgetown and Rutgers on year-to-year basis, qualify for NCAA Tournament, win first round home game, get blown out in second round by southern school, repeat.

As part of the simulation process, which Sony Playstation was said to have outbid Xbox for the rights to, UMass will only be able to user-play a season if they raise the difficulty level to All-American, thus explaining the curious 2004 season.

The Princeton Review has released its list of the Top Partying Administrators in the Nation, and the UMass community was pleased to learn that associate athletic director Tim Kenney made the top of the list.

Kenney was cited for his excellence in partying "all the damn time," including at every UMass football game home and away, at every UMass coach's show, at many UMass basketball and hockey games, at every stop on the Travis Ford World Tour and at every UMass function where there are hands to be shaken, ass-kissing to be done and beer goggles to be worn.

Don Cahoon also learned recently that his request for a new ice surface at the Mullins Center has been denied by the university's budgeting committee, and will be revisited when needed in the future.

The athletic department released the following statement explaining the decision.

"After meeting with coach Cahoon in regards to the ice surface at the Mullins Center, the university has denied his request to fund a new sheet for next season, and instead requests that coach Cahoon quit pissing and moaning about the ice his team plays on and focus more on putting a halfway-decent team on said ice. Until coach Cahoon can fully adhere to this request, the ice will reflect the team that has played on it over the past two years – slow, soft and in need of an overhaul.

Minuteman football coach Don Brown has petitioned the NCAA to allow UMass cut its 2006 schedule down from 11 games to 10, citing his team's success in playing just 10 games last year rather than the full 11 on the schedule.

Asked what he would do if given the final week of the season off, Brown said: "We'll do the same thing we did when we took the final week off last year, we'll go to Long Island and play Hofstra."

Athletic director John McCutcheon announced earlier this year that UMass will no longer feature the University of Connecticut on its men's basketball schedule, after McCutcheon demanded the Huskies agree to a home-and-home deal rather than agreeing to play a single game on the road in Hartford or Storrs, Conn.

Clearly in a position to be demanding a home game from a perennial championship contender, UMass will move on from its series with UConn and focus on developing a long-term playing relationship with the worst team in college basketball, Savannah Goddamn State. The Minutemen will play at the Tigers this November, with the game being televised by absolutely no one.

UMass women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko has admitted to changing her approach to recruiting after three straight painfully-awful seasons. She will spend the spring and summer completely focused on bringing in a new crop of girls to surround talented forwards Pam Rosario and Kate Mills.

Dacko will now be on the lookout for girls who are actually interested in coming to Amherst to play basketball, rather than those who spend far too much time hanging out with each other and devote their lives to making sure their hats are tilted at the right angle for the Pub on Thursday nights.

With the George Mason Patriots having become the darlings of the college basketball world, head coach Jim Larranaga recently was asked if he had been interviewed for any jobs since coming to George Mason. Larranaga stated that, in fact, he had been interviewed for the UMass job in 2001, and that the interview was going splendidly until former athletic director "NASCAR Bob" Marcum received a phone call from Steve Lappas. Larranaga said the interview quickly turned south, and Lappas was soon hired.

That's really awesome, Bob. Thanks for that.

Even Lappas didn't suck this much

By STEVE LAPPAS
AT LEAST I BEAT UCONN

It was announced yesterday that Travis Ford has been fired as the UMass men's basketball coach. The decision to fire for Ford was somewhat of a surprise, as he was hired just over a year ago, but after the team completely sucked again this year, athletic director John McCutcheon felt that he needed to act quickly to hire another overmatched coach who will continue the program's spiral down the toilet bowl.

"After seeing our team suck yet again, I feel that I may have fed up by hiring a coach with all of one winning season in Division I," McCutcheon said. "Obviously it was the right thing to do, firing Steve Lappas, because that beaver-faced loser couldn't coach, but when we made the change I never thought it would be possible for us to get worse. But somehow we managed to top our suckiness of the Lappas era this year."

Everyone seemed excited with the Ford hiring, and after a few months of kissing ass and bullshitting all around the state, most fans actually believed that he could get the program back on track.

Clearly the fans were fooled.

Ford masterfully led this year's squad to a 13-15 record and a first round exit from the stacked Atlantic 10 Tournament, which featured a starling assembly of mediocre basketball teams.

"Hey, what did you expect from me?" Ford asked after learning that he was getting canned. "It's not like I've done anything to even warrant this job. I mean, I was at fing Eastern Kentucky before I came here. I had one good damn winning season, but I'm a good bullshitter and I managed to land this job. But if you really thought I was going to deliver on all my promises you were a fing idiot."

Ford's lone season wasn't all bad, as he did manage to lead the A-10 in "most profanities being screamed at his team that were easily heard in a damn near empty arena."

Then again, you can't really blame Ford for getting on his players, because they did indeed suck.

"You try coaching this gang of shitheads," Ford said. "Granted, I chased away half of the returning players from last year and that killed us, but in the long run I think the fans will thank me for not submitting them to two more years of watching Artie Bowers."

When asked why he made the move so early in Ford's tenure, McCutcheon revealed some deeper reasons for the firing.

"I knew that he played at Kentucky, and I figured that he must have learned something there," McCutcheon said. "I looked at his stats and this little shit was actually not bad when he played there. So I thought that right there was enough to hire him.

"But then a few months ago I was watching ESPN Classic and the Duke-Kentucky game when Laettner makes the buzzer-beater was on. And that's when I saw Ford play for the first time. It was really a disturbing sight. Here's this little runt flying around the court like a fairy in shorts so tight that they'd make John Stockton cringe. I just couldn't get that image out of my head. I basically decided right then that I was going to fire him. And the team completely sucking just made my decision easier."

The search to find Ford's replacement is already in full swing, according to McCutcheon. He said the team again plans to bring an assortment of big-name, low-result coaches and hire the one that seems the least likely to bring this team anywhere near the NCAA Tournament.

"I can't get into the full list of contenders for the job, but I will say that Doc Rivers is one of the lead candidates," McCutcheon said. "After seeing the way Doc has been an unadulterated failure with the Celtics, we figure he'd be a good fit here. If you make looking incompetent that easy at the NBA level, just imagine what he could do at UMass."

Ford said the entire experience has soured him on coaching and he plans on pursuing a different career path.

"I'm going out to Hollywood to give acting another shot," Ford said. "There have been some talks of a 'Sixth Man 2' so I'm going to keep my fingers crossed."

Travis Ford just didn't realize that, no matter how hard he coached, he just wasn't that good at it.

Life vows to suck at basketball and at rapping

By MIKE JONES WHO?

Every couple of years, there comes along a hip-hop duo that blows away the music scene and wins over a rabid fan base.

First there was Reverend Run and DMC. Then there was Eric B. and Rakim, Guru and DJ Premier, Notorious B.I.G. and P. Diddy, Nate Dogg and Warren G., Lord Tariq and Peter Gunz, Method Man and Redman — the list goes on.

Now, it appears this generation has met its match. Yesterday afternoon in a press conference held at center court at the William D. Mullins Center, University of Massachusetts basketball players Rashaun Freeman and James Life announced plans to cut a rap album together, set for release sometime before the end of the year.

Several titles for the album are being contemplated. Among them are "Da Chronically Inconsistent Since 2001," "The Matt Pennie LP" and "Who is James Life? And Why Doesn't He Play D?"

The duo have been signed to Run n' Gun Records, an independent label started by NBA superstars Shaquille O'Neal, Allen Iverson and Kobe Bryant — who, coincidentally, are the shittiest rappers of all time and should be ashamed of themselves for thinking they actually had any musical talent.

Making a guest appearance on several tracks will be Stephane Lasime, who no doubt earned some serious street cred after getting in a fight at an Amherst bar recently.

Freeman, who will be singing on most of the tracks, did not have much to say at the conference, nor did Lasime. Life, meanwhile, did not shut the hell up.

"Lemme break it down, my man," Life said when asked by a reporter why he decided to pursue this project. "We got major beef with these other phonies in college hoops. Shit is serious about to get kicked the f up a notch, 'na say? 'Na mean? We all got a motherfuckin' agenda when it comes to hatin' on other players around the league. Ray-ray here and me just be deciding to vent out our frustrations in the music."

Upon making that statement, Freeman chimed in "It's about the music, man. The music."

When asked whom the three have beef against, Life made a huge grin.

"Shit, I'll be up here all night with that kind of question," Life responded. "First, lemme tell you something about them haters over at George Washington. They put together the pussiest non-conference schedule I've ever seen. I mean come on now, they playin' teams like South Central East Southeast Louisiana State, University of Phoenix Online and ITT Tech — and barely beat them! And when they play a decent team, they get slapped around like David Gest! Then they have the balls to whine about their seeding?!? Playa, this ain't no BCS! What you get is what you deserve! Hootie Hoo!

"Then there's UConn. First, they be jackin' everybody's laptops like they ain't got none. I'm guessing they resorted to such desperate measures because one of the boosters forgot to make a 'donation'. Second of all, they lose to George Mason with the Final Four on the line. I mean, George Mason! Who was George Mason anyway? Sounds like some fat rich white dude asking to be burned by my 3-point skills. Fort Myers for life homey, no pun intended, cheat Dipset!"

At this point, the conference turned into an opportunity to ask Life some bold questions that nobody bothered to ask him during the 2005-06 season and point out his own selfish flaws.

When asked why he never felt the need to play defense, Life shrugged.

"I don't know what the hell you're talking about," he said. "I played defense all the time. Sure, I was incapable of covering my man, let people blow right by me without putting up a fight, showed no awareness of ball movement, couldn't guard the perimeter for shit and couldn't rebound if I tried, but nobody's perfect."

When asked why he contrarily felt the need make a 3-point attempt every time he touched the ball, even if he got a terrible look and everyone else was open for an easier basket, Life snapped.

UMass receives grant to research energy sources

By MELISSA D'AMICO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

University of Massachusetts researchers will examine the costs and benefits of alternative energy technologies with the help of a $347,000 grant received from the U.S Department of Energy.

Energy sources, including wind, sun and switch grass could aid in reducing U.S. greenhouse gas emissions. However, a debate continues among researchers concerning the cost and success of each technology.

The research team, led by Erin Baker of UMass Amherst and Jeff Keisler of UMass Boston, will focus their research on the effects of various alternative energies policies on both emissions and the economy.

Technical change is one of the most important issues connected to the ability to solve climate change.

"The solution to climate change is not likely to involve people reducing consumption, but rather the invention and diffusion of technologies which will allow for economic growth in developing countries without adding to the stock of greenhouse gas emissions," Baker said.

For each energy technology, the researchers will evaluate its impact on emissions, its cost, and the probability of its success.

"Our hypothesis is that improvements related to fossil fuels, more efficient combustion and carbon capture will have larger impacts if society wants to reduce emissions, say 5 to 10 percent, but a small impact if we want to move to a nearly carbon-free world," said Baker. "On the other hand, we suspect that improvements in some of the Campus group teaches about 'body politics'

By AMBER VAILLANCOURT
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Women of Color Leadership Network recently sponsored two presentations of the 2006 production: "Body Politics."

The skits that made up the performance dealt with several issues revolving around the physical bodies of African-American, Latina, Asian, and Native-American (ALANA) women.

This is 3rd annual presentation of "Body Politics," and was directed by Celia Hilson and Kefi Stewart. "We're very proud of the performance both days, it has been like a birth process, it was very labored," said co-director Celia Hilson.

Hilson described the production as being very organic, having no script, and being a very process-oriented production. The production at times was intense and serious, and at other times was casual and intimate.

Situations that were confronted included: Inter-racial relationships, struggles of previous generations, freedom, rape, relations with men and boys, bathroom behavior, sex and the female body.

"It's important because there are women of color who don't know there are other women of color sharing the experience; we can bring women together," said Rhyshona Singletary, a UMass graduate. "We have a common struggle, a common interest."

The performances included dancing, monologues, an ongoing slide show featuring black and white photographs behind the actresses, group pieces, and music. The cast was made up of 10 women, ranging from freshmen to seniors. Each wore outfits in black, with a different colored scarf.

"It shows a lot of diversity on campus, I was surprised there were so many people here," said cast member and senior Unati Mungalisa. At several points during the performance, the audience could be heard roaring with laughter, where at others, there was an intensity meant to connect the audience to the actresses.

"It's an opportunity to educate the people out there who are not too sure what it is we have to say," Kyngelle Mertilien, a year graduate student. "This is my second time coming, I went last year. I look forward to it. It was pretty packed though; it has always been a big event. I really enjoyed it."

Every story presented during the performances was completely original and often based on the experiences of the 10 cast members from this year's performance.

"We have stories that need to be told, that haven't been told. Sometimes on campuses where it's sterile and isolated, diverse experiences should and need to come out," said Hilson.

"For me, I felt invisible in classes and on campus. At WOCLN, I felt was seen and heard, that I wasn't invisible."

At the close of the performance, the audience thanked the cast with a standing ovation. Jacqueline Pinn, the producer and program director of the Body Politics performance and of WOCLN urged the audience to become involved in WOCLN, which is located in Wilder Hall.

A reception celebrating WOCLN's 13th year in existence is free and open to the public. It will be held on Thursday, April 27, from 6 to 9 p.m. in the Massachusetts Room of the Mullins Center

French citizens prepare for continued protests

By CHRISTINA BARON

PARIS — Students and labor groups throughout France are calling for a nationwide strike today in continued protest against the First Employment Contract (CPE), which allows patrons to fire new employees without explanation in their first year of employment.

Officials expect a turnout of more than 100,000 strikers to gather in Place de la Republique at 2 p.m. and march towards the Place d'Italie, disrupting traffic and public transportation throughout the day.

The SNCF, the French train system, is expecting a strike in five of its eight syndicates, according to the French newspaper Le Monde. The RATP, the public transportation agency of Paris, is expecting that two-thirds of subway trains will be functioning.

Parisian students are entering a sixth week of strikes and protests and demonstrations are getting more violent. Many Parisian universities including the prestigious Sorbonne have not held classes since the end of February due to physical blockades at the universities and student strikers.

Some professors are optimistic that the strikes will end soon. Others fear that the semester will have to be cancelled and worry about future interaction between students for and against the CPE in their classes.

Today at the Jussieu campus of the University of Paris VII, students rallied in front of the blockade campus to discuss the recent developments in the passage of the new CPE.

"Chirac is in la merde," said one speaker, basically saying French President Chirac is deep trouble. On Sunday, Chirac signed a revised version CPE into law.

Chirac addressed the CPE crisis on Friday night. In his national address he validated the CPE, supporting aspects of it. However he also said that the law must be further discussed before it is formally implemented into policy.

The CPE was first proposed by Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin in mid-January as a way to stimulate hiring in order to ease the high unemployment rates in French that are becoming more of a concern.

In Le Journal du Dimanche, a weekly French newspaper, de Villepin said that he "profoundly regrets" not explaining the law to the public before pushing it through Parliament.

There have also been counterdemonstrations throughout Paris over the weekend calling an end to the student strikes and a return to normal daily life.

UMass murder suspect's trial begins today

NORTHAMPTON — It was just after midnight when Bryan Johnston burst into David Sullivan's bedroom, aimed the laser site mounted on a .223-caliber rifle and blasted six shots into his friend's head and body while he worked on his computer.

Lawyers for Johnston, who was a criminal justice major at Westfield State College when Sullivan was killed Dec. 7, 2004, aren't disputing Johnston killed the 22-year-old University of Massachusetts student in his Amherst apartment.

But with testimony in Johnston's trial expected to begin Tuesday, his lawyers will try to convince a jury that he was insane and shouldn't be held responsible for the killing. If he's convicted of murder, Johnston, 24, automatically will be sentenced to life in prison.

Prosecutors have conceded Johnston has a history of mental illness and drug use, including steroids, but have not offered a motive for the killing.

Johnston's lawyers would not say whether steroid use or withdrawal, which can cause violent symptoms commonly called "roid rage," will play a role in their defense. Prosecutor Renee Steese, who is trying the case, would not comment for this article.

Crane, scaffolding collapse kills 3 in Boston

By GLEN JOHNSON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — A 20,000-pound construction platform collapsed and then crashed down seven stories onto a busy downtown street Monday, killing three people and crushing cars stalled in midday traffic.

The collapse occurred about 1:20 p.m. on Boylston Street, which runs along the south side of Boston Common.

Witnesses said there was a terrifying rumble then crash of the platform lift system, which was atop a second building next to a 14-story building owned by Emerson College. The platform and scaffolding were being dismantled when the collapse happened, said acting Fire Commissioner Kevin MacCurtain.

Two people on the street and one in a car were killed, Boston Fire Lt. David M. Pfeil said, while two other people were injured. The federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration were called to inspect the remaining scaffolding and assist in the investigation, said Boston Police Superintendent Robert Dunford.

"I had just walked through the spot where it fell when I heard this roar," said Dan Rofsky, 19, an Emerson freshman from New Jersey. "To turn around, after hearing this crash 30 feet away," he added, pausing to collect himself, "I just saw this cloud of dust and smoke."

Brian Trimmer, assistant manager of Commonwealth Books, said he looked out the store's front window just as an eight- to 10-foot chunk of machinery crashed onto a mid-sized silver Honda driving east on Boylston Street.

"I saw this large orange thing fall out of the sky on top of a car," Trimmer said. "It flattened it."

Trimmer, of Cambridge, saw rescuers trying to resuscitate one of the victims pulled from the car when they were rushed off in an ambulance. A construction worker with a leg injury left the scene in another ambulance.

About a half hour later, rescuers moved the machinery off

Carroll reunites with co-workers

By KEN MAGUIRE

BOSTON — Former hostage Jill Carroll met with the staff of The Christian Science Monitor on Monday, visiting for the first time the newsroom of the paper that hired her a week after she was taken captive in Iraq.

The 28-year-old journalist had been working as a freelancer for the Boston-based newspaper when she was kidnapped in January from one of Baghdad's most dangerous Sunni Arab neighborhoods by a group that called itself the Revenge Brigade. The newspaper added her to its staff during her 82-days in captivity. She was released Thursday and returned to the United States on Sunday.

David Cook, the Monitor's Washington bureau chief, described Carroll's 45-minute visit with her colleagues as "an emotional lovefest."

The Monitor released a copy of the 6-minute video of the meeting and posted it on its Web site. The video shows her, with her relatives standing off to the side, delivering a composed but emotional "thank you" to her newsroom colleagues.

Monitor thanks those who helped Carroll

"I just want to say how much I'm overwhelmed by how wonderful the paper has been to my family," Carroll said. "I got back from this ordeal and discovered, it's like a humanitarian organization."

Carroll has been in seclusion with her parents and twin sister since she arrived in Boston on Sunday.

Cook said Carroll is not yet ready to tell her story to the public.

Her kidnappers had demanded the release of all female detainees in Iraq or Carroll would be killed. U.S. officials released some female detainees, but said it had nothing to do with the demands.

Cook declined at a press conference to discuss any diplomatic maneuvers that may have led to Carroll's release but implied there was more to the story than had been released.

"I'm not commenting on who was contacted," Cook told a gathering of reporters outside the Monitor's building.

He added: "We tried to contact every possible branch of our government. We also contacted governments overseas."

A law enforcement official won't provide details, but said a Baghdad-based hostage response team, made up of the FBI, State and Defense Departments, worked on Carroll's case. Official spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of kidnapping cases.

The FBI also helped bring Carroll's family together for the reunion.

Monitor Editor Richard Bergenheim issued a written statement Monday praising the U.S. government's "extensive" efforts.

Researchers study alternative energy alternative energy technologies, solar in particular, will have the opposite effect: a small impact if we want to reduce emissions by a small amount, but a large impact if we want to reduce emissions by a large amount."

The research team will also organize and analyze their findings so the information is available and easily understandable by policy makers and a wide variety of researchers. Their findings could serve as a tool for policy makers in determining future energy-related investments.

Through this study, the research team hopes to "be able to make recommendations on what the Energy Technology Research and Development portfolio should look like, in terms of how it should be balanced between different classes of technologies, and in the risk profile of the different classes," according to Baker.

"There are plenty of ideas for alternative energy technologies, and there is the expectation that a combination of these technologies might solve the climate change problem," said Baker. "Nobody has taken a rigorous approach to the question of exactly how much money should be invested during the research and development period, nor how it should be split up among diverse technologies."

Baker is a UMass mechanical and industrial engineering faculty member and an expert in mathematical decision theory and climate change policy.

Sorting out the costs of each technology is no small task said Jeff Keisler, whose expertise is in the field of decision analysis and research and development management.

The U.S. Department of Energy's office of biological and environmental research will award the grant over two years. However, Baker estimates that the completion of the entire project will take five years.

Also collaborating on this research project are Matthias Ruth of the University of Maryland, Leon Clarke of the Joint Global Change Institute, John Weyant of Stanford University, and Detlof von Winterfeldt of the University of Southern California.

Obama gives Democrats advice for future presidential campaign

COURTESY OBAMA SENATE.GOV

Sen. Barack Obama weighed in recently to advise the Democratic party about issues to fous on during their campaign for the 2008 presidency.

By David Espo
Associated Press

CHICAGO — Democrats should stress energy independence, education improvement and science investment in the 2008 presidential campaign, Sen. Barack Obama said Monday. He laughed off a question on whether he wants a place on the ticket.

Obama, a first-term Democrat, also said he doubts Congress will pass immigration legislation this year, but he added that if the Senate can clear a bill, "it lays the groundwork" for 2007.

Obama was guest speaker at The Associated Press' annual luncheon, held on the opening day of the Newspaper Association of America's convention.

He accused President Bush of a "stubborn refusal" to attack the causes of climate change, and said tougher fuel standards, stricter curbs on oil imports and more investment in cleaner energy are essential to avert global catastrophe.

"Saying that America is addicted to oil without following a real plan for energy independence is like admitting alcoholism and then skipping out on the 12-step program," said Obama in a reference to one of the principal themes of Bush's State of the Union address.

Republicans promptly returned the criticism.

"Rather than attack the administration, Sen. Obama would be better served to read the energy bill President Bush signed into law, particularly the portions that focus on energy-efficient vehicles, renewable energy sources and less reliance on foreign sources of fuel," said Tracey Schmitt of the Republican National Committee.

In addition to criticizing Republicans, Obama chided members of his own party.

He said Democrats "all too often are defending a social safety net that was constructed in the 1930s and '40s. My argument to Democrats has been that we need to cling to the core values that make us Democrats, the belief in universal health care, the belief in universal education, and then we should be agnostic in terms of how to achieve those values."

Obama, who was virtually unknown outside Illinois before he won a Senate primary in 2004, has quickly become a widely sought-after speaker for Democratic fundraising events. He is the only African-American in the Senate, and the party leadership frequently gives him a prominent role at events in Washington.

Asked about issues for 2008, he said the nation needs a "serious comprehensive approach" to energy independence. He said the technology exists to produce a car that can get 500 miles to a gallon of gasoline.

Obama prodded Democrats on education. "I do not believe that being against No Child Left Behind is an education policy," he said. "We should take a look at pay for performance," an idea not generally popular with teacher unions.

"I'm a big union guy and I have a sister who is a public school teacher. I think it is absolutely for us to engage teachers saying ... We are willing to pay you more, but we have a right to expect a better outcome."

In calling for greater federal spending on basic science and research, he said Bush and congressional Republicans "are so committed to more tax cuts on top of what have been delivered that we are willing to cut into what is sort of the lifeblood of our economy."

The answer about issues for 2008 prompted a follow-up question: Would he confirm an interest in being on the ticket?

"Health care is important, too," he said to laughter.

Obama said the government should provide tax breaks and loan guarantees to show the way toward greater use of environmentally friendlier energy sources.

Jury rules that Moussaoui is eligible for death

By Matthew Barakat
Associated Press

ALEXANDRIA, Va. — A federal jury found al-Qaida conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui eligible Monday to be executed, deciding that his lies to FBI agents led directly to at least one death in the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

The only person to face charges in this country in the nation's worst terrorist assault, Moussaoui now faces a second phase of his sentencing trial to determine if he actually will be put to death. That phase is to begin Thursday morning.

Moussaoui sat in his chair and prayed silently as the verdict was read. He was asked to stand but refused.

"You'll never get my blood, God curse you all," he said afterward.

The nine men and three women of the jury will hear testimony on whether the 37-year-old Frenchman, who was in jail at the time of the attack, deserves to be executed for his role.

The testimony will include families of 9/11 victims who will describe the human impact of the al-Qaida mission that flew four jetliners into the World Trade Center, the Pentagon and a Pennsylvania field.

Court-appointed defense lawyers, whom Moussaoui has tried to reject, will summon experts to suggest he is schizophrenic after an impoverished childhood during which he faced racism in France over his Moroccan ancestry.

"By this verdict, the jury has found that death is a possible sentence in this case," court spokesman Ed Adams said.

On the key question before the jurors, they answered yes on whether at least one victim died Sept. 11 as a direct result of Moussaoui's actions.

Had the jury voted against his eligibility for the death penalty, Moussaoui would have been sentenced to life in prison.

The jury began weighing Moussaoui's fate last Wednesday. During its deliberations, jurors asked only one question, seeking a definition of "weapon of mass destruction." One of the three convictions for which Moussaoui could be executed is conspiracy to use weapons of mass destruction.

The jurors were told that a plane used as a missile is the tactic employed on Sept. 11 — qualifies as a weapon of mass destruction.

Moussaoui pleaded guilty last April to conspiring with al-Qaida to hijack aircraft and other crimes. At the time, he denied being part of the 9/11 plot, saying he was being trained for a separate attack, but he changed his story when he took the stand and claimed he was to have flown a hijacked airliner into the White House that day.

Moussaoui was in jail at the time of the attacks, but prosecutors argue federal agents would have been able to thwart or at least minimize the attacks if he had revealed his al-Qaida membership and his terrorist plans when he was arrested and interrogated by federal agents.

Amherst police log

Police investigate trend of stolen vehicles

Friday March 31

A sign posted on the wall of Casmir Kocot at 233 North Pleasant St was reported stolen Thursday night. Police were notified at 11:52 a.m. and believe the sign, valued at $100, was taken overnight.

Police responded to 189 North Pleasant St. at 3:23 p.m. following reports of vandalism on an automobile. The owner of the car believed the "G" spray-painted on the car was done sometime that afternoon. There are no suspects at this time.

Dustin Allen Devlin, 19, was pulled over by police at 825 Main St. at 10:24 p.m. for an illegal right-turn on red. Upon inspection of Devlin and his vehicle, he was also arrested and charged with being a person under 21 in possession of liquor.

Saturday April 1

An 18-year-old Amherst man was arrested at 16 Brandywine Dr. at 1:02 a.m. after a caller placed a call to police regarding vandalism to three automobiles.

Alexander Vida Sabzilo, 20, of 5705 Bend Creek Rd. Dunkwoody, Ga. was arrested at 103 South Pleasant St. at 1:24 a.m. Sabzilo was pulled over by police during a motor vehicle stop and charged with multiple charges, including operating under the influence of liquor, being a person under 21 in possession of liquor, having an open container of alcohol and failure to stop/yield.

Residents of 1010 North Pleasant St. placed a larceny call to police at 1:57 a.m. The reporting party believes someone broke into their apartment through the cellar door, which was open at the time. A laptop was reported stolen.

A fight broke out at Bueno Y Sano of 1 Boltwood Walk at 1:38 a.m., resulting in multiple arrests. James E. Pereginia, 20, of 62 Windsor Rd. Norwood and Patrick Pinto, 22, of 1479 West St. Mansfield were charged with disorderly conduct.

Residents of 256 Puffton Village called police after they believe their apartment was broken into. The call to police was placed at 11:34 a.m. after residents noticed a cut in a screened window. A digital camera was reported stolen.

A larceny call was placed at 11:41 a.m. to police after the residents of 51 Phillips St. reported multiple items stolen from their residence. The items included a Coach purse and a Verizon V-cast phone, collectively valued at $300.

Adding to the recent trend in stolen motor vehicles in recent months, the owner of a white 1990 Jeep Cherokee was reported stolen to police. The owner of the car notified police at 12:54 p.m. upon noticing it was missing.

Sunday April 2

A car was reported stolen to police from 1:39 a.m. from Townhouse 40. Police are still investigating the course.

The owner of a white 1994 Oldsmobile Cutlass reported vandalism to the automobile. The owner, residing at Townhouse Apartments at 50 Meadow St., called police at 3:14 a.m. upon seeing the damage.

A robbery call was placed from 18 Nutting Ave. Saturday at 5:06 a.m. The reporting party said they were allegedly held at knifepoint while the perpetrator made off with their cell phone.

Pentagon releases Guantanamo documents

By Andrew Selsky
Associated Press

GUANTANAMO BAY NAVAL BASE, Cuba — In 2,733 pages of declassified documents released Monday to The Associated Press, men accused of helping terrorist groups or Afghanistan's former Taliban regime pleaded for freedom while U.S. military officers often painstakingly tried to find holes in their stories.

The previously classified transcripts were the second batch of Guantanamo Bay detainee hearings released by the Pentagon in response to a lawsuit by the AP. They identified more of the prisoners who have been secretly held without charges for up to four years while the U.S. military determines how dangerous they may be.

A review of the documents indicated that they contain no major revelations about high-profile detainees, but offered more insight into who has been detained and why they ended up in the custody of U.S. authorities.

Most of the men said they were innocent and would pose no threat if set free.

"My conscience is clear," said Algerian detainee Mohamed Nechla, who was accused of plotting to attack the U.S. Embassy in Bosnia. "If I left this place my only concern would be bread on the table for my wife and children."

Zia Ul Shah, a Pakistani accused of being a driver for the Taliban, said he hated his American captors at first but his feelings softened after he learned about the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"In the beginning I did not like Americans at all," Shah said. "I had never seen Americans. In the beginning when I came here the interrogations were tough and I started hating them more, but then ... someone showed me pictures from 9/11. Then I realized they have a right to be angry. My hate towards Americans was gone."

Some 715 prisoners have passed through the cells of the U.S. military base since it began receiving men captured in the U.S. war on terror more than four years ago. Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said 490 of them are now held at the base, which hugs the arid southeastern shores of Cuba.

Whitman told reporters at the Pentagon that authorities have gained a wealth of knowledge by interrogating detainees, who are held in cellblocks behind barbed wire.

"We've learned about al-Qaida's pursuit of WMDs," Whitman said, referring to weapons of mass destruction. "We've learned about their methods of recruitment, location of recruitment centers. We've learned about their skill sets, their terrorist skill sets, both general and specialized operative training."

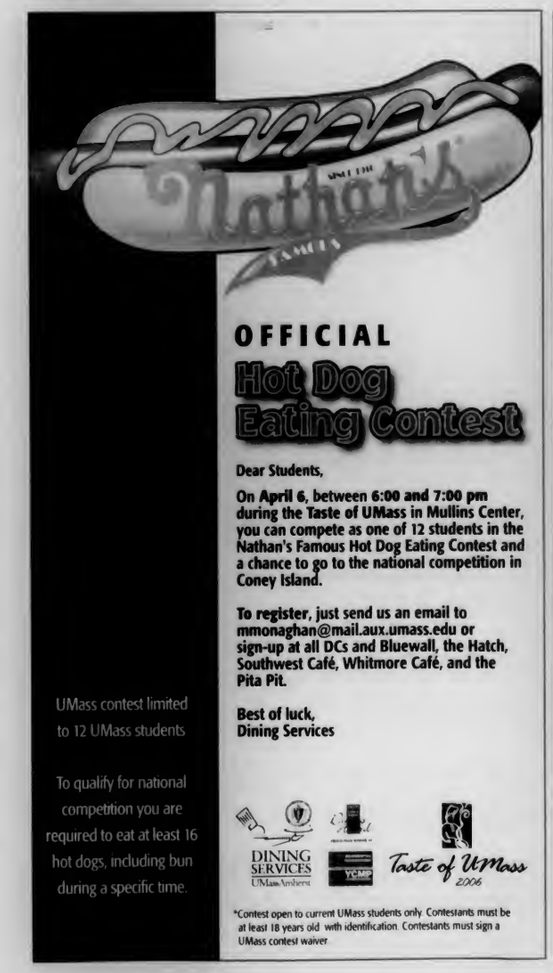
A reading of some of the documents released Monday showed no such stark admissions, although any records of interrogations and the classified portions of the hearings were not included in the transcripts. The hearings — called Administrative Review Boards — were held to determine whether detainees still posed threats to the United States.

Human rights group Amnesty International, a frequent critic of U.S. policies in its war on terror, said the transcripts would most likely reveal information that was insignificant or had been previously released.

"Nevertheless, Amnesty International welcomes today's actions, as even the seemingly minor details in these documents may help shed light on the secrecy surrounding the detainees' cases," said Eric Olson, the group's acting director of government relations.

Each of the detainees who faced such a review hearing was previously determined by other Guantanamo Bay panels — Combatant Status Review Tribunals — to be an "enemy combatant," meaning they fought against the U.S. or its allies or provided support to the Taliban, al-Qaida or "associated forces."

Shah said he felt his testimony at the earlier tribunal had been ignored.



"Should I consider (you all) the same or should I expect justice?" he asked.

The presiding U.S. military officer assured Shah all the evidence would be considered fairly.

"Well, I hope that you would believe that we would do you justice after we review all the information," said the officer, whose name was censored from the transcript for security reasons.

The detainees often pleaded with the military review panels, seeking not only freedom but also money or help finding a job back home.

"In case of my release, I would like to say that I am a poor man and don't have enough money to start a business, but I will accept any jobs from the Americans or the current government of Afghanistan," said Abdullah Mujahid, an Afghan.

Local man arrested for murder in Arizona

By Denise Lavoie
Associated Press

WHITMAN — A former Massachusetts restaurant owner was being held on a second-degree murder charge Monday after authorities said he confessed to killing a man in Arizona, then making a cross-country trek to store his dismembered remains in a freezer in Whitman.

Oral Wayne Nobles, 71, confessed to killing a man approximately three to six years ago in Golden Valley, Ariz., at Nobles' former home there, said Trish Carter, a spokeswoman for the Mohave County Sheriff's Department in Arizona. The man's body was discovered Friday in a freezer in a storage facility in Whitman, Carter said.

"Somehow or other the body ended up in Massachusetts," Carter said. "The timeline is a little hazy still."

Authorities would not release the dead man's name, saying they had not made a positive identification yet. They also would not say how the man was killed or release details on how the body was transported across the country.

Nobles, who goes by his middle name, Wayne, was being held in the Mohave County Jail in Kingman, Ariz., after an arraignment on Sunday.

The body was found after the owner of the Essex Street Storage Facility in Whitman — a suburb about 20 miles south of Boston — called police to report a foul odor coming from one of his rented units. A woman who answered the telephone at the facility would not say how long Nobles had rented a storage unit, nor discuss the matter further.

His brother, Jesse Nobles, 80, of Mohave Valley, Ariz., said he found it difficult to believe the charges.

"The whole thing is so weird," said Jesse Nobles.

"If anybody asked me if my brother could have killed someone, I would say no, and not cutting up the body and putting it in the deep freeze, and then he wouldn't be stupid enough not to plug it in," he said.

Jesse Nobles said his brother came to stay with him about a week ago to recuperate from injuries he received in an accident while driving a truck for his job in Las Vegas.

He said sheriffs came to his home looking for his brother on Friday, but he was not there.

Carter said Wayne Nobles contacted the sheriff's department on Saturday. While talking to detectives, Nobles confessed to the killing, she said.

It was not immediately clear whether Nobles had an attorney representing him in Arizona.

Jesse Nobles said his brother had lived in Massachusetts almost continually since he got out of the U.S. Navy about 50 years ago. He owned a restaurant called the Norway Diner in Orange until the summer of 2004.

Plymouth District Attorney Tim Cruz, whose office is handling the investigation in Massachusetts, would not release the identity of the victim or discuss any details of the case.

"It's still an ongoing investigation," he said.

the car and pulled out a body, Trimmer said.

John Hynes, of Boston, was driving his BMW west on Boylston Street when a section of the platform and scaffolding started to tumble.

"You could see it coming down and then I started rolling forward. It started to hit my car, and then I sped up," said Hynes, grandson of the former Boston Mayor John Hynes.

The scaffolding crushed his car and several others on the street, said Hynes, who was not injured.

The building — a dormitory and campus center — has been under construction for nearly two years, and was scheduled to open for the fall semester, said David Rosen, the school's vice president of public affairs. No students were injured.

"It's very distressing," Rosen said. A spokeswoman at Macomber Builders, the contractor hired by Emerson, had no immediate comment.

Macomber, based in South Boston, has been in business for more than 100 years and helped build Boston's Faneuil Hall Marketplace.

Report outlines Katrina response failures

This house is just one of many that was destroyed on the Gulf Coast following Hurricane Katrina. Internal reports from FEMA admit that the response to the disaster was not handled as it should have been.

By Lara Jakes Jordan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An internal FEMA report that calls for urgent reform after Hurricane Katrina outlines old failures the disaster response agency was warned about five months before the storm struck.

A Feb. 13 report assessing the Federal Emergency Management Agency's response to the storm concludes FEMA suffered from confusing leadership roles, outdated or inadequate response plans and inexperienced or under-trained staff during Katrina. It also details problems in tracking supplies to disaster sites.

All of those findings were highlighted in a March 2005 consultant's analysis, titled "A Vision for the Future," on how to revamp FEMA before the next disaster hit.

"For years FEMA has approached disasters almost timidly," the agency's post-Katrina report found. "FEMA should be attacking with sledgehammers, not fly swatters. Specific changes in logistics need immediate attention."

FEMA's internal review is the latest to surface in a series of studies about the government's sluggish response to Katrina, and how to fix it before the 2006 hurricane season starts on June 1. Katrina struck last Aug. 29.

Senate investigators are wrapping up their own inquiry of the Katrina response, following findings by the House and the White House that concluded FEMA failed to learn from earlier disasters.

FEMA acting director R. David Paulison said the agency is looking carefully at all post-Katrina reports, and he described them as "helpful in rebuilding FEMA."

But Paulison, a former Miami-Dade County fire chief in Florida, acknowledged the government is often slow to revamp itself, comparing the recommendations made after Hurricane Andrew in 1992 to Katrina more than a decade later.

"You could have taken 'Andrew's' out and put 'Katrina' in," Paulison said in a brief interview last week.

He added: "FEMA was a four-letter word when I was a fire chief during Hurricane Andrew, and that's why I'm determined to make (changes) happen."

Many reforms following disasters are never enacted because of financial costs and power struggles, said University of Pennsylvania scholar Donald F. Kettl, co-author of "On Risk and Disaster: Lessons from Hurricane Katrina."

"The big crises like Sept. 11 and Katrina challenge us and punish us for failing to adapt," said Kettl, a political science professor. "But these reports call for really dramatic, radical change in ways that disrupt the patterns of political power and standard operating procedure. So it's a lot easier to let the day-to-day pressures rule instead of confronting the issues that we know we have to deal with."

Former FEMA director Michael Brown said the two documents, taken together, raise concerns that few of the lessons learned from Katrina will be heeded. Brown, who left the agency under fire days after Katrina hit, is a top critic of the Homeland Security Department, FEMA's parent agency.

"They are fighting an uphill battle," Brown said Monday. "They wouldn't give me the money and resources to do it."

The new FEMA report was posted on the agency's Web site earlier this year. The agency pulled it from the site after a reporter's inquiry. The 2005 analysis by the Mitre Corp., obtained by The Associated Press, examined FEMA's performance during the 2004 Florida hurricanes.

Both reports describe FEMA's blunders in trying to communicate and coordinate with onsite disaster responders, and get much-needed supplies like food, water and ice to victims.

Mitre, in early 2005, found FEMA was incapable of getting a clear picture of the disaster as it unfolded because it did not have a system capable of sharing information from the ground-up. It also concluded that FEMA could not track supplies as they were being distributed.

One unnamed employee interviewed for the Mitre report worried about holes in the tracking system, noting: "White House is asking, 'Where are the water trucks?' I don't know. ... We don't have confidence that the trucks have checked in, arrived at the destination. We have to rely on third parties to tell us they have arrived."

The February report noted that responders in New Orleans were unable to communicate easily and quickly with the emergency operations center in Baton Rouge because of inadequate phone and data systems. It also said FEMA's tracking system "was of little use."

"Unfortunately, logistics personnel had a muddled picture," the report found.

Homeland Security has pledged to develop response systems before the next hurricane season begins. They include better tracking of supplies, registering victims, approving debris removal contracts and creating disaster teams to give the agency a real-time picture of unfolding emergencies.

"There are a lot of things we can do between now and hurricane season," Paulison said. "But there's stuff that's just going to take a couple of years to get in place."

Defense prepares testimony for trial of UMass murder suspect in about 1 percent of all felony cases and result in acquittals about a quarter of the time. Johnston's lawyers say they're pursuing their strongest strategy.

"This isn't a situation where you look at the case and see what kind of defense to use," said Ed Berlin, one of Johnston's lawyers. "It is what it is."

Johnston and Sullivan were childhood friends who graduated from Wahconah Regional High School in Dalton in 2000.

On the night of Sullivan's slaying, Johnston had called his friend to go out but Sullivan turned him down, police have said. The two had fought earlier, but police have not said what they fought over.

A few hours after Sullivan was killed, Johnston called his parents and admitted the shooting, according to police reports. His parents then called the police, who showed up at Johnston's apartment and had him committed for a psychiatric evaluation at Noble Hospital in Westfield.

He pleaded innocent a day later to a murder charge during a hearing held at the hospital.

Shortly after he was transferred to prison pending trial, Johnston became suicidal and was temporarily moved to a state psychiatric hospital in Bridgewater.

Johnston's lawyers have not yet given details of Johnston's mental problems, but will now have to explain them to a jury.

Lawyers and legal experts say jurors are skeptical of insanity defenses, especially when a defendant doesn't deny committing the offense he's charged with.

"The first problem with an insanity defense is you're admitting what you did," said David Hoose, a Springfield defense attorney. "It's not a defense that's ever employed with relish. It's difficult to persuade jurors of a lack of criminal responsibility unless you have someone who meets the stereotype of mental illness."

And even then, jurors are skeptical.

In January, a Worcester Superior Court jury rejected an insanity defense used by Joseph Druce, who was convicted of killing the pedophile ex-priest John Geoghan in his prison cell.

Despite abundant testimony about Druce's mental disorders and anecdotes about how he swallowed pencils, bits of wire and eyeglasses, jurors didn't accept the argument that he was insane.

Michele Galietta, a professor of clinical psychology at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, said it's difficult to explain to a jury how someone who methodically plans a crime may not realize what he's doing is wrong.

"People seem to have a hard time believing that someone who commits a crime can have a mental illness," she said. "There's a true lack of understanding of what it means to be insane."

Johnston's trial is expected to take up to three weeks.

Sharon to undergo surgery

JERUSALEM (AP) — Comatose Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will undergo surgery Tuesday to restore part of his skull removed in previous operations after he suffered a debilitating stroke, the hospital treating him said Monday.

The operation is to be conducted in the afternoon, the statement said. Sharon suffered the stroke on Jan. 4 and has not regained consciousness.

Hospital officials said last week that a decision would be made about whether to move Sharon to a long-term care facility. Experts agree that his chances of recovery are extremely slim, and with each day he remains in a coma, his chances of regaining consciousness diminish. The hospital has consistently described his condition as "critical but stable."

TV reports last week said the operation to restore about one-quarter of Sharon's skull, removed during previous surgeries, is necessary to allow his transfer to another facility. This will be Sharon's eighth operation since he suffered the stroke, including lengthy procedures to stop the bleeding in his brain after the hemorrhagic stroke.

Sharon, 78, had formed a new political party, Kadima, and was well on his way to being elected prime minister for a third time when he suffered the stroke. Ehud Olmert, his closest political ally, took over as acting prime minister and head of Kadima. In the election last week, Kadima finished first, and Olmert is expected to be chosen to form the new government.

The Yediot Ahronot newspaper reported on Monday that Israel's Cabinet will declare Sharon "permanently incapacitated" at its next session on Sunday, allowing Olmert to assume the title of prime minister even before he puts together a coalition government.

U.S. and Britain agree: it is time for unified Iraq

By Anne Gearan
Associated Press

BAGHDAD — The U.S. and Britain expect Iraq to quickly restrain militias and unify around a stable government, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her British counterpart said Monday in a visit meant to resonate both in Iraq and at home.

Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw met with nearly all of Iraq's squabbling factions over two days of unusually hard-edged diplomacy. Rice stayed overnight to make the point that security is improving despite relentless violence that has eroded public support in the U.S. for a war now in its fourth year.

"First and foremost, the purpose of this trip is to encourage and to urge the Iraqis to do what the Iraqis must do because the Iraqi people deserve it," Rice said. "But yes, the American people, the British people ... need to know that everything is being done to keep progress moving."

Two-thirds of Americans say they do not approve of President Bush's handling of the war, and a large percentage say it has not been worth the sacrifice. More than 2,000 Americans have died in Iraq since the toppling of Saddam Hussein in 2003, and the war has cost billions more than anticipated.

A car bomb exploded near a Shiite mosque in northeastern Baghdad on Monday, killing at least 10 people. Four American troops were killed by hostile fire in the volatile Anbar province, and at least five U.S. Marines died when a military truck rolled over in a flash flood in the same province. Three others were missing.

Sectarian violence has escalated since a Feb. 22 bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

Rice said she and Straw repeated a strong message that the next government has to curb the power of sectarian militias, which are blamed for much of the current wave of reprisal killings among Shiites and Sunnis.

The unified government, she said, can "produce conditions under which people are secure and these militia groups can be disbanded."

Her remark acknowledged that the militias exist in part because they provide protection that many Iraqis do not yet trust their police or Army to supply.

"You can't have, in a democracy, various groups that have arms," Rice said. "You have to have the state with a monopoly on power."

A day earlier, Rice had spoken of a "sense of drift" nearly four months after Iraqis held parliamentary elections. Political horsetrading to pick a prime minister and permanent government have bogged down, with an impasse over whether the interim prime minister will keep his job.

Neither Rice nor Straw pointed to any specific accomplishment from the trip, but said their message got through. The double billing of leaders from the two nations that have spent the most in lives and money on Iraq was a signal that international patience has run out.

"We are entitled to say that whilst it is up to you, the Iraqis, to say who will fill these positions, someone must fill these positions and fill them quickly," Straw said.

They were careful not to pronounce on the fate of interim Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari, but they voiced no enthusiasm for the Shiite nominee for a second term.

"Our purpose is not to say who needs to do what," Rice said in response to a question about whether Jaafari should step aside. "We say to every leader, 'Look within yourself and do whatever you have to do to make this process move forward.'"

Straw and Rice slipped into Iraq on Sunday morning, after spending two days touring Straw's parliamentary district in England's industrial north. Rice spent her entire visit inside the fortified American Embassy complex in the Green Zone.

From Baghdad, the two flew to London, where Rice was to see Prime Minister Tony Blair.

Rice had met anti-war protests nearly everywhere she went as Straw's guest in Liverpool and Straw's home district of Blackburn. About 20 percent of the town is Muslim, and opposition to the war is widespread.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw attend a news conference in Baghdad yesterday. Both spoke of the need for Iraq to settle under a unified government.

Iran prepares defenses against the United States

By Nasser Karimi
Associated Press

TEHRAN, Iran — Iran successfully tested its second new torpedo in as many days Monday, the latest weapon to be unveiled during war games in the Gulf that the military said are aimed at preparing the country's defenses against the United States.

A spokesman for the elite Revolutionary Guards suggested the new, Iranian-made torpedo was more powerful and capable of going deeper than others in its arsenal.

Gen. Mohammad Ebrahim Dehghani told state television the ship-launched weapon can target submarines at any depth and is powerful enough to "break a heavy warship" in two. He did not give the name of the new torpedo or any details of its speed or range.

The torpedo was tested in the Straits of Hormuz, the narrow entrance of the Gulf and a vital corridor for oil supplies.

The United States said that while Iran may have made "some strides" in its military, it is likely to be exaggerating its capabilities.

"We know that the Iranians are always trying to improve their weapons system by both foreign and indigenous measures," Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said in Washington. "It's possible that they are increasing their capability and making strides in radar absorbing materials and technology."

But "the Iranians have also been known to boast and exaggerate their statements about greater technical and tactical capabilities," he said.

The Revolutionary Guards, the elite branch of Iran's military, have been holding their maneuvers — codenamed the "Great Prophet" — since Friday, touting what they call domestically built technological advances in their armed forces.

A day earlier, Iran announced it had tested a different new torpedo — the high-speed "Hoot," which means "whale." Iran said the Hoot, moving at up to 223 mph, was too fast for any enemy ship to elude. On Friday, it tested the Fajr-3, a missile that it said can avoid radars and hit several targets simultaneously using multiple warheads.

It has not been possible to verify Iran's claims for the new armaments. But the country has made clear it aims to send a message of strength to the United States amid heightened tensions over Iran's nuclear program.

Maj. Gen. Rahim Kadivar, a Guards commander, said Monday the maneuver aims at preparing the troops in case of attack by the United States — often referred to by Iran's clerical regime as "the global arrogance."

Education through technology and my slow, painful death

Adam Szajgin

I have recently come to the realization that the University of Massachusetts Amherst is a big stinkin' technology skank. Now I know this may seem like a startling declaration, but bear with me for just a moment, my little chickadees.

Every morning I get up, pack up my backpack, check my e-mail and hit the road. Notice the fact that I do not shower. Then I'll head to some classes where I check in and answer questions with my PRS and CPS. When I get home I'll usually spend time with my animals, OWL and DUCK. After that I usually check my WebCT account and take a quiz. At the end of the night, if I'm feelin' frisky I like to log onto Course Compass and watch the Spanish videos and maybe do some of the activities, but mostly just watch the videos because I think the girls are cute.

I am willing to bet that most of the students on this campus can relate to some, if not many of those activities. In fact I will bet my left nut (the bigger one) on the fact that at some point in the academic career of every current UMass student they will become a slave to some bothersome little technological "educational tool," whether it is WebCT or DUCK or anything else. Furthermore, I have an inkling that most students at this university are as annoyed, if not more annoyed (kids with no fingers you know who you are), as I am by these weekly wastes of my precious and beautiful youth. The fact of the matter is that the educational benefits of these programs and tools hardly outweigh the frustration and irritation which go along with their implementation.

I'd like to start by discussing CPS and PRS. For those of you that do not know, these are remote response systems used primarily large lectures to ask the whole class questions and take attendance. I think these are so cool. No, really I do. My favorite part about the remotes is that freshman year I had to drop thirty bucks on a PRS, plus six bills to register it, then this year I had to drop another thirty–six bones on something completely different, a CPS.

Did I say different? Oh snap! I meant exactly the same, the only difference is that one uses infrared signals to communicate while the other uses radio frequency. Well at least they serve different purposes. Oh wait a second; they do the exact same thing.

My favorite part is when I forget to bring my CPS or PRS to class (Everyone says "Just leave it in your bag" but that's sort of hard when its rained for 56 days straight and your bag got wet and your CPS got ruined and you had to buy a new one and your roommate's mother keeps calling and asking you about whether or not her son is using condoms when he engages in "relations"). So, even though I sit in class for an hour or whatever, my presence meant nothing because I neglected to arm myself with the arsenal of remotes required to click in and confirm my attendance.

Let's move on. Today, in a startling turn of events I missed a WebCT quiz. This system is more or less the equivalent of a large bunion on your grandma's foot that just will not go away. It's recurring and it stinks. For starters, professors love to post news and updates on this system at random times throughout the day. Unfortunately, there is no way to alert students that a new piece of information has been posted. Ergo, students must check it throughout the day in order to find out if some new and important piece of information has been posted. All I am reduced to is a dejected soul checking my account as often as a kid with no friends checks his cell phone for calls.

The quizzes are not so bad, I can deal with them. What I can not deal with is the fact that once the quiz has been finished and graded, the evil little elves that run the program will not tell you the correct answer. Why not? I want the answer, without it I have learned nothing. Where's the benefit?

Spreading OWL to rest of this innocent little nation is about as awesome as releasing a new strain of the Ebola virus in a national airport.

Then there's the OWL program. The other day I found out that OWL was going national. Shudder. Whoever made that decision I beg you to halt this evil. Spreading OWL to rest of this innocent little nation is about as awesome as releasing a new strain of the Ebola virus in a national airport. The beast must be contained.

It is easy to tell which students on this campus are victims of the OWL phenomenon. Their hands tremble and they've got this weird twitch in their left eye.

The problem with OWL quizzes is that almost all of them involve numbers and most of those numbers are pretty weird. They've got all sorts of decimals and exponents and subscripts and superscripts. Sometimes, even though you spent the past two hours working out some rediculous chemistry problem, you'll get it wrong every fiftieth time you try, all because you forgot to put seven carrot symbols and the British pound symbol in the magic spot. Of course, all this occurs as you beat yourself in the side of the head every second the clock ticks closer to midnight and with it your grade, slipping slowly away into the darkness.

My shell of a roommate said recently, and I quote, "Owls make me want to end my life and go crazy, and they are slowly succeeding." After that he proceeded to coat his entire face in peanut butter and rub it in his pillow, another victim of the dreaded OWL.
